The plan included rate caps that kept electric bills artificially low for the past six years and discouraged competition from entering Maryland's partially deregulated utility market.

The caps expire in July, when rates are set to increase 72 percent to market levels for BGE customers. Rates also are increasing 39 percent for Potomac Electric Power Co. and 35 percent for Delmarva Power.

Utility executives warn that continued price controls could bankrupt Maryland power companies and cause power shortages like those in California in 2000.

Last summer, residential customers paid an average of 11.72 cents per kilowatt-hour in the mid-Atlantic region, according to the Edison Electric Institute, an electric utility association.

However, BGE customers paid an average 9.251 cents per kilowatt-hour last summer, according to the Maryland Public Service Commission, which regulates utilities.

BGE's planned increase to 14.834 cents per kilowatt-hour should bring its prices up to current market rates, said Jason Cuevas of the Edison Electric Institute.

Yucca Probe Forwarded (LVRJ)

By STEVE TETREAULT, STEPHENS WASHINGTON BUREAU

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 25, 2006

Federal prosecutors reviewing evidence

WASHINGTON -- Federal prosecutors are reviewing evidence gathered by investigators into whether scientists falsified quality assurance documents at Yucca Mountain, officials confirmed Friday.

Inspectors general for the Interior and Energy departments sent a report to U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in Las Vegas in the past month, said Roy Kimes, a spokesman for Interior Department Inspector General Earl Devaney.

"The investigative work has been done, and the report has been forwarded to the Department of Justice," Kimes said. "It is not considered finalized until we get an indication from DOJ that they are going to prosecute or not going to prosecute."

Neither Kimes nor Denise Smith, a spokeswoman for Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman, would discuss details.

Smith said "it is possible" that evidence of wrongdoing was discovered, but communications between investigators and prosecutors do not necessarily signal the probe is near an end.

"As evidence is uncovered, there are dealings with the U.S. attorney's office, and oftentimes the U.S. attorney may have us do additional work or not depending on what is found," Smith said.

Inspectors were asked to determine possible criminal activity by federal employees after the disclosure in March 2005 of provocative e-mails.

In the messages, which were written between 1998 and 2000, several workers discussed possible alterations of quality assurance documents that backed up their water infiltration models at the nuclear waste site.

Natalie Collins, an aide to Bogden, said she would not confirm or deny the federal attorney's involvement in the matter.

A person familiar with the process said, "I wouldn't think they would send something over (to Bogden) that they didn't think ought to be considered for prosecution."

On Thursday, Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., told reporters that a Justice Department evaluation "was forthcoming."

"They want to find out if it was done maliciously or done in error," Porter said of the allegations of document mishandling. "They want to find out if there was any criminal activity."

Porter heads a House subcommittee that has been conducting a separate probe of quality assurance at Yucca Mountain and issues related to the e-mails.

The Yucca project was rocked and investigations were triggered when the e-mails were disclosed by Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and by Charles Groat, then-director of the U.S. Geological Survey.

The messages circulated among a small number of employees. The primary authors later were identified as USGS hydrologists Joseph Hevesi, Allen Flint and Lorraine Flint.

Hevesi appeared before Porter's subcommittee in June and offered explanations for some of the messages. He testified under oath that he did not alter documents or data. The Flints, who are married, were questioned by subcommittee investigators but have not commented publicly.

The Energy Department recently completed an audit of the work performed by the USGS scientists. A report issued Feb. 17 concluded the science was valid but the research would be redone by Sandia National Laboratories to meet quality assurance standards.

The hydrologists remain employed at the USGS, spokeswoman A.B. Wade said. Agency officials have said any possible disciplinary action was being postponed until completion of the inspectors general probe.

Tackling The Animal-to-Human Link In Illness (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

ATLANTA, March 24 — Stronger ties between veterinarians and physicians are needed to prevent further outbreaks of the animal diseases that have caused deaths and serious illness among humans in many countries in recent years, international health officials said at a meeting here.

The diseases are known as zoonoses because they affect animals primarily, and humans only incidentally. The AIDS, SARS and A(H5N1) avian influenza viruses and at least eight other infectious agents carried by animals have led to new and emerging human diseases in recent years.

The spread of new and emerging diseases can be a two-way street as people occasionally transmit human diseases like tuberculosis to elephants in captivity in the United States and Sweden and mongooses in Africa.

The latest and most visible zoonosis is A(H5N1) avian influenza. Through illness and culling, the virus has led to the death of an estimated 200 million birds worldwide. In Asia and Europe, the virus has caused 185 human cases of which 104 have been fatal.

New diseases are occurring in part because of globalization and because people are encroaching on areas once reserved for wildlife. After the AIDS virus infected tens of millions of people worldwide and an animal disease, anthrax, was deliberately spread through the United States postal system after Sept. 11, public health has become intertwined with national security.

Experts at the three-day International Symposium on Emerging Zoonoses said they had no way of predicting what human disease would emerge next from an animal source.

Preventing further outbreaks, participants said, will require a variety of measures, including more education about zoonoses among veterinarians and physicians; more integration of animal diseases into health plans; the creation of more laboratories to detect animal diseases; and possibly changes in the foods people eat and the animals they keep as pets.

Breaking down barriers among government agencies, academia and special interest groups will be needed as scientists seek new ways to collect reliable evidence to protect the health of animals and humans, participants said.

But "no single institution has the capacity to do all this," said Dr. Pierre Formenty, a veterinarian and epidemiologist at the World Health Organization in Geneva.

The meeting was the first between the World Animal Health Organization, a cooperative of chief veterinary officers from 167 countries, based in Paris, and the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, based in Atlanta, said Dr. Lonnie King, the dean of Michigan State University's veterinary school.

Dr. King is soon joining the C.D.C., which is expected to become a laboratory and epidemiology reference center for the animal organization.

"We are creating the conditions for the spread of these viruses" that cause zoonoses and human illness through tourism, hunting and farming, said Dr. Bruno Chomel, a professor of zoonoses at the University of California, Davis.

For example, Dr. Chomel said, the corn mouse that carries the virus that causes Argentine hemorrhagic fever has spread its range with changes in farming, leading to outbreaks of the bleeding disease.

The liver infection caused by the hepatitis E virus, which has been detected mainly in poor countries, is being increasingly recognized in wealthy countries in small numbers. Two outbreaks of hepatitis E occurred recently in Japan after people ate raw liver from infected wild boar and deer, Dr. Chomel said.

In 1999, scientists discovered the Nipah virus among pig workers in Malaysia and Singapore who developed inflammation of the brain and respiratory illness. Farming practices on pig farms where fruit trees were abundant created opportunities for transmission of the Nipah virus, said Dr. Peter W. Daniels of the Australian Animal Health Laboratory in Geelong.

Fruit bats carried the Nipah virus, and it was transmitted to pigs that lived in an open farm environment. In turn, the virus was transmitted to humans and their pets.

Additional factors favoring Nipah virus transmission were disrespect for regulations and the frequent breaking of rules to increase profits. It was a lesson that self-regulation must be realistically audited, Dr. Daniels said.

The demand for exotic pets can also spread zoonoses.

Customs inspectors recently stopped the potential spread of A(H5N1) virus in Belgium by catching a man trying to smuggle infected Thai eagles that had been stuffed alive in a roller tube.

Cats, leopards and tigers have died from A(H5N1) avian influenza in southeast Asia and Europe. Though the number of cases is small, they have raised concern that the virus could become a bigger problem among felines. The 10,000 tigers now being kept as pets in the United States outnumber the 6,000 in the wild worldwide, Dr. Chomel said.

Another zoonosis, rabies, killed 50,000 people in 2005, mainly from dog bites in Africa and Asia despite availability of an effective vaccine, according to the World Health Organization.

In poor countries, many dogs go unvaccinated because they are believed to be strays. But many strays turn out not to be strays, said Dr. Jakob Zinsstag of the Swiss Tropical Institute in Basel. In a pilot study in Chad, his team vaccinated and tagged stray dogs. When the Swiss team recaptured stray dogs, it found that 70 percent had been vaccinated, concluding that their owners had let them roam freely and that opportunities existed to conduct rabies vaccination programs.

Many disease outbreaks like avian influenza often lead to mass cullings that create practical and emotional problems for animal health workers, said Dr. Larry Granger, a veterinarian at the United States Department of Agriculture in Riverdale, Md. When mass euthanasia of animals is carried out, all workers should be debriefed to help relieve their stress, Dr. Granger said.

Selling The Forests (NYT)

It's rarely a good idea to sell off assets to pay normal operating expenses. It's an even worse idea when the assets are chunks of national forest. But that's exactly what the Bush administration wants to do.

Washington has long sent money to isolated local communities surrounded by national forests. The communities cannot tax federal property, so the money helps pay for schools. The grants were calculated as a percentage of timber sales. When the annual harvest declined, partly as a result of court rulings in favor of various endangered species, the money was taken from general revenues.

President Bush's 2007 budget proposes to raise the money by auctioning off about 300,000 acres of federal forest in 41 states, at an anticipated price of $800 million. The administration recently sent a bill to Congress that would give the Forest Service the authority to conduct the sales. The bill has many defects, especially a provision that would sharply limit the public's opportunity to comment on the sales, short of embarking on expensive litigation. But its most glaring defect is its underlying strategy of trading long-term assets for short-term gain.

Gov. Mike Easley of North Carolina, which would lose 9,828 acres, or nearly 1 percent of its national forest acreage, put the matter eloquently in a letter to Mark Rey, the under secretary of agriculture who helped concoct this scheme. The plan, he said, would blatantly contradict North Carolina's efforts to preserve open space for future generations by removing priceless resources "from public access for all time in order to provide temporary funding."

This page has objected on many occasions to the administration's efforts to roll back protections for the national forests, chiefly its decision to rescind President Bill Clinton's "roadless rule," which would have shielded nearly 60 million acres of national forest from further commercial intrusions. Though it involves much less acreage, the proposal to sell forest land reflects the same insensitivity to environmental values, not to mention misplaced budget priorities. In addition to the forest sale, the administration also proposes to sell a half-million acres managed by the Interior Department, not for any purposes related to stewardship of the public lands, but simply to reduce a national deficit already bloated by tax cuts.

Congress should reject both ideas out of hand.

Sections Of The Voting Rights Act Will Soon Need Reauthorization (ICT)

By David Melmer, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Voting Rights Act, enacted in 1965, will celebrate its 41st anniversary on Aug. 7; yet some provisions of the act, which supporters argue have brought American Indians into the political arena, are due to expire in 2007.

American Indian and non-Indian organizations are in the midst of compiling and reporting research that shows the VRA - with some permanent provisions and some temporary - has made a difference to many minorities and furthers the argument that the VRA is still needed in its entirety.

Section 5 of the act, renewed several times, requires nine states and portion of seven states to submit changes that affect voting in any way to the U.S. Department of Justice for approval, or pre-clearance, as it is referred. That section is due to expire in 2007. Section 5 was last renewed by Congress for a term of 25 years, and that is the recommendation again.

Section 203, which requires assistance for limited-English speakers at the polls, and Sections 6 - 9, which authorize the federal government to monitor elections, are all set to expire.

The American Civil Liberties Union submitted a comprehensive report on how the VRA affects Indian country. The states that benefited the most from the VRA were Montana, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado and South Dakota. In each state, litigation or the threat of litigation mitigated state voting legislation that would have adversely impacted American Indian residents.

"By tearing down the barriers to equal opportunity for racial and language minorities in voting, the Act removed the political mechanism that was essential to maintaining the legal structure of segregation. As the Supreme Court has said, the equal right to vote is fundamental because it is preservative of all rights," the report stated.

The report used selected documentation from trial transcripts to support the claim that the VRA is important to Indian country. In other parts of the country, specifically Southern states, litigation and voting rights changes have occurred since the VRA's beginning in 1965. It hasn't been until recently that Indian country has benefited from the VRA.

Had it not been for the VRA, the report asserts, American Indians in some states would not have the representation they prefer; yet there is more work to do and litigation is still a necessary tool in keeping the states in line.

Although the act eradicated at-large voting, just after it was signed some states changed some districts to at-large voting only to face legal action. At-large representation was ended early on in the act's life in the South, but in Indian country only just recently has at-large selection of representatives been stopped.

Only one lawsuit was filed between 1974 and 1990 in Indian country. That lawsuit challenged the Montana at-large elections as diluting American Indian voting strength, despite the presence of seven reservations and a significant American Indian population. American Indians make up eight percent of Montana's population.

Other lawsuits filed in Montana resulted in the election of eight American Indians to the state Legislature, more American Indian lawmakers than any other state. Not all the lawsuits in Montana went to court.

The 1992 redistricting plan in Montana was challenged four years later. The redistricting commission, made up of both political parties, did not have any American Indian representation, but tribes submitted a plan that they thought would be fair. The commission rejected the plan and ended up in court in 1996. It was redrawn, but not to the full satisfaction of the tribes.

In 2000, the commission included one American Indian and the result was the creation of 100 house districts, six of which were majority American Indian; and 50 Senate districts, three of which were majority American Indian, the report noted.

South Dakota, with a larger American Indian population and smaller overall population than Montana, has only four American Indians in the state Legislature. Changes to redistricting after the state was found in violation of the VRA resulted in a split district that may allow American Indian voters to elect up to three more of their preferred candidates.

South Dakota is the only state in the Plains and Mountain states required by the VRA to submit any changes in voting laws or rules to the Justice Department for pre-clearance. Two of its counties, Todd and Shannon, home to the Rosebud and Pine Ridge reservations respectively, are listed under Section 5.

According to the report, several factors kept lawsuits at bay in Indian country: lack of resources and access to legal assistance, lax enforcement of the VRA by the Department of Justice, the isolation of the American Indian community and the debilitating legacy of years of discrimination by the federal and state governments.

American Indian voters' rights were being challenged in the southern Plains states as well.

It wasn't until 1970 that the Colorado Constitution was amended to allow American Indians to vote and take part in the political process.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Ute members were not allowed to register to vote at the tribal headquarters, while the non-Indian population was afforded satellite registration locations in various communities. Litigation changed that situation. Prior to 1997, no American Indian had ever been elected to a county office in Montezuma County, home of the Ute Mountain Utes.

The report stated that defendants in American Indian voting rights cases frequently argue that "Indians are mainly loyal to their tribes and simply don't care about participation in elections run by the state."

The report went on to say it was the state itself that created an atmosphere of non-loyalty to the state by denying the American Indian the right to vote.

"The courts have invariably found patterns of widespread discrimination against Indians in the political process, including chronic racial bloc voting," the report stated.

FBI Helps ID New Orleans Gangs In Houston (KHOU-TV)

By Jeff McShan, 11 News

KHOU-TV, March 25, 2006

The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston.

11 News talked with Houston's police chief about the gang crackdown and how officers are using the information.

In New Orleans, police say some gang members that evacuated their city are now beginning to come back.

"I think what we have seen is a few bad guys have reoccupied the city," said New Orleans police chief Warren Riley.

Apparently they are coming back to redefine their territories.

"The people we suspect of this are some folks that were in Houston a while back. I think Houston's obviously on them," said Riley.

After a slow start. Houston, specifically HPD, is onto them because vital communication between the two cities is finally taking place.

FBI director Robert Mueller says the federal agency played a big role in making that happen.

"We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both Harold and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now," said Mueller.

It's been well documented that after the storm, homicides here shot up more than 25 percent.

Chief Harold Hurtt said his department is getting a handle on it by targeting the hot spots and getting much-needed information on the criminals that came here from our neighboring state.

"I think we are doing a good job of sharing intelligence now because they are getting access to databases in Louisiana which we didn't have in the beginning. And we have identified a lot of people as you know, locally here in the media. We have done some roundups of some individuals from New Orleans that was involved in gang activity, as well as drugs, and we are going to stay on top of that," said Hurtt.

In New Orleans the chief says they're trying to stay on top of it too.

"Advise citizens that we're on it, let the gang members know that we're on it and to do all we can to discourage them from re-occupying or coming back to the city," said Riley.

In other words, both cities are cracking down on gangs and no one wants them to call their city home.

New Graffiti Signs Put Officials On Alert (KHOU-TV)

By Wendell Edwards, 11 News

KHOU-TV, March 25, 2006

At a fund-raiser for the Mademoiselles of Madison High School, washing cars was the easy part.

But the group said they wish keeping buildings graffiti-free in the neighborhood was just as simple.

Houston is no stranger to gangs or how members mark their territory.

But when strange symbols and signs started showing up, Precinct 7 deputies took notice.

“It wasn’t very long after their arrival,” Sgt. Ray Hughes said. “They made themselves very known pretty quickly.”

Sgt. Ray Hughes said the new graffiti is from New Orleans gangs.

Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston, adding to an already crowded canvas.

“It’s very hard. I gotta tell you — we’re swamped,” Sgt. Hughes said. ”We try really hard to keep up with it but we can’t.”

In New Orleans, they aren’t called gangs. They are known as members of rival housing projects. But authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston.

A war that includes graffiti and violent crime.

A battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police.

"For us to be effective, we have to work together," FBI Director Robert Mueller said. "We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans."

A crackdown that puts gangs on alert, authorities on patrol and a clear sign that neither side is backing down.

FBI Planning To Return To N.O. By Early June (NOTP)

By Charlie Chapple, St. Tammany Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 25, 2006

Director tours temporary site

The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish.

"We expect to be back sometime in late May or early June," Mueller said after meeting with agents and other law enforcement officials at the FBI's temporary field office and compound at Covington Country Club.

After the FBI's Lakefront headquarters were heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, the agency rented the country club's clubhouse and turned the facility into a fenced and secured compound for agents and staff members.

Mueller, a former U.S. attorney and prosecutor who has led the agency since August 2001, said he has made several trips to the New Orleans area since the hurricane, but Thursday was his first visit to the temporary office.

Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said.

During his two-hour visit to the temporary office, Mueller also met with several state and local law enforcement officers, including State Police Superintendent Henry Whitehorn, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens and representatives from the New Orleans Police Department, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and Plaquemines Parish Sheriff's Office.

Mueller said his visit had a dual purpose. "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here," Mueller said. "Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding."

The FBI head said he also wanted to thank state and local law enforcement officers for continuing the relationship they've built with the agency since Katrina and to "assure them we are ready for the next hurricane down the line."

As he waited to talk with Mueller, Stephens praised the FBI. "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about," he said. "They were there for us when we needed them."

6 Convicted Of Racketeering After Muscling In On Mob (NYT)

By JULIA PRESTON

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Six men accused of being members of a gang led by Balkan immigrants that seized control of illegal gambling in old-time Mafia strongholds were convicted of racketeering yesterday in federal court.

Prosecutors charged that the organization, which they said was sometimes called the Corporation, had used strong-arm tactics to set up illegal gambling clubs in Astoria and Bayside, Queens, and in the Bronx, pushing aside the Luchese and Gambino crime family.

Gang leaders at one point sought to show their muscle by insisting on being seated at the old table of the late John J. Gotti, the don of the Gambino crime family, at Rao's restaurant in East Harlem, the prosecutors said.

After a three-month trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan, Alex Rudaj, who is from Montenegro and who prosecutors said was the ringleader of the Albanian organized crime group, and five other defendants were found guilty of multiple counts of racketeering, illegal gambling and extortion.

Mr. Rudaj and another defendant, Nardino Colotti, were acquitted of the most serious charge in the trial, the attempted murder of Gaetano Peduto, then an associate of the Bonnano crime family, during a Bronx car chase in 1993.

Mr. Rudaj's lawyer, James Kousouros, said that defeating the attempted murder charge was "huge" for the defense, because that charge carries a mandatory life sentence.

The jury also found the defendants not guilty of another serious charge of violence, a pistol-whipping attack in August 2001 on a gang rival.

But the guilty verdicts showed that the jury was amply persuaded that Mr. Rudaj, 38, and his associates were part of a criminal organization that spread its illegal gambling operation, often with threats of force, from Astoria to Westchester County. The assistant United States attorneys who prosecuted the case, Jennifer G. Rodgers, Timothy Treanor and Benjamin Gruenstein, said that Mr. Rudaj's group collected at least $4 million a year from a network of 50 video gambling machines. The machines are not illegal, prosecutors said, but collecting gambling proceeds from them is.

"They used force and intimidation as their primary business tactic," Ms. Rodgers said in her closing arguments on Dec. 19.

"They took and they tried to take territory by violence, force and threat of violence," she said.

Ms. Rodgers described an instance in which she said Mr. Rudaj had beaten an extortion victim to a "bloody pulp" and then complained that the victim's blood had spattered all over his off-white pants.

Mr. Kousouros never denied during the trial that Mr. Rudaj had engaged in gambling. "A lot of it," Mr. Kousouros said. But he argued that his client was not part of a violent organized crime group.

The other defendants were Nikola Dedaj, Prenka Ivezaj, Ljusa Nuculovic and Angelo DiPietro.

The jurors found that the gang, which prosecutors said was formed in 1993, engaged in loan sharking, and extorted bars and social clubs to force in their illegal gambling operations. The defendants face seven years to life. Mr. Kousouros said he planned an appeal for Mr. Rudaj on the extortion charges. </NYT_TEXT>

3 Plead Guilty In Conspiracy (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

Two U.S. soldiers and a former Air Force sergeant have pleaded guilty in a widespread bribery and extortion conspiracy as part of an ongoing undercover investigation that has already resulted in 50 guilty pleas from servicemen and civilian government workers, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said yesterday.

Pleading guilty in Tucson, Ariz., on Thursday to one count each of "conspiring to enrich themselves by obtaining cash bribes from persons they believed to be drug traffickers" were Curtis W. Boston II, 24, formerly a sergeant in the U.S. Air Force; U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Rodney E. Mills, 39; and Arizona National Guard Sgt. Gustavo C. Soto, 33.

Court documents show the smugglers were actually undercover FBI agents, part of "Operation Lively Green," with whom the three are accused of conspiring to use their positions to "assist, protect and participate in the activities of an illegal narcotics trafficking organization engaged in the business of transporting and distributing cocaine from Arizona to other locations in the southwestern United States."

In order to protect the cocaine shipments, the records said, the men wore their uniforms, carried official identification cards and drove in military vehicles to prevent police inspections for narcotics as they transported the drugs through U.S. Border Patrol, Arizona Department of Public Safety and Nevada law-enforcement checkpoints.

Mrs. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's criminal division, said all the defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from locations that included Nogales, Ariz., and Tucson, to large metro areas including Phoenix and Las Vegas. The three who pleaded guilty on Thursday accepted $50,000 in bribes for their participation. The conspiracy charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. All three agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation and will be sentenced in June.

The fifty who have already pleaded were involved in more than $420,000 in bribes, Justice Department officials said, adding that more than 1,500 pounds of cocaine was transported by the servicemen and others. They will also be sentenced in June.

Authorities detailed one of the previous cases where soldiers drove three official government vehicles, including two military Humvees, to a clandestine desert airstrip near Benson, Ariz., where they met a twin-engine King Air aircraft flown by undercover FBI agents.

While in full uniform, the soldiers supervised the unloading of more than 130 pounds of cocaine from the airplane into their vehicles, which they then delivered to other agents posing as high-echelon narcotics traffickers at a resort hotel in Phoenix, the authorities said.

The cases are part of a joint investigation by the Southern Arizona Corruption Task Force, which is comprised of the FBI, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Tucson Police Department.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration To Take Center Stage At Trilateral Summit (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox in Cancun on Thursday to discuss immigration reform, even as the Senate debates whether to give legal status to the millions of illegal immigrants who are already in the United States.

Bush and Fox are scheduled to meet in the Yucatan vacation resort as part of a trilateral summit with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. While Bush has serious economic issues to address with Harper, U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting.

"The immigration debate is a vital debate for our country," Bush said Thursday, after a White House meeting on the issue with agricultural and faith-based leaders. "It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

Given the political climate across the United States, it's doubtful that Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year. Bush is weakened by low approval ratings, and opposition to illegal immigration has become a red-hot issue in many states where lawmakers face voters in November. Moreover, several potential 2008 presidential candidates are weighing in from opposing sides, lessening the chance for compromise.

"There's nothing that Bush can promise credibly to the Mexicans," said George Grayson, a professor who specializes in U.S.-Mexico relations at Virginia's College of William and Mary. "He's had a rough couple of months, and the Republicans sought to separate themselves from him in the Dubai Ports deal. They have a chance to do it again with immigration."

That isn't stopping Bush from promoting his plan to overhaul immigration law. He highlights his call for a guest-worker program, which would allow illegal immigrants and foreign workers to apply for temporary legal status to accept U.S. jobs. After a maximum of six years, they would be required to go back to their home countries and wouldn't be placed on track for permanent residency.

Bowing to rising resentment of illegal immigrants across the heartland, Bush also has recently emphasized tighter security along the U.S.-Mexican border and called for illegal immigrants registering for his guest-worker program to pay unspecified fines.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., a potential 2008 presidential candidate, is staking out a harder stance. The Senate will begin two weeks of debate on immigration on Tuesday, and Frist is sponsoring a bill that would toughen border security without offering a guest-worker program.

His proposal mirrors an enforcement-only bill that the House of Representatives passed on Dec. 16. Lawmakers opposing the guest-worker plan say that giving illegal immigrants the opportunity to work and live here legally would reward bad behavior.

Meanwhile, on Monday the Senate Judiciary Committee will take up a bill by Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass, and John McCain, R-Ariz., another likely 2008 presidential candidate, that would let illegal immigrants hold temporary work visas for up to six years after they pay $1,000 fines and pass background checks. Illegal immigrants could apply for permanent residence and eventual citizenship under the Kennedy-McCain measure.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the panel's chairman, is trying to broker a compromise that includes guest-worker and enforcement provisions.

Most experts think Bush faces an uphill fight to win congressional approval of any terms granting legal status to illegal aliens, which opponents denounce as amnesty for lawbreakers.

"I think it's going to be difficult for the president," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposes giving legal status to illegal aliens. "Whatever political capital he thought he had last year is spent and, like the rest of the federal government, is in deficit. Amnesty, on a visceral level, most Americans object to."

Polls reflect America's unease with some of the proposed changes. In a Quinnipiac national survey last month, 62 percent said they oppose making it easier for illegal immigrants to become citizens, while only 32 percent supported the idea. An NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll two weeks ago found that 56 percent said the United States shouldn't grant temporary worker status to illegal immigrants.

Mexican officials are under a growing sense of urgency after watching the issue heat up among their northern neighbors. Fox is in his last year in office and would like immigration reform to be part of his legacy, Grayson said.

"Fox leaves office and has precious little to show," Grayson said. "He's hoping to pull a rabbit out of his hat."

Seeking to influence U.S. lawmakers and public opinion, the Fox government paid $369,500 for full-page ads that advocate a guest-worker program and argue that Mexico should help the United States design it. The ads ran this week in The Washington Post, The New York Times and The Los Angeles Times.

"Perhaps we are at the most important moment in this debate in the last five, six years," said Geronimo Gutierrez, undersecretary for North America in Mexico's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "... Anything can happen with migration reform in the U.S., and we are aware of that. ... We want to send a message that Mexico is part of the solution, not part of the problem."

The NBC News/Wall Street Journal Poll was taken March 10-13. The poll was a sampling of 1,005 adults - 48 percent male, 52 percent females. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points. The Quinnipiac University Poll was conducted Feb. 21-28 with 1,892 registered voters nationwide. The margin of error is plus or minus 2.3 percentage points.

Cornyn Vows To Oppose Immigration Bill (FWST)

By Dave Montgomery

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. John Cornyn of Texas vowed Friday to oppose a bipartisan immigration measure that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track toward legalization, saying the bill would "encourage further disrespect for our laws."

The Texas Republican signaled his intention to oppose the bill, by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., amid signs that a tentative compromise among Senate Judiciary Committee members may be collapsing.

The Senate faces a showdown on immigration next week.

Senators are deeply divided over proposals to toughen border security and more comprehensive measures that would include President Bush's calls for a guest worker plan.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he will submit a limited border enforcement measure as a starting point unless the Judiciary Committee completes work on a more extensive plan embracing key elements of the McCain-Kennedy bill.

Frist gave the committee until late Monday to complete its work.

"I don't think the Judiciary Committee is going to be able to complete a bill by Monday," said Cornyn, a member of the panel and co-sponsor of a rival immigration bill. "There is just not enough time for us to have a committee product."

Most of the committee embraced a tentative compromise before Congress began a weeklong recess, with plans to return and vote on a final version Monday.

But immigration advocates said the agreement may be disintegrating as committee staff members struggle to draft a bill.

"I'm not sure that's holding," said Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute, which supports a guest worker plan. "The handshake from last Thursday is turning out to be pretty hard to write into legislative language."

The McCain-Kennedy bill would let illegal immigrants hold temporary work visas for up to six years after they pay a $1,000 fine, pass background checks and meet other conditions.

They would also be eligible to apply for permanent residence and eventual citizenship.

"I'm not going to vote for anything that essentially rewards illegal conduct," said Cornyn.

He described the McCain-Kennedy bill as amnesty for illegal immigrants.

The bill's supporters say the amnesty tag is inaccurate because illegal immigrants would have to pay a fine.

Thousands Rally For Immigrants' Rights (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

The Dallas Morning News, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON – In church pews, union halls and now the streets of Chicago, Phoenix, Milwaukee and Los Angeles, hundreds of thousands have clamored in recent weeks for Congress to confer legal status on the country's 11 million-plus illegal immigrants.

The street rallies, scattered work stoppages and protests in cities across the nation are reaching a crescendo this weekend in preparation for Monday's launch of a two-week Senate debate to fix the deeply dysfunctional immigration system.

More than 20,000 spilled into the streets of Phoenix on Friday, marching on the office of a senator who wants illegal immigrants to leave the country before they can apply to return as temporary workers. Perhaps as many as a half-million marchers are expected today for a rally in Los Angeles, and hundreds more will gather at Dallas City Hall.

At the top of their agenda: Pressuring senators to bring the nation's illegal immigrants out of the shadows and create legal pathways for workers who want to come here in the future.

AP Thousands of supporters of immigrant rights clogged major thoroughfares in central Phoenix Friday.

"Not since the days of César Chavez have we seen such grassroots mobilization for any cause," said the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez Jr., head of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference.

Said Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights: "Nothing like this has been seen in this country. And if it continues moving forward, it's the beginning of a massive immigrant civil-rights struggle."

Angered by the House's approval in December of an enforcement-only strategy that calls for Southwest border fencing, beefed-up security, and the criminalization of illegal immigrants and those who help them, the protesters are using street theater to flex their political muscle.

DOJ_NMG_0022214

"We believe this [proposal] is not fair and goes against human rights and, more importantly, against our Christian beliefs of providing protection to whomever needs it, no questions asked," said Gustavo Bujanda Reyes, leader of Redes Ciudadanas, a network of community groups in Dallas.

Support in doubt

With individual senators indicating a deep unease with some of the harshest House provisions, the Senate appears unlikely to embrace the House's course.

But it remains unclear whether there's enough support in the Senate for any type of plan to legalize illegal immigrants here and create a guest worker program for future arrivals – though advocates insist they remain hopeful.

Texas Sen. John Cornyn, who chairs the Senate immigration subcommittee, made clear Friday that he will oppose the leading legalization proposal, offered by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Their plan would place illegal immigrants on a path to eventual citizenship if they pay $2,000 in fines, make good on any back taxes, pass a criminal background check and demonstrate English proficiency.

The proposal "rewards illegal immigrants and will be considered an amnesty by Americans," Mr. Cornyn said. "It will encourage further disrespect for our laws, and will undercut our efforts to shore up homeland security."

Mr. Cornyn and a fellow Republican, Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, have crafted a rival proposal that would permit illegal immigrants to become guest workers for six years but then require them to return home. That plan, derided as "report-to-deport" by critics, has received little support – and those who marched on Mr. Kyl's office Friday favor a much more liberal legalization plan.

'Anti-amnesty'

Though the protesters have received major attention, there's a quieter effort under way by opponents of a broad legalization program. Don Stewart, a spokesman for Mr. Cornyn, said that 50 to 60 percent of the calls to the senator's offices in Texas and Washington are "anti-amnesty."

"If we are just listening to our constituents here, I know where we are headed," Mr. Stewart said.

The showdown begins Monday when the Senate Judiciary Committee meets in a last-ditch bid to finalize several weeks of work on a massive immigration bill that would provide for increased border security and immigration enforcement – and possibly include a guest worker program.

The committee's slow pace was jolted when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., imposed a tight deadline.

To the consternation of many senators, Dr. Frist has made clear that if the committee doesn't approve a bill Monday, he'll substitute his own border security plan for the Senate debate that kicks off Tuesday. Doing so, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., predicted, would lead to a "donnybrook" on the floor as senators fight to attach a slew of competing immigration plans to what's already a huge and complicated bill.

GOP schism

Fraught with controversy in the best of times, the immigration debate has been further complicated this year by a deep philosophical schism in the Republican Party and the presidential aspirations of Dr. Frist, Mr. McCain and other key players.

And while the immigration debate hasn't broken neatly along party lines, a rift opened this week when Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada threatened a filibuster or other legislative tactics if Dr. Frist brings up a bill that doesn't address the status of illegal immigrants.

President Bush, who has remained largely out of the legislative fray, on Thursday renewed his push for a bill that pairs increased border security with a guest worker program. He'll renew that message Monday in a speech in downtown Washington to a group of newest Americans: Those taking the oath of citizenship.

In Bills' Small Print, Critics See A Threat To Immigration (NYT)

By Rachel L Swarns

WASHINGTON, March 24 — A little-noticed provision in two key Senate immigration bills would reshape the handling of immigration appeals cases and has touched off an outcry from several legal scholars, federal judges and the policy-making group for the federal courts.

The measure would designate the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit here, an administrative court that focuses primarily on patent cases and currently handles no immigration appeals, as the only court in the nation to handle immigration appeals. Such appeals are currently shared by the 12 other federal appellate courts.

The judges and scholars say that the circuit court in Washington, which handles about 1,500 nonimmigration cases a year, would be swamped by an additional 12,000 immigration cases. And they say that the court lacks the expertise to handle complex immigration cases, which often raise a host of constitutional and human-rights issues.

The question of how these cases are handled is particularly sensitive because federal appeals judges have sharply criticized what they have described as a pattern of biased and incoherent decisions from immigration judges in asylum cases, which make up the bulk of immigration appeals.

The two bills — one by Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the other by Senator Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee and the majority leader — were intended in part to ease the burden on the nation's federal appeals courts, which have had a sharp increase in immigration cases. The provisions may come up for a vote in the Senate as early as next week.

Judiciary Committee staff members said that designating a single court to handle the cases would ensure a consistent standard for immigration decisions and discourage immigrants from shopping for favorable courts. They said that immigration lawyers would also be assigned to the court to help enhance expertise and that the number of judges would be increased to 15 from 12.

"You're trying to avoid forum shopping and trying to create a uniform national policy for immigration," said a senior aide to Mr. Specter who spoke on condition of anonymity because details of the legislation were still being negotiated.

But Richard A. Posner, a prominent federal appeals judge in Chicago, said the measures were "not a sound solution."

Even with the three additional judges, Judge Posner said, the annual caseload would surge to 900 per judge from 125.

"I cannot think of an area of law that is more remote from immigration than patents," the judge wrote to Senator Richard J. Durbin, an Illinois Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "No doubt the judges of the federal circuit can become knowledgeable about immigration law, but they will be overwhelmed by the new caseload."

Leonidas Ralph Mecham, secretary for the Judicial Conference of the United States, a group of judges who make policy for the federal courts and who present the judiciary's views to Congress, raised similar concerns.

"No sufficient justification to support changing the status quo and shifting these cases from the regional courts to the Federal Circuit has been provided," Mr. Mecham wrote to Mr. Specter.

The judges also raised concerns about a proposal that would appoint a single judge to decide whether immigration cases were worthy of consideration for appeal. If the judge declined the case, no further review would be available.

Mr. Durbin said he planned to offer an amendment that would kill the measures, telling his colleagues on the Judiciary Committee that it would be premature to make such changes before holding hearings.

But the senior aide to Mr. Specter strongly defended the measure, noting that the Federal Circuit would have fewer cases than many of the federal appeals circuits, even with the additional workload. He also pointed out that most of the Federal Circuit's judges were generalists, not specialists, before they were appointed.

The surge in immigration appeals occurred after Attorney General John Ashcroft made changes in 2002 to streamline appellate review within the immigration courts.

Many appellate judges say those changes essentially shifted work to them. Immigration cases accounted for about 17 percent of all federal appeals cases last year, up from 3 percent in 2001. In New York and California, nearly 40 percent of federal appeals involved immigration.

Critics of the new legislation say that shifting appeals to Washington is misdirected and that a better solution would be to add resources to the overstrapped local immigration courts and to an interim-level immigration appeals court, known as the Board of Immigration Appeals. They said proposed increases in financing were inadequate, leaving immigration judges overburdened and threatening immigrants' rights to federal review.

"Congress needs to address the virtual collapse of the immigration judge and appeals system, not deny immigrants a chance to have their day in federal court," said Lucas Guttentag, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's immigrant rights project.

The American Intellectual Property Law Association, which represents 16,000 lawyers, also objects to the change, saying the caseload increase would hurt the way patent cases are handled.

Guest Worker Programs Have Flawed Past (MINNST/AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - Proponents of a guest worker program to address the chaos of illegal immigration have a hard sell in front of them. Similar programs in the past have been plagued by abuses and have done little to stem the influx of undocumented workers.

By JIM ABRAMS, Associated Press Writer WASHINGTON (AP) - Proponents of a guest worker program to address the chaos of illegal immigration have a hard sell in front of them. Similar programs in the past have been plagued by abuses and have done little to stem the influx of undocumented workers.

"These programs are seductive, and that is what is so troubling to us right now," said Ana Avendano, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO. The labor federation has been critical of guest worker programs in proposed immigration reform legislation that the Senate will debate next week.

President Bush urged Congress two years ago to write new immigration law with a guest worker program that could provide legal status, but not a road to citizenship, for some of the 11 million undocumented immigrants in the country.

The hottest debate in the Senate will be whether to pass some version of a guest worker program proposed by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. The bill by McCain, a contender for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, and Kennedy would provide up to 400,000 visas in the first year and allow participants, after six years, to seek permanent residency.

Their proposal, strongly backed by the business community, would supplement existing temporary worker programs, such as the H-2A program that brings about 45,000 agriculture workers into the country every year, and H-1B visas issued to up to 65,000 high-tech and other skilled foreign workers.

It also would build on a near-century old tradition of turning to foreign unskilled laborers, mainly from Mexico, in response to labor shortages, often during times of war.

"Its historic role has been as a national emergency program," Cornell University economist Vernon Briggs wrote in a 2004 paper. "They are extraordinary policies to be used as a last resort - and then only as temporary measures."

In 1917, during World War I, an agreement was reached with Mexico to let in unskilled workers. During the program's five-year life span, 77,000 Mexicans were admitted but fewer than half returned to Mexico. "The program spawned illegal immigration," Briggs said.

A much larger exchange, the Bracero program, began in 1942, during World War II, and continued in varying forms through 1964. Some 4.6 million Mexicans came to the United States, with a peak of 439,000 in 1959.

The program stipulated that guest workers were to get free housing, medical treatment, transportation and prevailing wages. The reality was often different.

Avendano of the AFL-CIO said workers were underpaid or cheated out of wages, exposed to unsafe conditions, faced racial discrimination and were saddled with debt from recruiters and employers. Workers were unable to exercise their rights because the employer could have them deported. Under such conditions, she said, "Workers would rather be undocumented because they have full mobility."

Others argue that guest worker programs create an underclass of foreign workers and stigmatize some jobs associated with foreign labor.

Kennedy, in a statement, agreed that the existing system hasn't worked because it allows "so much exploitation and abuse of temporary workers and undermines the jobs, wages and working conditions of U.S. workers."

But he said the McCain-Kennedy bill and others like it "will avoid those problems by streamlining the application process for employers and strengthening key protections for the workers."

Major immigration reform enacted in 1986 included language providing eventual permanent resident status to those who could prove they had worked in agriculture the previous year. Nearly 1 million applications were accepted. Critics argued that many used fraudulent documents and that this amnesty rewarded those who entered the country illegally.

In 1995, the U.S. Commission on Immigration, headed by the late Rep. Barbara Jordan, D-Texas, reported to Congress its unanimous conclusion that an agriculture guest worker program "is not in the national interest and ... would be a grievous mistake."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., at recent Senate hearings on the immigration bill, said the recent tide of illegal immigrants raises "the question of whether guest worker programs become magnets for more undocumented populations."

Eliseo Medina, executive vice president of the Service Employees International Union, said his father was a "bracero" so he's "very aware of how these programs can be abused."

Medina said he supports the McCain-Kennedy approach because it gives temporary workers job portability, so they don't have to stay with an employer who mistreats them.

"When you were dependent on that one employer, people couldn't complain," Medina said. "That was my father's experience."

Immigrant Advocates Feel 'sense Of Urgency' About Border Policy (ADS)

By BRADY McCOMBS

Arizona Daily Star, March 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022217

TUCSON, Ariz. -- Immigrant advocates across the country want to make sure nobody misses their message: Don't criminalize illegal entrants.

Groups have ramped up efforts this month by organizing large street rallies, holding press conferences and meeting with state and federal lawmakers.

"There is definitely a sense of urgency," said Geoffrey Boyce, spokesman for No More Deaths. "People are feeling like if our voices are going to be heard, now is the time."

On Thursday, Derechos Humanos and the Unidos en Arizona Coalition organized a press conference at El Tiradito Shrine in Downtown Tucson with three out-of-state legislators who spoke out against proposed immigration legislation.

Friday, a host of groups including Border Action Network and No More Deaths are organized a late-morning rally in Tucson. In Phoenix, organizers are expecting thousands at the rally there. Previous rallies held this month in Chicago; Washington, D.C.; and Trenton, N.J., have drawn thousands.

A week ago, the Coalition to Bring Down the Walls sent a delegation to Washington to meet with federal lawmakers about their concerns.

"I think the biggest advantage is that people are waking up and realizing that if they don't speak up now it will be too late," said Felix Ortiz, a Democratic assemblyman from New York and president of the National Hispanic Caucus of State Legislatures.

Ortiz was one of three members of the caucus who came to Tucson this week to see the border and show their support. Ryan Guillen, a Texas Democrat, and Minnie Gonzalez, a Connecticut Democrat, traveled into Mexico south of Sasabe Thursday to see a staging ground for illegal entrants preparing to enter the United States.

They told about 20 people Thursday that they must stand up against anti-immigrant legislation and demand legislation that respects the dignity and civil rights of illegal entrants. Guillen believes politicians will listen because of the power of the collective voice.

"I think they've woken a sleeping giant, and that's the reason this movement has started," Guillen said.

Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network, said organizers are trying to make sure the rallies take place while the Senate Judiciary Committee is still considering legislation.

The source of the ire from the immigrant advocacy groups is directed at the Border Protection, Anti-Terrorism and Illegal Immigration Control Act, sponsored by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., passed by the House Dec. 16 by a vote of 239-182.

The proposal would create 700 miles of fence on along the border, make living in the country illegally a felony and increase penalties for employers who hire illegal workers.

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

LOS ANGELES, March 24 (AP) — Thousands of people across the country protested Friday against legislation cracking down on illegal immigrants, with demonstrators in cities including Los Angeles, Phoenix and Atlanta staging school walkouts, marches and work stoppages.

Congress is considering bills that would make it a felony to be in the United States illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal immigrants and erect fences along one-third of the border with Mexico. The proposals have angered many Hispanics.

The Los Angeles demonstration led to fights between black and Hispanic students at one high school, but the protests were largely peaceful, the authorities said.

In Phoenix, the police said 20,000 people marched to the office of Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican and the co-sponsor of a bill that would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country. Officials said it was one of the largest protests in the city's history.

Mr. Kyl pointed out that most were speaking out against the House bill making it a felony to be an illegal immigrant, not against his bill, which would also step up border enforcement and create a temporary guest-worker program.

In Georgia, activists said tens of thousands of workers did not show up at their jobs after calls to protest a state bill that would deny state services to adults living in the country illegally. The House passed the bill on Thursday, but it has yet to gain Senate approval.

In Atlanta, about 200 protesters converged on the steps of the State Capitol, some wrapped in Mexican flags and holding signs saying "Don't panic, we're Hispanic" and "We have a dream, too."

Some say the solution to the problem is simple, but having lawmakers and protestors agree on a law that enhances border security, supports economic growth and gives lawful permanent residency for the millions of illegal immigrants in our country is a challenge.

Hundreds of mothers, children, teachers, and construction workers with American and Mexican flags stood on Ina and Oracle in front of Senator John Kyl's Tucson office.

Up in Phoenix, more than 20-thousand marched to Kyl's office.

All voicing their opposition for Bill H.R. 4437 that's headed for the Senate. If passed it makes it a felony for illegal immigrants to live here and penalizes anyone who helps them.

Some protestors believe the Sensenbrenner Bill H.R.4437 is similar to another bill Senator Kyl is trying to pass.

While Kyl is against amnesty, his bill proposes people who are here illegally sign up for a guest worker program and work for 5-years then go back to Mexico and re-apply.

Jim Peterson is running against Kyl in November and says it's time to get practical and produce a bill that's not a fantasy.

Kyl's bill passed in the house and on Monday will be voted on by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

High School Students Leave School To Protest Immigration Legislation (LAT)

By Michelle Keller And Anna Gorman, Times Staff Writers
The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Hundreds take to the streets to call attention to a Republican House bill that activists contend is punitive and tinged with racism.

On the eve of a large rally planned downtown, hundreds of Los Angeles-area high school students staged a walkout Friday to protest proposed federal legislation that calls for building a 700-mile-long wall along the Mexican border and making felons of illegal immigrants.

Disrupting classes at more than half a dozen schools, students marched onto city streets waving Mexican flags and clutching red, white and green balloons as they chanted "Viva Mexico!"

"Without immigrants, this country wouldn't be anything," said freshman Anna Benitez, as she joined about 500 fellow Huntington Park High students outside the school on Firestone Boulevard. "This protest is not about rebellion. We're not criminals. We're in this country to work."

Walkouts also took place at Garfield, Roosevelt and Montebello high schools, while students at South Gate, Bell and San Fernando high schools protested on campus. At Bell, teacher Joan Dooley said hundreds of students climbed the gates when administrators declared a lockdown.

"Those kids had a right to walk out," Dooley said. "When they saw this huge mob … they should have opened the gate."

Outside South East High in South Gate, at least one person was arrested on suspicion of throwing bottles at police officers, but it was unclear if it was a student, said Dan Isaacs, chief operating officer for the Los Angeles Unified School District. For the most part, however, the protests were peaceful, causing a few traffic tie-ups, he said.

In Riverside County, 400 students at two campuses in the Moreno Valley Unified School District held rallies but did not leave school grounds, officials said.

Students said they were protesting what activists see as mostly punitive legislation proposed by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) that the House passed in December.

Sensenbrenner's bill would crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants, penalize those who assist them and step up enforcement along the Mexican border, a move that could include erecting 700 miles of fencing.

The bill would also make it a felony to enter the country illegally. Supporters say tougher controls are needed to secure the country's border and to protect American jobs.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to begin hearings Monday on a possible compromise bill, after several weeks of debate over whether to concentrate solely on enforcement or to also develop a temporary guest worker program. The highly charged issue has divided the Republican-controlled Congress.

"This economy is based on immigrants," said Garfield High School student William Pasillas, 14, who left campus Friday morning to participate in a rally. Pasillas said his parents came from Mexico in the 1970s and now are naturalized citizens. "Why shouldn't other people get that opportunity?"

Other students were protesting what they said was the racism that many immigrants face.

"I'm here to make sure that the Mexicans get their freedom, their rights," said Montebello High School student Jeannette Garcia, 15, who held up a sign that said "Freedom."

DOJ_NMG_0022219

Los Angeles school officials said activists and community groups e-mailed students, urging them to walk out. Several students said they received fliers and heard about the demonstrations from friends.

"We have always condoned freedom of expression on our campuses," said Isaacs, the L.A. Unified official. "We do not condone students leaving campus."

A protest march in downtown Los Angeles is planned for today as part of a "Weekend of Action" against the Sensenbrenner bill and related legislation. A similar demonstration in Phoenix on Friday drew more than 15,000 protesters.

Immigrant rights groups said they were demanding more tolerant and humane laws that would give undocumented workers a chance at becoming citizens.

"We want to send a message to Congress that enough is enough, that we need real reform that gives folks here a path to legal residency and citizenship," said Alvaro Huerta, spokesman for the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. "We don't want this second-class status."

Border Sheriffs Unite For Order (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, March 25, 2006

Officials from Texas to California want U.S. aid to halt drug violence

EL PASO – Border county sheriffs from Texas to California joined forces Friday in an effort to stop the violence along an increasingly chaotic U.S.-Mexico border and pressure the U.S. government to take control of its territory.

Following a two-day closed-door meeting here, sheriffs from California, Arizona and New Mexico pledged to work with their hosts, the 16-member Texas Sheriff Coalition, to stop traffickers and potential terrorists at the border.

"When you squeeze one area, other parts of the border heat up," said Sheriff Larry A. Dever of Cochise County in Bisbee, Ariz., referring to the attention now focused on the Laredo-Nuevo Laredo border region.

"There's a serious problem and it's not just on the border anymore," said Sheriff Dever. "It's now reached the interior of the country, and communities across the nation are beginning to feel the pinch."

Drug-related violence in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, continues unchecked as the Gulf and Sinaloa cartels battle for control of the lucrative route from Nuevo Laredo via Interstate 35 through Texas and Dallas, an important hub for drug distribution, and north to Canada.

This week, authorities discovered three charred bodies in a shallow hole in the city. Last week, four federal police officers were assassinated, and two weeks ago gunmen killed the chief of the state police unit in Nuevo Laredo.

Sheriff Omar Lucio of Cameron County in the Lower Rio Grande Valley welcomed the sheriffs, saying: "In the end, the task of stopping traffickers and terrorists at the border falls on us. We have to stop these criminals before they reach Dallas, or Houston, or New York City."

The newly formed Southwest Border Sheriff's Coalition hopes to flex its political muscle in demanding more resources from Congress for one of the most impoverished regions in the country.

The new group includes all sheriffs' departments within the 24 border counties, from California to Texas.

Specifically, the sheriffs want more money for manpower, equipment and training. Timing is crucial. Congress is debating immigration reform, and one plan calls for earmarking $100 million to help sheriffs with increased resources.

The alliance grew out of concern about the killing of Mexican local, state and federal policemen, the discovery of underground tunnels used for smuggling drugs and what some called routine confrontation with drug smugglers "armed to the teeth," said Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County, which includes Laredo.

"We're outgunned. We're outmanned. And we're outspent," Sheriff Flores said. "That's no way to protect our border and our country. It's shameful."

Most recently, the resignation of Nuevo Laredo Police Chief Omar Pimentel raised concerns among some of the sheriffs who view his departure as a sign that the Mexican government is losing control of the situation.

"He was in a tough situation, and I'm not surprised at all that he resigned," Sheriff Lucio said. "The violence from Nuevo Laredo is not just spilling across the border into Laredo and other Texas cities, but it's also spreading up and down the border, and that's a big concern for all of us here, especially for my county."

But U.S. Rep. Silvestre Reyes, a 26-year law enforcement veteran and former Border Patrol chief, cautioned sheriffs not to make Mexico a punching bag to justify increased funding. Cooperation between the countries, he said, is key.

"Mexico is a friend of ours, and we don't have an antagonistic relationship with them," the El Paso Democrat said. "We also know that the issue of corruption is big, but it doesn't stop at the border. It affects both sides."

In a separate interview, Mr. Reyes added: "What kind of a border do we want with Mexico? Do we want a border fraught with barriers and walls, with deputies armed to the teeth with high-caliber weapons, or do we want a peaceful, tranquil border with a willing partner in Mexico? What's in our long-term interest?"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush And Cheney Go After The Democrats (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, March 25, 2006

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney launched a one-two political punch against Democrats on Friday, saying they are ill-equipped to handle the economic recovery or the war on terror.

Shouldering dismal poll ratings, Bush worked to frame the debate ahead of this year's congressional elections by telling supporters that "the difference is clear" between the two parties on how to sustain the recovery.

"If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat," Bush said. "If you want to keep more of your hard-earned money, vote Republican."

Cheney, speaking at a GOP fundraiser in Orlando, Fla., took on Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid and party chairman Howard Dean by name. He said leading Democrats have demanded a "sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq — the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting."

"With that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence. If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on 'American Idol,'" Cheney said.

The remark drew robust laughter. "I don't know why that's funny," Cheney said at the event for Rep. Ric Keller (news, bio, voting record), R-Fla.

Democrats were quick to counterpunch.

"Under this administration's watch, Iraq has become a training ground and launching pad for international terrorism, North Korea has likely quadrupled its nuclear arsenal, bin Laden remains on the loose, terror attacks across the world are on the rise, and Katrina exposed the staggering gaps in the administration's ability to protect America," said Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley.

Democratic National Committee spokesman Luis Miranda said: "Instead of offering a plan for victory in Iraq, the vice president today again resorted to attacks to try to distract from the Bush administration's commitment to a failed strategy."

Bush and Cheney appeared to be repeating a page from the 2004 presidential campaign.

During a campaign stop then in Des Moines, Iowa, Cheney said a vote for Democrat John Kerry would risk another terror attack. Making the "wrong choice" on Election Day would mean Kerry would follow a pre-Sept. 11 policy of reacting defensively, Cheney said.

Some wary Republicans on the ballot in November have been trying to stay at arm's length from the White House to avoid being tainted by Bush's job approval ratings, in the 30s. But presidents attract crowds and supporters with deep pockets, and Bush remains the nation's most successful fundraiser.

Cheney, whose poll numbers are even lower than Bush's, is not far behind. Both have raised tens of millions of dollars for GOP congressional and gubernatorial candidates running in this year's midterm elections.

Bush spoke at a fundraiser for Rep. Mike Sodrel, raising more than $500,000 to help the freshman Republican beat Democrat Baron Hill. The race is considered a toss-up in the GOP quest to retain control of the House.

He said the Republicans have an economic record to run on, and he urged Congress to make permanent various tax cuts due to expire within a few years. He tried to draw a sharp contrast between the two parties' economic policies.

"In 2001, more than 90 percent of the congressional Democrats voted against cutting income tax rates," Bush said, referring to votes on his initial package of tax cuts.

He told the Republican audience that, by overwhelming margins, Democrats also voted to reject his legislation — which eventually passed — to provide tax relief for married couples, double the child credit and cut taxes on dividends and capital gains.

Later, the president traveled to an affluent Pittsburgh suburb to raise an estimated $700,000 for Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record).

Santorum, trailing Casey in polls, broke with Bush on a plan to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports and has raised concerns about the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. But Santorum met Bush at an airport in Pittsburgh, and the two smiled for cameras.

Democrats are hungry for a victory in Pennsylvania and hope to replace the two-term senator with State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., a Democrat who is against abortion.

"Senator Santorum and President Bush should publicly explain why they've advanced policies that have cost Pennsylvania over 180,000 manufacturing jobs and caused over 700,000 Pennsylvanians to lose their health insurance," said Casey spokesman Larry Smar. "Senator Santorum should work for the people of Pennsylvania and not be a rubber stamp in order to gain campaign cash."

Bush Shows Strategy For Keeping Hill Majorities (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Democrats Assailed On National Security, As Well as the Economy

INDIANAPOLIS, March 24 -- President Bush on Friday provided a preview of his two-front strategy for protecting the Republican congressional majority in an ominous political climate: hammer Democrats on national security and the economy, and raise millions of dollars for embattled GOP candidates such as Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (Ind.).

At a luncheon fundraiser here, Bush repeatedly called Sodrel an indispensable ally in fighting terrorism, and emphasized his support for the military and a robust U.S. foreign policy. Sodrel, he said, "understands this is a nation at war" against terrorists intent on striking America again. It is imperative that voters elect candidates who know that "there is an enemy which hates those of us who embrace freedom and would like to strike us again." He warned the crowd that Democrats will raise taxes and harm the economy if they are elected. "If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat," Bush said.

It was not cheap to hear the president's newest campaign pitch eight months before the midterm elections. Republicans paid $1,000 for the buffet lunch and presidential speech; $10,000 if they wanted a picture snapped at a private reception afterward. For Sodrel, who won by a thinner margin than any other House member in 2004, the $500,000 he expected to raise through the event is much needed to fend off a tough challenger, former Democratic representative Baron Hill. Afterward, Bush flew to Pennsylvania for a nighttime fundraiser that was expected to net half a million dollars for Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), who faces one of the toughest reelection campaigns in the country.

The back-to-back events capped a week that highlighted how a president dogged by sagging poll numbers and an unpopular war plans to help his party and himself. Election analysts say Republicans could lose seats, if not their House and Senate majorities, if the public's gloomy view of Bush, Congress and the direction of the country does not brighten this summer.

A Democratic majority in the House or the Senate would be likely to launch hearings and investigations into the war and other issues, and would be positioned to stop the Bush agenda in the remaining two years of the Bush presidency. "The Democrats' plan for 2006? Take the House and Senate, and impeach the president," Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, warned in a fundraising e-mail sent to party members this week. "With our nation at war, is this the kind of Congress you want?"

Bush is adjusting his approach to befit the environment and is shifting into campaign mode. He realizes, aides say, that he is no longer the political force he was in the days before the 2002 and 2004 elections, when lawmakers lined up for high-profile presidential visits. In fact, some lawmakers in tight races in swing states such as Ohio have passed on chances to appear side by side with Bush at recent events. Santorum, for instance, cited "scheduling conflicts" in skipping a recent Bush speech in his state but has not missed a chance to raise money with the president at private gatherings like the one held Friday night.

Bush remains popular with the Republican base, and he and Vice President Cheney are top fundraising draws. GOP strategists say Bush and Cheney have sent word to Capitol Hill that they would be happy to raise money even for those candidates who, for political reasons, want to put some distance between themselves and the White House.

The short-term goal is stabilize Bush's low public-approval ratings by talking about the progress and prospects for victory in Iraq. The White House also hopes to minimize intramural GOP feuding with a skeletal domestic agenda. Congressional leaders have a legislative schedule that will have members out of Washington much of the time.

With little notice, Cheney has emerged as a central player in this strategy. The vice president has participated in 46 fundraisers since the beginning of 2005, including 25 for House members, according to his office. He took part in five events this week alone, including one that raised $500,000 for Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) Thursday night.

In Florida on Friday, Cheney played host at an event for Rep. Ric Keller (R) and offered a variation of the new White House attack on Democrats that aides said will become a staple of campaign-oriented speeches in the weeks ahead. Attacking figures ranging from Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, Cheney portrayed the entire Democratic leadership as wobbly in the fight against terrorism.

"Leading Democrats have demanded a sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq -- the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting," Cheney said. "And with that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence. If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on 'American Idol.' "

Recent polls show a growing number of Americans questioning the competence of the Bush White House. Since the Hurricane Katrina disaster, Democrats have made the charge of incompetence the centerpiece of their attack on Bush, and many Republicans are worried that it is sticking. "The president and I welcome the debate, because every voter in America needs to know how the leaders of the Democratic Party view the war on terror," Cheney said.

Bush Slams Democrats On Taxes, War (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

SEWICKLEY HEIGHTS, Pa. — President Bush focused on politics Friday, campaigning for two Republicans who face tough reelection challenges and sharply attacking Democrats over their opposition to tax cuts.

Vice President Dick Cheney also was on the campaign trail, headlining a fundraiser in Florida. He used the occasion to question the commitment by leading Democrats to the "the battle against terrorists in Iraq."

Accusing them of having a "sorry record" on that issue, Cheney said Democratic leaders had "decided to run on the theme of competence. If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on 'American Idol.' "

After his crack drew a big laugh, Cheney — with a slight smile on his face — responded, "I don't know why that's funny."

Democrats lashed back.

"Under this administration's watch, Iraq has become a training ground and launching pad for international terrorism, North Korea has likely quadrupled its nuclear arsenal, [Osama] bin Laden remains on the loose, terror attacks across the world are on the rise, and Katrina exposed the staggering gaps in the administration's ability to protect America," said a spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Bush began his day in Indianapolis, helping freshman Rep. Mike Sodrel raise $500,000 for his reelection bid. And he ended it in this tony suburb of Pittsburgh as the star attraction at an event expected to generate more than $1 million for Sen. Rick Santorum's run for a third term.

Bush has raised $88 million at 26 appearances in 2005 and 2006 for the GOP and its candidates, and Cheney has raised nearly $17 million at 47 events, according to Tracey Schmitt, communications director for the Republican National Committee.

Sodrel is facing yet another rematch with former Democratic lawmaker Baron Hill in a House race likely to be among the most competitive in the nation. Hill won a third term when he defeated Sodrel in 2002, but the Republican upended the incumbent in 2004, claiming the seat by fewer than 1,500 votes.

As he has all week, Bush delivered a strong pitch for fighting the war in Iraq.

"The only way that we can lose is if we lose our will," he said. "It's the only way we can lose."

But he also spotlighted domestic issues, blasting Democratic opposition to the tax cuts that have been at the core of his economic program.

"The Democratic Party has a clear record. In 2001, more than 90% of the congressional Democrats voted against cutting income tax rates," he said, referring to votes on the initial legislative package he proposed that year.

"The difference is clear," he went on, his voice rising to a near shout. "If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat. If you want to keep more of your hard-earned money, vote Republican."

The president made no public remarks during his stop for Santorum.

A conservative running behind in Pennsylvania polls, Santorum was waiting to greet Bush as the president descended the steps of Air Force One, which provided a brief photo opportunity. But the fundraising event at a nearby white brick home was closed to news coverage.

The low-key nature of Bush's visit was not surprising. He and his campaign team worked hard to try to carry Pennsylvania in the 2000 and 2004 presidential campaigns, but he lost the state both times.

Now with Bush's approval rating at an all-time low in several national polls, fewer GOP candidates regard a public appearance with the president as a way to capture the backing of swing voters. Instead, the president is relied upon to draw the party faithful — and their contributions.

Democrats view the Pennsylvania race as one of the prime opportunities to gain a Senate seat in November's election.

Santorum's likely opponent is Bob Casey Jr., the state treasurer who party leaders hope can peel away some of Santorum's support because he shares the incumbent's opposition to abortion rights.

Cheney Assails Democrats' `Competence' Against Terror (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, March 24, 2006

March 24 (Bloomberg) -- Vice President Dick Cheney said Democrats have a ``sorry record'' on national security and suggested the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq they have proposed would fulfill the hopes of terrorist leader Osama Bin Laden.

``The leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence,'' Cheney said in Orlando at a fund- raising event for U.S. Representative Ric Keller, a Florida Republican. ``If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on American Idol.''

Cheney was responding to statements by the Democratic National Committee, which has called the Bush administration and its Iraq war plan ``dangerously incompetent.'' U.S. Representative John Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, and some other party lawmakers have called for the U.S. to begin a withdrawal from Iraq.

``Issues of national security will clearly be at the top of the agenda as the mid-term elections near,'' Cheney said. ``The president and I welcome the debate, because every voter in America needs to know how the leaders of the Democratic Party view the war on terror.''

The Bush administration has stepped up defense of its Iraq policy this week as the war enters its fourth year. Five times in the past seven days President George W. Bush has restated his reasoning behind the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, saying toppling Saddam Hussein's regime was an important part of the global war against terrorism.

Turbulence

In Indiana today, Bush said he understood that the ``turbulence on the TV screen affects the conscience of America.'' He maintained that Iraqi troops are improving and that the U.S. won't retreat.

Cheney said in Florida that ``leading Democrats have demanded a sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq -- the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting.''

``With that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence,'' he said.

The U.S. military and their coalition partners in Iraq have battled an insurgency, and there have been 1,821 U.S. military personnel killed in combat since the start of the war, according to a Defense Department tally.

The financial cost of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan has risen to $9.8 billion a month from the $6.8 billion a month the Pentagon said it spent last year, according to a report this month by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll released March 16 showed 51 percent of respondents said the overthrow of Hussein's regime in Iraq hasn't been worth the cost in human and financial terms.

Debate

Opponents of an open-ended engagement in Iraq plan to try to force a debate in the House of Representatives, according to North Carolina Republican Walter B. Jones. Jones said he was ``very surprised'' at Bush's suggestion during a press conference this week that the next U.S. president would have to complete a pullout of troops.

``When you say to the American people and to the Congress, `Well, we've going to be there three more years from now and the next president can deal with it,' that to me, is not leadership,'' Jones said in a telephone interview today.

Jones, Republican Representatives Wayne Gilchrest of Maryland and Ron Paul of Texas, and a number of Democrats plan to seek a vote in the House on April 5 to force Republican leaders to open up a debate on Bush's Iraq policy.

``I do believe than many of my colleagues in the Republican Party are concerned by the fact that there seems to be no end point,'' to the U.S. military action in Iraq, Jones said.

Bush Visit Is Boon For Congressman (INDYSTAR)

'Mike Sodrel understands,' Bush emphasizes at Downtown stop

President Bush called for resolve in Iraq and tax cuts at home during a stop in Indianapolis on Friday to help a Southern Indiana congressman facing a tough re-election race.

ON THE ISSUES

Here's a quick look at what the president had to say in Indianapolis on a variety of issues:

DOJ_NMG_0022224

War against terrorism

"This turbulence on your TV screens affects the conscience of Americans. I know that, and so does the enemy. But amidst all the turmoil, I want you to remember that progress towards democracy is being made."

Tax cuts

"The fundamental question confronting us in Washington is how do we keep this economic recovery going. . . . The first thing is: Make the tax cuts permanent."

Education

"I think it makes sense if you're spending a lot of money to say to the school districts, 'Why don't you show us whether or not a child can read and write?' It seems like a legitimate question to me."

Alternative fuels

"I want people driving with corn extract, ethanol, grown right here in the state of Indiana in order to keep these cars moving."

Mitch Daniels

"I like a fellow who doesn't run a poll to tell him what to think. I like somebody who stands up and does what he thinks is right."

WORKERS NOT HAPPY ABOUT THIS 'HOLIDAY'

The president's visit Friday meant a half-day off without pay for 100 construction workers working on the airport's new terminal.

John Kish, the project director at the airport, said officials were told the construction site had to close at noon as part of the security for Bush's visit. Hourly construction workers did not receive pay for the afternoon because they could not work those hours, he said.

"The folks who were sent home without pay already had a short week with the snowstorm Monday, so they were particularly unhappy about it," Kish said.

With his own popularity at record lows, Bush made his second trip to Indiana in the past month to raise money for a congressional candidate -- this time for U.S. Rep. Mike Sodrel.

The president helped reel in an estimated $500,000 for Sodrel, who is expected to face a November rematch against former Democratic Rep. Baron Hill in Indiana's 9th District.

"I'm here because I strongly believe it's in Indiana's interest to send Mike Sodrel back to the United States Congress," Bush said. "Some of you are from his district, some of you aren't, but all of you are wise enough to know a good candidate when you see one."

Bush spoke for about 30 minutes at the Murat Centre in Downtown Indianapolis. Roughly 75 of the 500 chairs set up for the $1,000 per plate luncheon were empty, many of them in the back corners of the building's Egyptian Room.

"That clearly shows a lack of support for Mike Sodrel," said Indiana Democratic Party Chairman Dan Parker. "He couldn't fill up the room, even though he had the president there."

Campaign officials cautioned against putting too much emphasis on empty chairs. A number of people at the event also paid $10,000 for a picture with the president at a private reception before the speech. In addition, some paying guests couldn't come because of other commitments, and extra chairs are often set up for nonpaying guests.

Sodrel defeated Hill, then a three-term incumbent, in 2004 in one of the tightest congressional races nationwide.

Bush said he needs more "good, honest" men like Sodrel in Congress to help him push his agenda during the final two years of his presidency. Several times Bush laid out his policy positions, punctuated by the phrase "and Mike Sodrel understands that."

Perhaps his most emphatic call came for making permanent the tax cuts passed earlier in his presidency, which will expire in coming years if no action is taken.

"If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat," Bush said.

While the president has visited Indiana twice recently, he has made no appearances in a setting where the general public could see him.

"Bush and (Vice President Dick) Cheney both have been out at a lot of fundraisers," said Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. "It's the one thing they both can still do for their party."

An Indianapolis Star poll two weeks ago showed Bush's approval rating had sunk to 37 percent among Hoosiers. Sabato said his national rating has been similar but added that more than 80 percent of Republicans still support the president.

"Despite his overall unpopularity, the president is still able to raise money for the congressmen who need it," Sabato said.

DOJ_NMG_0022225

Bush raised more than $600,000 in South Bend last month for U.S. Rep. Chris Chocola. Sodrel said the money raised Friday will be key to his campaign. The $500,000 is more than half of the $900,0000 he raised during all of last year. He spent $1.4 million in his 2004 campaign.

"This is a big boost for me, particularly to have it come this early in the election season," Sodrel said after the fundraiser.

Democrats criticized Bush for not traveling to Sodrel's district.

"He had to bring the president to Indianapolis to raise money for him, because it's clear he doesn't want to be seen with the president in his district," the Democrats' Parker said.

Sodrel denied the president is reluctant to partake in public events, saying, "A lot of the president's travel is in the public."

After leaving Indianapolis around 3:30 p.m., Bush flew to Pittsburgh for a fundraiser at a private residence for Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

Bush's popularity isn't sagging with Charlie Bryant, who drove up from Southern Indiana and paid $1,000 to attend the fundraiser.

"It was worth every penny," said Bryant, 63, a retired farm equipment dealer. "It's not every day you see the president of the United States."

Sodrel's campaign said it would pay $40,000 to reimburse the president's travel expenses, since the appearance was purely a political one. The Indianapolis Police Department spent an estimated $19,500 to free up 110 police officers to provide security for Bush's two-hour visit.

Cam Savage, a spokesman for Sodrel's office, said some cities in the past have requested reimbursements for such expenses if they are tied to a political trip from the president. Savage said Indianapolis typically doesn't and hadn't Thursday.

About 250 protesters gathered outside the Murat during the president's visit, including Harold Donle.

The 57-year-old ex-Marine from Greenwood shouted a popular cheer among protesters even though buses shielded them from Bush's arrival.

"Hey, ho, Bush and Cheney got to go! Bring the troops home now!"

Minute-by-minute Account Of Visit (INDYSTAR)

The Indianapolis Star, March 25, 2006

A team of Star reporters filed these accounts during President Bush's visit to Indianapolis.

3:34 P.M. -- President departs and one crewman moves on

If you're an airplane buff, you could spend a long time just staring at Air Force One. Especially at the Indianapolis International Airport, an aircraft of the Boeing 747's size stands out. Indianapolis is an airport served by mostly small "regional jets" and airliners no larger than the Boeing 737, Airbus 319 and DC-9. The largest plane to regularly use the Indianapolis airport is the MD-11 cargo plane that serves the FedEx freight terminal.

For the presidential visit, Bush's support equipment came in on a military C-17, an oversized plane that, with its huge, sloping wings, is an impressive sight -- but that aircraft is dwarfed by Air Force One.

Only a few people get to work on the huge plane, and for one of them the Friday trip was his final journey as a crew member. Air Force officer William Thomas of Maryland has worked in the plane's communications section for 20 years, and is moving on after the Indianapolis trip. His wife and infant daughter were at international arrivals to meet the president. "He was so friendly," Jennifer Thomas said about meeting Bush.

Air buffs might have gotten to see the president's plane in the air when the clouds weren't in the way, but they had little chance to see it on the ground. Only the tail was visible from the road that passes the international arrivals terminal, and that road was closed during the presidential visit.

The end of the presidential trip had the same sort of weather luck as the beginning. When word spread that the motorcade was rolling from Downtown to the airport, a high black cloud was forming to the west where it framed Air Force One. By the time the police motorcycle escort reached the international arrivals ramp, the cloud had moved overhead and was dropping snow on the area.

Bush got out of his limousine, walked up the main steps alone and waved twice, while the rest of the contingent went up the plane's back steps. Air Force One taxied away, reached the runway and took off, disappearing in the clouds and the spray kicked up by its engines. Barely five minutes after the motorcade reached the airport, the plane was loaded and leaving -- around 3:35 p.m., on time.

As soon as the plane moved out of sight, the same people who had worked hard to prepare for the started to undo what they had done. Cables were removed, barriers put away and equipment stored on the Air Force cargo plane.

3:16 P.M. -- Bush talks of tax cuts, Iraq

DOJ_NMG_0022226

Speaking for about 30 minutes, the president offered a folksy defense of his policies and made a hard push for a continued Republican-controlled Congress.

"I saw a threat in Saddam Hussein," he said. "Removing Saddam Hussein has made this nation and this world a safer place."

Bush acknowledged the current public nervousness about the war, but argued, "I'm not going to make up my mind about Iraq based on polls and focus groups."

The speech was little different than numerous others Bush has given. He pushed for tax cuts and Social Security reform.

He said members of Congress like Sodrel, "understand this is a nation at war," that needs to remain focused on national security. He spoke of enemies who have "an ideology of hatred" that can only be defeated "with a philosophy of light."

The room included many of the state's top Republican names, such as Gov. Mitch Daniels, but there were also dozens of empty seats.

-- Matt Tully

2:26 P.M. -- Hey, isn't that ...

No, it wasn't Richard Nixon, but many people did a double take on John Ancelep, 23, who works for a landscaping firm in downtown Indianapolis.

Clocking out a little early today, Ancelep - in a gray suit and tie - walked around the Murat with a first-class mask of Nixon.

He was hoping President Bush would see him - poised to give him the classic Nixon salute.

Two hands up, two fingers extended, "I am not a crook" - as a way of poining out what he calls a parallel between Bush and Nixon: "An unpopular president and an unpopular war," he said.

Ancelep said he got the mask last year for Halloween.

By now, he is one no more than a dozen people remaining outside the Murat. Most people took down their signs, rolled up their flags and left the area once Bush entered the Murat.

-- Rob Schneider

1:51 P.M. -- Motorcade arrives at Murat

President Bush has arrived in downtown Indianapolis.

The presidential motorcade pulled into New Jersey Street entrance to the Murat, zipping by protesters in the process.

Demonstrators rushed toward the intersection of Michigan and Alabama holding up signs. But Bush likely did not get much of a glimpse.

-- Rob Schneider

1:44 P.M. -- Air Force One lands

When Air Force One landed at Indianapolis International Airport at 1:22 p.m., light rain began to fall from the cloudy skies and by the time Bush's entourage had left the airport for the Murat downtown, the motorcade was wet from what had turned into a steady rainfall.

It was the exact opposite of a 1988 arrival, when the current president's father appeared with Dan Quayle at a campaign rally in Huntington, Ind. On that day, a rainy morning, the skies cleared and the sun came out just as the candidates emerged from the Huntington courthouse.

Today, the weather did not discourage Marvin Bardo of the Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, who was part of the welcoming party and briefly got to meet the President.

"It was pretty cool. He talked to me. He said thanks for volunteering," said Bardo of his momentary time with Bush.

Watching the presidential arrival gave an impression of how tightly organized the arrival business can be on Air Force One.

The first people to emerge from the Boeing 747 using a rear staircase were military assistants and the Washington D.C. press corps. Some of them had gathered next to one of the airplane's engines by the time the President emerged from a front door and came down one of the outside staircases at the airport.

After a brief meeting with Bardo and several others outside the plane, the president waved once again to the group watching, mostly reporters and photographers behind a steel barrier, got into a custom Cadillac limousine, and drove away.

Prominent at the end of the motorcade - and a reminder of how seriously this exercise is taken - was a Wishard Hospital advance life support medic ambulance.

-- Kevin O'Neal

1:37 P.M. -- Conrbread protest falters

They wanted to serve beans and cornbread - a cheap meal compared to the big-buck buffet inside the Murat - but a coalition of groups focused on hunger issues and economic justice - could not get a health permit in time for today's protest.

So instead, they're handing out cans of beans and boxes of cornbread.

Meanwhile, about 250 people had lined the curbs along Alabama Street in front of the Murat, where a marquee was perhaps a little more welcoming than those chanting and holding signs.

The signs were varied:

"War is not the answer"

"$10,000: Lunch with Bush; Standing up for justice: priceless"

"Guilty of war crimes"

"Impeach bush"

Also, a large Hispanic group chanting slogans in Spanish protesting federal legislation making criminals out of people who assist undocumented workers - including social workers and churches.

-- Rob Schneider

1:06 P.M. -- Republicans nibble on appetizers, rhetoric

Inside the Murat, about 500 people are expected to turn out, according to organizers, a number that is expected to raise roughly $500,000 U.S. Rep. Mike Sodrel's reelection campaign.

The Republicans dined on fried appetizers and listened to red-meat speeches prior to Bush's arrival.

"You want to know what Baron Hill's supporters look like? said US Rep. Steve Buyer. "They are right across the street."

He was referring to protesters lined up to jeer the president, including a group of veterans who are against the war in Iraq.

The crowd so far includes several members of Gov. Mitch Daniels' administration, former Indianapolis Mayor Stephen Goldsmith and many Republican members of Congress and the Indiana General Assembly.

-- Matt Tully

12:45 P.M. -- Bush shielded from demonstrators

Protesters on both sides of the Bush fence stood shoulder to shoulder in front of the Chatterbox Tavern in the 400 block of Mass. Ave., just a block away from the Murat.

On one side was the Veterans For Peace, Indiana Chapter 49.

On the other, the College Republicans from Indiana University in Bloomington.

The veterans were holding American flags and their own black and white flag with an image of a dove. The young Republicans were holding Bush-Cheney signs from the presidential campaign.

Tara Virgil, an IU sophomore from Newberry, Ind., hoisted one sign up high, even though she had little hope that Bush would be able to see it as he rode the caravan to the Murat.

"We just wanted to show our support in general," said Virgil. "We support what he is doing for our country."

Meanwhile, 57-year-old ex-Marine Harold Donle of Greenwood was joining his fellow protesters with this chant: "Hey hey ho, Bush and Cheney got to go. Bring the troops home now."

A line of IndyGo buses filled the intersection of Mass. and Michigan, making it virtually impossible for anyone on the other side to see what was going on.

Donle was asked if he planned to do some marching today.

"Hell no, I've got diabetes. I am not going to march anywhere," he replied.

Donle added that he was sorry to see the buses lined up, indicating to him that Bush does not want to see anything unpleasant.

"We've got no business being in Iraq. He lied to get us into the war."

-- Rob Schneider

12:44 P.M. -- Hoping for more volunteers

With about 40 minutes before the president's arrival, the International Arrivals terminal has gotten busy. More reporters and guests have shown up, and the weather has improved - the morning's steady snow and drizzle has ended, although it's still cold and breezy.

While police milled around the International Arrivals ramp, drivers lined up the vans for the motorcade downtown and TV reporters got ready for the president's arrival, Marvin Bardo stood and watched the flurry of activity. "I think it's really exciting to see the cameras and the Secret Service and to see everyone running around like they're important," said Bardo, one of the leaders of the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity in Indianapolis. The organization, which was active with a Black History Month information fair and a prostate cancer information program in February, drew the attention of the White House, and the president planned to meet Bardo when he made his trip to Indianapolis. Bardo didn't learn until Monday about the meeting.

He still doesn't know how he came to the White House's attention.

While Bardo's honored to have the chance to meet President Bush, he also hoping to use the event to attract more volunteers to work with the fraternity's programs. "You never have enough volunteers," he said, adding that people who want to help can check the fraternity's web site at http://www.indykappa.com/.

-- Kevin O'Neal

12:39 P.M. -- Motorcade drivers ready to roll

The guys behind the wheels of the Presidential motorcade got their official White House pins a few moments ago and promptly stuck them into their outfits, branding themselves as the official navigators of Bush's visit to Indianapolis.

There are seven drivers in all gathered at the airport along with a large contingent of media from local newspapers, radio stations and television stations. U.S. Rep. Mike Sodrel is busy working the media with interviews.

-- Bill Ruthhart

12:13 P.M. -- VIPs begin to arrive

Not only reporters are being kept at the international arrivals terminal in a medium-sized room, filled mostly with an X-ray machine and metal detector.

Marvin Bardo, the community volunteer who's due to get some attention from the president, is an early arrival at Indianapolis International Airport. Also on hand is Rep. Mike Sodrel, R-Ind., and a small entourage

"It's pretty hectic when you get an event like this," Sodrel said on his arrival. "People say it will be a tight race. I ran for Congress twice; both of them were tight races, and I don't think this will be any different."

Sodrel said he hopes to raise $500,000 - as much as a quarter of his campaign budget - from President Bush's visit.

Also there's Christi Boze, her husband and granddaughter, a three-decade GOP precinct committee leader in Anderson, who managed to work her connections and attend the arrival. Boze said she's met every president since Kennedy except Clinton and the second Bush.

On politics in Anderson, often controlled by Democrats, Boze said "For Republicans, politics is a hobby. For Democrats, politics is a profession."

The color scheme of this day is gray. The walls of the International Arrivals terminal are gray, matching the color of the rainy sky outside. The only sign of color for those waiting for the president is the yellow paint on the camera platform that will be used when Bush arrives in Indianapolis. The platform is visible from the holding room where reporters are waiting for the start of the trip. Already, that group has gone through the procedure of setting equipment bags on the floor and having one of the military police dogs sniff them for anything risky.

Other than the airliners outside in the murky gray, the only movement comes from plainclothes men in dark coats and suits, radio attachments inserted in one ear.

10:16 A.M. -- Snowflakes greet advance team

The National Weather Service got the forecast right. There are snow showers falling at the Indianapolis International Airport, creating a cold, non-glamorous atmosphere as the advance crew gathers for the arrival of President Bush.

The international arrivals terminal that the president will use looks at first as if it's a staging area for this week's winter storm. Some of the airport snowplows that were hard at work keeping runways clear are lined up along a fence outside the terminal. Those big, heavy trucks are clearly forming an additional barrier between the terminal's parking lot and the ramp where the president's plane will arrive. Already parked on that ramp is a big four-engine Air Force transport plane.

A collection of police is gathering in the parking lot, including a couple of military police from Midwest bases and their search dogs. They'll be used to check the terminal before the president arrives. One of those officers joked that the weather turned bad the last time Bush made a trip to the Midwest.

This chilly morning is far different than other times at this isolated terminal, when sports fans have gathered to greet the Pacers and Colts after big playoff victories on the road. And it's different than Bush's 2000 campaign trip to Indianapolis, where he arrived in a private jet, stopped at the smaller Raytheon hangar, and caught a ride down from then-mayor Steve Goldsmith.

Bush Visits Pittsburgh For Santorum Fund-raiser (PPG)

Cheney Goes On Attack In Orlando After Dems Blast Bush (ORS/AP)

By Travis Reed, Associated Press

The Orlando Sentinel, March 25, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney blasted Democrats for opposing provisions of the Patriot Act and criticizing President Bush's approval of secret wiretaps for domestic surveillance at a fundraising lunch Friday.

Two days after Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called Bush "dangerously incompetent," Cheney said if Democrats were capable of handling the war on terror, "Then I ought to be singing on American Idol."

"The president and I welcome the debate, because every voter in America needs to know how the leaders of the Democratic party view the war on terror," he said at the event for U.S. Rep. Ric Keller, R-Orlando.

Reid had said the United States was failing military and economically in Iraq, and questioned why Bush was campaigning for Republicans instead of meeting with leaders in the Middle East.

Cheney defended the wiretaps, which he said the president has reauthorized more than 30 times since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, as "essential to the security of the United States."

"Instead of acknowledging the urgent need to track enemy communications in a time of war, some Democrats in Congress have decided that the president is the enemy, and that the terrorist surveillance program is grounds for censuring the president," Cheney said. "This outrageous proposition that we ought to protect the al-Qaida ability to communicate as they plot against America poses a key test for Democratic leaders. Do they support the extreme, counterproductive antics of a few, or do they support a lawful program vital to the security of this nation?"

The Orlando speech was one of several around the nation for Cheney, who along with Bush continues to rake in millions at campaign stops despite low approval ratings. Cheney was also scheduled to visit Jacksonville Friday before leaving Florida.

The 200-person event raised $225,000 for Keller, who faces two challengers for his central Florida seat.

Some candidates in targeted districts have sought to distance themselves from the administration, but Keller appeared onstage with Cheney.

In brief remarks before introducing Cheney, Keller said he told the vice president he opposed the abandoned Dubai-owned DP World bid to run terminals at some U.S. ports and an administration plan to sell nearly 1,000 acres of the Florida's Ocala National Forest.

"The vice president replied, 'Now don't be too hasty. Let's go hunting and we'll talk about it,'" Keller joked.

At a news conference before the speech, Democratic challenger Charlie Stuart criticized Keller for increasing the national debt and voting against veterans' benefits. Stuart's campaign has raised about $360,000, just a shade more than Keller netted from Cheney's visit alone.

However, the former office furniture executive and current business consultant, author and speaker said he welcomed the attention from Washington.

"I'm thrilled that they see such a challenge that they have to bring in the vice president this close to the campaign," he said, adding that he'd be appearing Sunday with former U.S. senator and Florida governor Bob Graham.

Keller's other Democratic challenger, Orange County Commissioner Homer Hartage, declined to comment Friday.

Cheney Stumps For Keller Campaign (ORS)

By David Damron

The Orlando Sentinel, March 25, 2006

The vice president defends the Bush tax cuts and helps Keller raise cash.

Vice President Dick Cheney touted a robust economy and defended the Bush administration's tax cuts and handling of the Iraq war to an Orlando crowd of fundraisers for U.S. Rep. Ric Keller on Friday.

Cheney said the country's low unemployment rate is in peril without locking in tax cuts that Keller, R-Orlando, helped President Bush pass.

"If we do nothing, Americans would face a massive tax increase," Cheney said. "Congress needs to make the Bush tax cuts permanent."

The Keller event raised $250,000 for a re-election campaign that now has $1.2 million. Keller faces a possible primary foe in Republican Elizabeth Doran. Democrats Charlie Stuart and Orange County Commissioner Homer Hartage also have announced to run.

Keller waved off the Bush administration's low approval ratings in the polls and said Cheney's visit was not an indication that he was worried about his re-election chances.

But Keller said he used his private time with Cheney to not only discuss national security, but also political differences.

"I believe the vice president is the most effective vice president in the history of our country," Keller said. "But he realizes that I've opposed this administration on the ports deal, on the potential sale of part of the Ocala National Forest, and on the administration's attempt to get rid of the Perkins student-loan program."

The takeover of major U.S. ocean ports by a Middle East company touched off a political uproar when Bush approved of the deal. The Dubai-owned company later offered to transfer fully its U.S. operations to an unspecified American company.

Perkins loans are low-interest advances awarded to lower-income students based on need.

Restaurant owner Eric Holm liked Cheney's focus on preserving tax cuts and was reassured that national security is top priority. "Bottom line: We are secure," said Holm, 50.

Ashley Ansara, president of a Lake Mary financial holding company, said he hoped to hear more about controlling the deficit and pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq. "The civil war there has already set in."

A few protesters outside the Orlando Marriott Downtown event urged passers-by to "Drive Out the Bush Regime."

"I've just gotten tired of one scandal after another," said student Thomas Hellinger, 22. "There's a need for boots on the street."

Keller and Cheney both quipped about the vice president's recent shooting of a hunting companion. After sharing his political quarrels, Keller joked that Cheney responded, " 'Let's go hunting and we'll talk about it.' "

Cheney Gives Keller A Boost (FLTODAY)

By Patrick Peterson

Florida Today, March 25, 2006

ORLANDO - Vice President Dick Cheney raised $250,000 Friday at a fundraiser at the Downtown Marriott for 8th District Congressman Ric Keller.

From 200 lunch guests, Keller raised a quarter-million dollars, charging $500 for lunch, $1,000 for a photo session and received donations of up to $7,500, said a spokesman.

Cheney has raised $1.6 million this year at 11 other events, according to a report by The Associated Press.

Like Cheney, Keller has his supporters.

Republican restaurateur Eric Holm stands by Keller for sponsoring a bill that makes overeaters responsible for their weight gain.

"It made it difficult to sue us," said Holm, who owns 36 restaurants that specialize in beef.

"Ric Keller eats with us," added Holm, who attended with his wife, Diane. "I think he's a great congressman."

After a joke about shooting a Texas lawyer during a quail-hunting trip, Cheney read a speech that contained all the familiar positions and touchstones.

The economy is good. The Bush tax cuts should be permanent. Judicial restraint is ensconced in the U.S. Supreme Court. There will be no timeline for troop withdrawals.

And Iraqis are making progress, despite scores of civilian deaths daily, an elected government that cannot function and falling public support in the U.S.

"There's still hard work ahead in the war on terror," said Cheney, who added that progress has been "steady."

"We have no fear of the future because we intend to shape it," said Cheney, who wears the same brand of heart monitoring device as Keller.

Despite lagging poll numbers, President Bush and Cheney remain popular with their core supporters.

Even on the thorniest issues, Republicans remain staunch.

"I think we're doing the right thing in Iraq," said Khaled Akkawi, an Orlando shooting range owner who graduated from high school with Keller. "Sometimes, doing the right thing isn't popular."

Not every Republican at the Downtown Marriott was a supporter.

"I've been disappointed in two or three things," said Atlanta health care executive Joe Malloy, in town on business with his wife, Janet.

The Malloys waited in the lobby for a glimpse of Cheney, but did not attend the luncheon. They have given money to the Republican party, but intend to withhold financial support for a while.

The Malloys are not ready to abandon the GOP, however.

"I don't think (the Democrats) have a plan," Janet Malloy said.

Meanwhile, four protesters stood on a curb outside the Marriott, holding homemade banners.

"Can you believe what (the Republicans) are doing now?" said Miami Democrat Bob Kunst, referring to a proposed deal that would give a Hong Kong company control of some port security.

While Cheney spoke in the luxury hotel, Kunst campaigned on the street with a poster for New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, who has yet to declare that she will run for president in 2008.

"I've gotten a pretty good reaction," said Kunst, who said he has attended 120 demonstrations. "We could turn this thing around."

Bush, On The Road, Adds To G.O.P. War Chest (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

INDIANAPOLIS, March 24 — President Bush took to the campaign trail Friday, raising $1.2 million for two of his party's most vulnerable incumbents: Representative Mike Sodrel of Indiana and Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

At a $1,000-a-plate luncheon in a downtown auditorium here, Mr. Bush delivered a 30-minute speech centered largely on a defense of the war in Iraq, and then exhorted the crowd of 500 to re-elect Mr. Sodrel, a freshman locked in a tight race against Baron Hill, a former Democratic congressman whom he unseated in 2004.

Later, Mr. Bush flew to Pennsylvania to join Mr. Santorum, who is facing a difficult race against the Democratic challenger, Robert P. Casey Jr., the state treasurer and son of a popular former governor.

The Santorum event, a dinner at a residence in the Pittsburgh suburb of Sewickley Heights, was closed to the press. That was standard procedure for the Bush White House when a fund-raiser is held at a private home, but an excuse for Democrats to make a case that growing numbers of Republicans no longer want to be seen in public with a president bedeviled by political woes.

Yet when Mr. Bush arrived at the Pittsburgh airport on Friday, Mr. Santorum was the first to greet him, and the president spun the senator so that he faced the press pool for photos of the two of them, according to the pool report.

Further, whatever Mr. Bush's poll ratings in a year when his party is running hard to retain its majorities in both houses of Congress, Republicans in trouble embrace him and Vice President Dick Cheney for their ability to raise money. The president has raised more than $12.5 million for Republicans this year, the Republican National Committee says, and Mr. Cheney more than $1.5 million.

The fund-raiser for Mr. Sodrel was Mr. Bush's fourth for a House member facing re-election in 2006, and Mr. Cheney has held about two dozen House events in recent months, said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"The president and vice president are the best fund-raisers we have," said Mr. Forti, adding that the visits brought good local press for candidates. "They're on the front page of the paper the day before they come, the front page of the paper the day they're there and the front page the day after. It's great exposure."

Indeed, Mr. Sodrel was beaming Friday as he stood alongside Mr. Bush for the traditional grip-and-grin campaign photograph. His organization hoped to bring in $500,000 from the event.

But Mr. Bush's last fund-raising trip to Indiana, for Representative Chris Chocola, proved costly for the incumbent. The presidential visit generated critical news accounts about the security expense to taxpayers, and Mr. Chocola wound up promising to reimburse two Indiana communities, South Bend and Mishawaka, a total of $12,000.

And some Republicans, especially in swing states, do appear to be avoiding Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney.

On Monday, for instance, Thomas H. Kean Jr., a Republican running for the Senate from New Jersey, took an uncommon route to a fund-raiser on his behalf featuring Mr. Cheney; Mr. Kean, who is challenging Senator Robert Menendez, became trapped in bumper-to-bumper traffic and did not arrive until after the vice president had left, prompting questions about whether he was practicing the politics of avoidance.

The same day, Senator Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican in a tough race, skipped an appearance by Mr. Bush in Cleveland. His campaign spokesman, Brian Seitchik, said Friday that the senator had been in Florida with his father, who is recuperating from surgery.

That was not the only Bush trip Mr. DeWine has missed. When the president appeared in Dublin, Ohio, in February to talk about health care, Mr. DeWine was back in Washington, running a subcommittee hearing. And when Mr. Bush traveled to Ohio to raise money for Mr. DeWine, the senator did not welcome him at the airport. "He wanted to greet his guests, the attendees, personally," Mr. Seitchik explained.

Candidates Cool To Bush, But Not His Money (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, March 25, 2006

Many worried Republicans on the ballot in November have been pushing away from the White House, not wanting to be dragged under by President Bush's sinking approval ratings and growing anxiety over Iraq.

That doesn't mean they're fleeing his cash offerings, however.

Despite approval ratings in the mid-to-upper 30s, Bush remains the nation's most successful fundraiser. Vice President Dick Cheney, whose poll numbers are even lower than Bush's, is not far behind. Both have raised tens of millions of dollars for GOP congressional and gubernatorial candidates running in this year's midterm elections.

Even as some Republicans are becoming increasingly defiant on a range of issues, they're still lining up dutifully for the president's campaign dollars.

"I would be shocked if a legitimate Republican candidate, not just a fringe candidate, who got word that the president was coming to do a fundraiser said, `No, don't come to my district,'" said GOP consultant Rich Galen.

That said, Republican candidates don't want to be forced off message by such a visit and "have to spend the next two or three days talking about the president's policies ... or what happened yesterday in Ramadi (Iraq)," Galen said.

It has resulted in some fancy GOP footwork as candidates in tight races step away from Bush and Cheney on divisive issues but dance toward them when the subject is money.

Bush presided over a fundraiser Friday for Rep. Mike Sodrel of Indiana at The Murat Centre in Indianapolis, calling Sodrel "a strong supporter of the United States military" and citing "troubled times."

Another one was scheduled for later Friday for Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., at a private residence in the Pittsburgh area.

He's doing another fundraiser at a Washington hotel on Monday for Sen. Conrad Burns (news, bio, voting record), R-Mont., where $1,000 will get you in the door, and $10,000 in combined contributions from others will get you a "photo opportunity with the president," according to an invitation.

Bush and Santorum, the Senate's No. 3 Republican, are not scheduled to appear together publicly on Friday. Santorum, trailing Democrat Bob Casey in polls, broke with Bush on a plan to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports and has raised concerns about the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq.

When Bush went to Cleveland earlier in the week to make a major speech on Iraq, there was a noticeable absence of top Ohio Republicans, including Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record), who is locked in a tight re-election race.

Cheney went to Newark, N.J., earlier in the week to help raise $400,000 for New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. But Kean showed up 15 minutes after Cheney left. Kean said he got stuck in traffic, a claim critics questioned based on the route he took.

Michael Steele, the GOP Senate candidate in Maryland, skipped Bush's speech at the U.S. Naval Academy in November, but joined the president later at a $500,000 fundraiser.

At a local GOP gathering in Nevada last weekend, Republican Sen. John Ensign (news, bio, voting record) tied himself to Ronald Reagan rather than Bush, saying spending under the Bush administration "has upset me."

Rep. Jon Porter (news, bio, voting record), R-Nev., who also attended the gathering, told reporters: "I believe the president has his agenda, his focus. I have mine. I will always run on mine."

Worries over the Iraq war are weighing down all Republicans and causing strains between Bush and his congressional allies. "The big issue is now the war," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

In a White House news conference earlier this week, Bush acknowledged the war was dominating the nation's attention. "So there's a certain unease as you head into an election year. I understand that," he said.

A president is typically his party's fundraiser-in-chief, and Bush has embraced the role like no other, besting even the reception-loving Bill Clinton in total dollars collected. Bush headlined events that raised more than $140 million for Republican Party committees and candidates in each of the 2002 and 2004 election cycles.

In 2005, Bush held 20 fundraising events, raising $75.5 million, while Cheney held 36 events that brought in $15 million. So far this year, Bush has held six events raising $12.5 million, and Cheney has held 11 events that raised $1.6 million, according to a GOP tabulation.

"The Republicans want to make withdrawals from the White House ATM. But at the same time, they don't want to be photographed or be seen being anywhere near the White House at this time," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But Brian Nick, spokesman of the counterpart National Republican Senatorial Committee, said the large sums of money that Bush and Cheney are able to attract are "indicative of what both the president and the vice president have been willing to do since their election. ... It shows the dedication to keeping the majority."

Polls show Bush and Cheney remain enormously popular with the GOP base and conservatives. An AP-Ipsos poll earlier this month showed Bush holding a 74 percent approval rating among Republicans, compared with 37 percent overall.

"He enjoys very strong support there. His problem is with swing voters," said Rutgers political scientist Ross Baker.

It is in states like New Jersey and Ohio, where swing voters have the most clout, that the races are the tightest, and where Democrats are working hard to tie Republican candidates to Bush administration policies.

Democrats, for instance, had some fun with Kean missing Cheney at the New Jersey fundraiser, pointing to news accounts that he had taken traffic-clogged Route 1 — at rush hour — rather than driving on the less-congested New Jersey Turnpike. "We made the photo that Tom Kean Jr. feared," said a Democratic news release with a computer-generated picture of Kean and Cheney standing side by side.

For his part, Cheney seemed to take Kean's absence in stride. "I do some of my best work when I'm without a candidate," he quipped at the fundraiser.

A New Poll: The Democrats By 9 Points (TIME)

Time, March 24, 2006

TIME's survey shows unhappiness with the GOP in Congress, but can the Democrats translate that into a power shift?

TIME's latest poll finds American voters heading into November's election dissatisfied with the Republican-dominated status quo, but not necessarily convinced that the answer lies in voting Democratic. The poll, conducted March 22-23, finds Americans unhappy with the performance of the Republican-controlled Congress — 39% approve, versus 49% who disapprove — and gives Democrats a 9-point lead when voters are asked to state which party's candidate they would choose for a House of Representatives seat (50% answered Democrat, 41% chose Republican). Voters favor Democratic control of Congress by 49% compared with 38% for Republican control.

But voter unhappiness over the Republican-controlled Congress and White House has not yet translated into a groundswell of support for the Democrats. Right now, the approval rating for Congressional Democrats is no higher (39%) than that of Republicans, and 56% of voters don't believe the Democrats offer a clear set of alternative policies. Nor will President Bush's dismal 39% approval rating necessarily drag down his party: almost half of voters (44%) were indifferent to whether their preferred Congressional candidate supports or opposes Bush.

Although the Democrats have a 14-point edge on the issue of dealing with corruption, one in three voters — including almost half of independents — says neither party has much to crow about on this issue. And one strong sign that a political earthquake is unlikely in November: almost two out of three respondents (63%) approved of the job their own congressional representative is doing.

At this stage, then, the Democrats' 9-point advantage in party preference may not be a reliable indicator of a shift in control of the House of Representatives. Democrats almost always trump Republicans on the generic party preference question in pre-election polling, but the voting day outcomes are often shaped by turnout. Indeed, the equivalent question in a spring 1994 Gallup survey gave the Democrats a 6-point lead — and that was the year of the Republican Revolution, in which Newt Gingrich's troops, armed with their Contract with America, gained control of both chambers of Congress.

Gingrich's Contract was a voter-friendly manifesto that tied together Republican advantages on themes as disparate as congressional ethics and tax policy into a manifesto for an electoral landslide. The Democrats may envy the former House Speaker's success in creating a winning narrative, given the large advantage they enjoy on issues such as rebuilding after Hurricane Katrina, protecting Americans' rights, standing up to special interests and corruption, managing government spending and tax policy. Still, the Republicans retain an 11-point edge over the Democrats on the question of dealing with terrorism, while voters are evenly split on the question of which party would better handle the war in Iraq — issues that were key to the Republicans' success in the last two elections.

Mr. Fix-It (NSWK)

Newsweek, March 24, 2006

Republicans hope that James Baker's involvement in the new Iraq Study Group will help them forge a path out of the war-torn country.

President Bush was trying to show resolve, but instead it looked like he was trying to pass the buck when he said the decision on when to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq would be made by a future U.S. president and Iraqi government.

Handing off responsibility is a hallmark of Bush's leadership. He doesn't want to go down in history as the president who lost Iraq, so he'll hang tough and leave the day of reckoning to his successor. Stating publicly and proudly that there is no end in sight for the U.S. mission in Iraq feeds Bush's delusion that his determination—along with his low poll numbers—will be vindicated at some future date.

Bush has his eye on his legacy, but House Republicans have a more immediate concern—and that is how to save their jobs come November. "Stay the course" is not a popular slogan on the campaign trail. That's why a new Iraq Study Group commissioned by Congress and co-chaired by former cabinet member James A. Baker III, the Bush family Mr. Fix-It, is seen by many Republicans as their best hope to forge a path out of the hell that Iraq has become. It was Baker—the secretary of State in the first Bush administration—who parachuted into Florida after the disputed 2000 vote and executed the legal strategy that made Bush president. Now it's Baker's cunning and diplomatic deftness that Republicans hope will extricate them from Iraq, or at least give them some new talking points in the run-up to the election.

The commission was the inspiration of Virginia Republican Rep. Frank Wolf, a thoughtful moderate with genuine concerns about his party's policies in Iraq. He also has an important seat on the House Appropriations Committee, which decides the State Department's budget, so when it comes to diplomacy, he has a captive audience. Wolf has been calling for a fresh look at Iraq since at least last fall, and his main criterion for choosing the commission's 11 bipartisan members was that they bring a wow factor, that their very names would command attention. Co-chairing with Baker is the Democrats' Mr. Integrity, former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, who is fresh from co-chairing the 9/11 commission. Among the other luminaries are former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani and the Clinton's confidant—superlawyer Vernon Jordan. "They're going to go everywhere and look at this thing and come up with something, and the president will pay attention," vows a foreign-policy specialist who helped shape the idea.

The prospect of getting bailed out by his daddy's buddy must rankle Bush, but he needs a new approach. He can't keep asserting, as he did this week, that we're at war and he's got a plan for victory. Baker has an enviable track record in the diplomatic and political arenas, but he didn't do handstands when he got called to serve. "It's like being called over to the White House when you're 25 points behind and you're made chief of staff," says a former colleague. "The odds are against finding a solution." Still, if anybody can find a light to lead U.S. forces out of the current morass, it's Baker. There is a high degree of confidence in his abilities on both sides of the aisle. "He has the interest; he has the clout, and he'll make the time," says the foreign-policy adviser who worked with Baker in the former Bush administration.

Among Baker's admirers is former ambassador Joseph Wilson, who recalls the secretary of State's heroic efforts in putting together the coalition for the first gulf war. Wilson prefers to talk about the way ahead in Iraq rather than the still unresolved case of who leaked the identity of his wife, Valerie Plame, as a CIA operative. He told NEWSWEEK that a debate based on setting a timetable and exit strategies is "all wrong." Though Wilson gained notoriety as a critic of the Bush administration over its WMD claims, he stands with the president in believing U.S. troops cannot leave Iraq until there is a political solution. Wilson proposes what he calls a "concert of nations" that would bring together all the various factions and their patrons in the region, which means having the Iranians at the table along with the Saudis, Jordanians, Egyptians, Russians, some of the Europeans and the Turks. "If they're not there to hammer out a political solution, you can be darned sure they'll be there supporting their various factions as we go through cycle after cycle of instability, insurrection and civil war," he says.

They don't call it a "concert of nations" at the White House or at Baker's shop, but a similar proposal for a major diplomatic push is making the rounds. It would test U.S. leadership and force the administration to reach out to friends as well as foes. The one card Bush has left to play in November is that he's not backing down. Implicit in that statement is that the Democrats will. Whether the voters still buy the tough talk is another matter.

Near Paul Revere Country, Anti-Bush Cries Get Louder (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

HOLYOKE, Mass. -- To drive through the mill towns and curling country roads here is to journey into New England's impeachment belt. Three of this state's 10 House members have called for the investigation and possible impeachment of President Bush.

Thirty miles north, residents in four Vermont villages voted earlier this month at annual town meetings to buy more rock salt, approve school budgets, and impeach the president for lying about Iraq having weapons of mass destruction and for sanctioning torture.

Window cleaner Ira Clemons put down his squeegee in the lobby of a city mall and stroked his goatee as he considered the question: Would you support your congressman's call to impeach Bush? His smile grew until it looked like a three-quarters moon.

"Why not? The man's been lying from Jump Street on the war in Iraq," Clemons said. "Bush says there were weapons of mass destruction, but there wasn't. Says we had enough soldiers, but we didn't. Says it's not a civil war -- but it is." He added: "I was really upset about 9/11 -- so don't lie to me."

It would be a considerable overstatement to say the fledgling impeachment movement threatens to topple a presidency -- there are just 33 House co-sponsors of a motion by Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) to investigate and perhaps impeach Bush, and a large majority of elected Democrats think it is a bad idea. But talk bubbles up in many corners of the nation, and on the Internet, where several Web sites have led the charge, giving liberals an outlet for anger that has been years in the making.

"The value of a powerful idea, like impeachment of the president for criminal acts, is that it has a long shelf life and opens a debate," said Bill Goodman of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents Guantanamo Bay detainees.

The San Francisco Board of Supervisors voted last month to urge Congress to impeach Bush, as have state Democratic parties, including those of New Mexico, Nevada, North Carolina and Wisconsin. A Zogby International poll showed that 51 percent of respondents agreed that Bush should be impeached if he lied about Iraq, a far greater percentage than believed President Bill Clinton should be impeached during the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal.

And Harper's Magazine this month ran a cover piece titled "The Case for Impeachment: Why We Can No Longer Afford George W. Bush."

"If the president says 'We made mistakes,' fine, let's move on," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.). "But if he lied to get America into a war, I can't imagine anything more impeachable."

Democrats remain far from unified. Prominent party leaders -- and a large majority of those in Congress -- distance themselves from the effort. They say the very word is a distraction, that talk of impeachment and censure reflect the polarization of politics. Activists spend too many hours dialing Democratic politicians and angrily demanding impeachment votes, they say.

In California, poet Kevin Hearle, an impeachment supporter, is challenging liberal Rep. Tom Lantos -- who opposes impeachment -- in the Democratic primary in June.

"Impeachment is an outlet for anger and frustration, which I share, but politics ain't therapy," said Rep. Barney Frank, a Massachusetts liberal who declined to sign the Conyers resolution. "Bush would much rather debate impeachment than the disastrous war in Iraq."

The GOP establishment has welcomed the threat. It has been a rough patch for the party -- Bush's approval ratings in polls are lower than for any president in recent history. With midterm elections in the offing, Republican leaders view impeachment as kerosene poured on the bonfires of their party base.

"The Democrats' plan for 2006?" Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman wrote in a fundraising e-mail Thursday. "Take the House and Senate and impeach the president. With our nation at war, is this the kind of Congress you want?"

The argument for an impeachment inquiry -- which draws support from prominent constitutional scholars such as Harvard's Laurence H. Tribe and former Reagan deputy attorney general Bruce Fein -- centers on Bush's conduct before and after the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

It is argued that Bush and his officials conspired to manufacture evidence of weapons of mass destruction to persuade Congress to approve the invasion. Former Treasury secretary Paul H. O'Neill told CBS News's "60 Minutes" that "from the very beginning there was a conviction that Saddam Hussein was a bad person and that he needed to go . . . it was all about finding a way to do it." And a senior British intelligence official wrote in what is now known as the "Downing Street memo" that Bush officials were intent on fixing "the intelligence and the facts . . . around the policy."

Critics point to Bush's approval of harsh interrogations of prisoners captured Iraq and Afghanistan, tactics that human rights groups such as Amnesty International say amount to torture. Bush also authorized warrantless electronic surveillance of telephone calls and e-mails, subjecting possibly thousands of Americans each year to eavesdropping since 2001.

"Bush is saying 'I'm the president' and, on a range of issues -- from war to torture to illegal surveillance -- 'I can do as I like,' " said Michael Ratner of the Center for Constitutional Rights. "This administration needs to be slapped down and held accountable for actions that could change the shape of our democracy."

Tribe wrote Conyers, dismissing Bush's defense of warrantless surveillance as "poppycock." It constituted, Tribe concluded, "as grave an abuse of executive authority as I can recall ever having studied."

But posed against this bill of aggrievement are legal and practical realities. Not all scholars, even of a liberal bent, agree that Bush has committed "high crimes and misdemeanors." Bush's legal advice may be wrong, they say, but still reside within the bounds of reason.

"The Clinton impeachment was plainly unconstitutional, and a Bush impeachment would be nearly as bad," said Cass R. Sunstein, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Chicago. "There is a very good argument that the president had it wrong on WMD in Iraq but that he was acting in complete good faith."

Sunstein argues that Bush's decision to conduct surveillance of Americans without court approval flowed from Congress's vote to allow an armed struggle against al-Qaeda. "If you can kill them, why can't you spy on them?" Sunstein said, adding that this is a minority view.

Here in Massachusetts and Vermont, though, in the back roads and on the streets of Holyoke and Springfield, the discontent with Bush is palpable. These are states that, per capita, have sent disproportionate numbers of soldiers to Iraq. Many in these middle- and working-class towns are not pleased that so many friends and cousins are coming back wounded or dead.

"He picks and chooses his information and can't admit it's erroneous, and he annoys me," said Colleen Kucinski, walking Aleks, 5, and Gregory, 2, home.

Would she support impeachment? Kucinski wags her head "yes" before the question is finished. "Without a doubt. This is far more serious than Clinton and Monica. This is about life and death. We're fighting a war on his say-so and it was all wrong."

Senate To Hold Hearing On Feingold's Censure Resolution (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for next Friday on Sen. Russ Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing a warrantless surveillance program.

Feingold, D-Wis., argues that the program is illegal. The White House maintains that Bush was authorized to do so under his powers as commander in chief.

So far, only two senators, Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, and Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., have co-sponsored the resolution.

A censure resolution, if adopted, would amount to Congress scolding the president.

Senator Sets Hearing On Censure Of Bush (NYT)

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The Senate Judiciary Committee has set a hearing for next Friday on the call by Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, to censure President Bush for his approval of a program to allow electronic eavesdropping without warrants.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the panel, said he had decided to schedule the session after Mr. Feingold, in a television interview, pressed for hearings on the censure proposal.

Some Republicans have seized on the issue to rally their supporters by arguing that the censure plan is evidence that Democrats would try to take some action against Mr. Bush should they gain control of the House or Senate in the November elections.

The issue has also energized some Democrats who contend their party has shied from confronting Mr. Bush. But Mr. Feingold's Democratic colleagues have been cautious about endorsing the plan.

Mr. Specter said his intent was not to use the session as a political forum but to explore issues surrounding the proposed censure. He said he believed the proposal was baseless.

"I am prepared to deal with it," Mr. Specter said. "I am sure not going to sit back and have Feingold spout off."

First Lady Has Husband's Ear, Even About Staffing, She Says (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

WASHINGTON, March 24 — President Bush has said he is listening to advice about his staff from a lot of people, and one of them is evidently his wife.

In an interview with Larry King broadcast on CNN on Friday night, Laura Bush said that she advised her husband regularly on personnel, and she suggested that she had weighed in on the continuing calls from Republicans for new blood in the West Wing.

Mrs. Bush made her comments in response to questions from Mr. King about a Washington Post article on Friday by Sally Quinn. In a "Dear Laura" essay in the Style section, Ms. Quinn wrote that Mrs. Bush was the only person who could tell her husband the truth about the problems he faces.

With the president's poll numbers at record lows, Congressional Republicans in rebellion and Americans increasingly doubtful about the war in Iraq, Ms. Quinn advised Mrs. Bush to tell her husband that he needed to listen to outside opinion, pay attention to Congress and bring an old Washington hand into the White House.

Asked what she thought of the advice, Mrs. Bush said, "There's some of it that's right and some of it that isn't, of course."

DOJ_NMG_0022237

She added: "And I know that the view from outside is a lot different from the view that George and I have inside, with each other, by ourselves. And there's certainly some advice I would feel free to give him, and do. There's other advice that I really don't think I should give him."

Mr. King asked, "Like personnel?"

Mrs. Bush replied, "Well, no, I mean, I would certainly — that's one of the things we do talk about the most, are personalities. I know everyone as well as he does, who works here. I've worked with them also. So certainly I would give him that kind of advice."

Mrs. Bush also said: "This is so typical of Washington that on the front page of the Style section would be the advice to the first lady. But I take advice to heart. I really do."

In the same interview, Mrs. Bush restated that she thought Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would make an "excellent" president, "but I don't think we can talk her into running."

The first lady added, "I think she sincerely does not want to run, but I wish she would."

Mrs. Bush said that Ms. Rice "probably wants to move back to California and have a wonderful life, post-secretary of state."

Bush Accepts Reds' Pitch (CINE)

By Howard Wilkinson

The Cincinnati Enquirer, March 25, 2006

President Bush will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday.

Bush will take the mound shortly before the 2:10 p.m. start of the Reds' game against the Chicago Cubs on April 3.

"The president looks forward to throwing out the first pitch," White House spokesman Blair Jones said.

Bob Castellini, the Reds' new chief executive officer, has been a Bush supporter, raising more than $100,000 for the president's 2004 re-election campaign.

Last month, Castellini was among those who greeted the president at a private home in Indian Hill, where Bush attended a $1.1 million fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine.

DeWine, a Reds season-ticket holder since the early days of Riverfront Stadium, will be in his seat on the mezzanine level for Opening Day.

President Bush won't be the first of his family to throw out a first pitch on Opening Day. Three years ago, at the inaugural game of Great American Ball Park, his father, former President George H.W. Bush, did the honors.

Having a president in the ball park will mean extra security, and if it is anything like the 2004 Opening Day, when Vice President Dick Cheney tossed out the ball, fans can expect some delays getting to their seats.

When Cheney came to Opening Day, fans with tickets in the lower terrace level, from first base to third base, had to pass through metal detectors to get to their seats, in addition to the usual bag check outside the ballpark's turnstiles.

The extra security meant that some got to their seats after the real "first pitch" of the game.

President Nixon came to Cincinnati in July, 1970, Riverfront Stadium's inaugural season, to throw out the first pitch at the All-Star Game.

Last year, President Bush threw out the ceremonial first pitch in Washington, D.C., for the first home game of the Washington Nationals.

States Get Reimbursement For Katrina Aid (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

The federal government released $1.5 billion on Friday to offset health care expenses that states incurred when assisting Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

Congress set aside $2 billion to reimburse states. The $500 million not distributed yet will cover future expenses.

After the hurricane, the federal government granted waivers to states that had temporarily enrolled evacuees into their Medicaid programs. The benefits particularly targeted low-income children, pregnant women, the elderly and disabled.

Medicaid is the state-federal health insurance program for the poor. The reimbursement can also be used to leverage an additional $4.5 billion in federal funding, officials with the Department of Health and Human Services said.

The states getting relief funds are Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Idaho, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, South Carolina, Indiana, Maryland, Louisiana, Nevada, California, Ohio, Rhode Island, North Carolina, Wyoming, Arizona, Massachusetts, North Dakota, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Oregon, Iowa, Virginia, Minnesota, Montana, Utah and Wisconsin. Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia also received funding.

Seniors Struggle To Get Drug Plans To Pay For Some Prescriptions (KRT)

By Tony Pugh

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Some patients and doctors are facing a new problem with the fledgling Medicare prescription drug benefit: Medications they once received without question from other plans are being denied by the private insurers running the Medicare plan.

When they appeal the coverage denials, the patients and their physicians face confusing forms, time-consuming demands for personal medical information and long delays.

In some cases, the private plans won't cover the full dosage called for in a prescription or try to steer patients to drugs other than those prescribed by their doctors.

When disputes arise, doctors are asked to justify their prescribing decisions in writing, sometimes with patients' medical histories or test results as supporting evidence. Some plans even ask for doctors' notes or for peer-reviewed articles that justify their decisions.

"Whether intended or not, it's a process that nobody can navigate in an efficient way. It's a major problem right now," said Sam Muszynski, head of health care systems and financing at the American Psychiatric Institute.

And many fear things will worsen in April when tens of thousands of elderly and disabled patients must formally petition the plans to get refills on medications that were provided on a temporary emergency basis.

"The system is going to melt down, and I think it's going to require some emergency legislation," said Dr. Holly Leeds, a general practitioner in Auburn, Calif.

Amid widespread complaints about coverage lapses following the January launch of the Medicare drug benefit, federal officials told plans to pay for drugs that they wouldn't normally cover until March 31. Meanwhile, patients were urged to either switch to medications that were covered or file appeals to have the plans pay for their preferred drugs.

Many of those who petitioned the plans say the appeals process is often a poorly managed, highly subjective nightmare. Doctors say phone delays frequently leave their staff on hold with the plans for hours.

Some plans don't meet mandatory time requirements to resolve appeals. Dr. Elizabeth Delesante, a psychiatrist in Brainerd, Minn., said she still hasn't heard from anyone at the Humana plan she filed two appeals with in January.

Delesante gives her patients free samples to ensure that they get their medication while the cases are pending. "If it weren't for that, these people would be in trouble," she said. Officials at Humana said they have contacted Delesante and will work to resolve her complaints.

Doctors also say it's hard getting the proper forms from the Medicare plans. "And none of these are standardized forms. Every company uses a different one, which is ridiculous," said Dr. Rosemary Deleo of Kingston, N.Y.

Mohit Ghose, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade association, acknowledged that the process has problems. He said the plans are working with Medicare and physician groups to develop standardized appeals forms to simplify the process.

The plans also will soon offer a messaging system that gives pharmacists a list of alternative medications that patients can use when a plan denies a prescription request.

"I can assure you that the processes are getting better and they are getting streamlined," Ghose said.

Medicare administrator Mark McClellan said the agency will monitor complaints about the appeals process and could levy fines and penalties if widespread problems persist.

To avoid further complications, Medicare is urging the plans to alert members whose medications will no longer be covered in April. Medicare officials also want the plans to increase telephone staffing for the expected rush of appeals and to extend drug coverage for people who haven't resolved appeals by March 31.

But many worry that patients who lose their appeals could be forced to take less effective alternative medicines or, at worst, drugs that could endanger their health.

Don Riley of Danville, Ohio, is a 72-year-old retired truck driver. A diabetic stroke victim with heart problems and failing kidneys, Riley takes 12 medications a day, including Norvasc for high blood pressure.

Riley has used Norvasc since 2004, but after his drug coverage shifted from Medicaid to Medicare in January, he ran into problems. Riley's Medicare plan from United Healthcare won't pay for the drug in the amount prescribed by his doctors - two 10mg tablets a day.

The plan would cover only one 10mg tablet a day. To continue the higher dosages, the plan wanted a written explanation and supporting documents from his doctors. One doctor complied. Another refused, unwilling to spend untold hours on the phone chasing plan representatives, said Riley's daughter-in-law, Paula Riley.

After Riley was denied twice by the plan, Paula Riley started working with attorneys from the Medicare Rights Center, a national patient advocacy group, to appeal the case to a mediator that's contracted by Medicare. Until his case is resolved, Riley is taking only half his Norvasc dosage, and his blood pressure is creeping up.

The plan said he can switch to a new medication that's fully covered, but his family is reluctant because neuropathy has diminished his ability to feel what's going on in his body.

"If he changes medicines and has a side effect, he can't feel it or tell you what it is," Paula Riley said. "The only way we can detect it is by having him on a monitor or watching him. And I don't have 24 hours a day to watch this man. So I don't want to change what's working. I don't feel I should have to."

Neither does Dr. Larry Fields, president of the American Academy of Family Physicians. He said that if a doctor thinks a higher dose is needed, the drug plan should stay out of it.

"That's a doctor's decision. The doctor is taking the responsibility to give a different dose and that should not be something that the plan's involved in," Fields said. "Their job is to supply drugs for the patients. ... It's not their job to decide which drug and it's not their job to decide how much."

Because of privacy laws, United Healthcare officials couldn't comment directly on Riley's case. But they said U.S. Food and Drug Administration guidelines set the maximum dosage level for Norvasc at 10mg per day. Federal rules require Medicare drug plans to follow these guidelines and other medically accepted practices when covering drugs under the Medicare benefit, said United Healthcare spokeswoman Joyce Larkin.

While doctors often exceed FDA-recommended dosing levels and sometimes prescribe drugs for ailments they weren't designed to treat, these practices require strict review by Medicare plans to determine their medical appropriateness and eligibility for program coverage.

If a Medicare drug plan denies a prescription request, the patient or doctor can call the plan to seek a coverage exception. Plans are required to respond within 72 hours or within 24 hours if a doctor makes an expedited request for a patient whose health is in danger.

If the plan denies the request, the patient can seek a second review by the plan. Second reviews must be decided within seven days or 72 hours for an expedited appeal. Leeds said that most plans don't meet the time requirements, even on the expedited requests. "If I'm lucky it might happen, but more often than not, it doesn't," she said.

If a patient still isn't satisfied, he or she can appeal the case to an independent review agency contracted by Medicare, the Maximus Center for Health Dispute Resolution. So far, the company has received nearly 1,000 requests for appeals, McClellan said.

Additional appeals can then go to an administrative law judge, to the Medicare Appeals Council and even to federal court.

As Parents Age, Baby Boomers And Business Struggle To Cope (NYT)

By Jane Gross

Nancy Goodman's employer, a telecommunications company in Boston, offers benefits to help employees care for elderly parents. But she found them nearly useless during four years of caring for her mother, who has Parkinson's disease, and her father, who died of kidney failure last year.

"They say they want to do the right thing," Ms. Goodman, 58, said of her employer, which she would not identify for fear of losing her job. "But when it comes down to it, they're not seeing the true picture."

Ms. Goodman's lament is common, as corporate America scrambles to help the soaring number of baby boomers, mostly working women, whose obligation to frail, elderly parents results in absenteeism, workday distractions or stress-related health problems.

Companies are responding, but experts say they often use child care benefits as a model when they do not suit the different and unpredictable needs of the elderly. In addition, at a time of cutbacks in expensive health insurance and pensions, the most commonly offered benefits are those that cost a company little or nothing, like referral services and unpaid leaves.

Ms. Goodman, for instance, tried her company's referral service to supplement inadequate staffing when her parents lived at an assisted living center in Connecticut. It was "like going to the yellow pages," she said, since it did not relieve her of the time-consuming tasks of arranging for and supervising the services from afar. Ms. Goodman was also entitled to a year's leave of absence, a benefit a new mother might appreciate. But if she took a leave now, what happened if her mother lingered?

Employees with ailing parents, more than 20 million nationwide, cite other benefits that would allow them to focus more on their jobs, like geriatric case managers to guide them through the mysteries of Medicaid and Medicare, or backup care for emergencies like a last-minute business trip. Companies that offer this kind of hands-on assistance generally pay for at least part of the service.

But they are rare. According to the Society for Human Resource Management, which represents more than 200,000 human resource and other corporate officials, 39 percent of its members said in 2003 that elder care benefits were "too costly to be feasible." Only 1 percent of their companies subsidized any elder care benefits last year. And only 3 percent offered the emergency backup care — subsidized or otherwise — that experts say saves money by keeping workers at work.

"The perception among companies is that they can't afford elder care benefits," said Frank Scanlan, a spokesman for the society.

It is the largest companies that are the most generous, but even those often subscribe to the mistaken notion that the Mommy Track and the Daughter Track are the same, said Chris Gatti, president of the Work Options Group in Superior, Colo. Work Options, whose clients employ 400,000 people nationwide, provides in-home care for children and the elderly.

"These benefits fall under the same umbrella but are fundamentally different," Mr. Gatti said. "Child care programs are relatively straight-forward and easy to administer compared to elder care, which is a maze with lots of sharp corners and dark secluded places."

An individual supervisor can ease an employee's burden but still leave them vulnerable to management changes. Just 6 percent of employers have written policies about elder care, according to surveys by the Society for Human Resource Management, while 76 percent say they help employees on a case-by-case basis.

For Ms. Goodman, the one godsend since her father died and her mother moved into her Boston apartment has been permission to work at home. But that is likely to change with a new boss. "I'm walking on eggs right now," Ms. Goodman said.

The distinctions between child care and elder care have become apparent as the first of the 77 million baby boomers turn 60 and their parents live past 85, joining the fastest-growing segment of the population.

The most obvious is that children's schedules are predictable — a school holiday next Monday — while elderly parents' needs — a trip to the emergency room — are crisis-driven. Also, children are raised at home; an elderly parent often lives far away.

Guiding the decisions of an elderly parent also requires mastery of arcane legal, financial and medical matters.

"It's a new and very confusing skill set," said Maureen Corcoran, a vice president at Prudential Financial. "You don't just give people a list; you lead them there. Otherwise they spend hours upon hours figuring it out themselves."

For both employees and employers, the costs of elder care are enormous, according to studies by the MetLife Mature Market Institute, which is in the midst of updated analysis to reflect rapidly changing demographics.

The price tag for employers in 1997 ranged from $11.5 billion to $29 billion a year. Most expensive were the replacement of lost workers (at least $4.9 billion a year), workday interruptions ($3.7 billion) and absenteeism ($885 million). The employees lose salary, Social Security and pension benefits as a result of refusing promotions, switching to part-time work or retiring early.

Certain benefits mitigate these costs, and certain companies have learned there is a clear return on investment. At Prudential, for instance, subsidized emergency backup care prevents absenteeism and workday interruptions. Prudential's 21,000 employees, with one phone call to Work Options Group, can get help for parents by the next morning, for a co-payment of $4 an hour.

A $20-an-hour aide, on an eight-hour shift, would otherwise cost a Prudential employee $160, rather than $32. Yet the company says it will save $650,000 during a three-year contract with Work Options, Ms. Corcoran said, because "if our employees needs are taken care of, they can focus on work."

Diane Yankencheck, a Prudential employee in Newark, said the service kept her working during a crisis. Her father has a degenerative neurological disease and round-the-clock care. Her mother manages the household, or did until she broke her wrist. Now an aide from Work Options cooks, cleans and helps her bathe and dress.

Kent Burtis, a Verizon technician in Bayville, N.J., uses similar backup care for his father, who is paralyzed and incontinent. For a while, Mr. Burtis spent hours before work feeding, diapering and dressing him. Now an aide does the morning shift. "It's kept me from slitting my throat," Mr. Burtis said.

Elder care benefits most often seem a luxury at small companies and nonprofits. So even at AARP, dedicated to the needs of older Americans, Deborah Russell, the director of work force issues, was daunted by coordinating long-distance care for her mother and then missing weeks of work to be at her bedside when death neared.

Ms. Russell and her two sisters, grateful for AARP's excellent referral service, still spent "an inordinate amount of time on the telephone" during working hours, distracted and unproductive. As their mother's condition deteriorated, and the siblings rotated weeks in Florida, Ms. Russell used paid vacation time rather than the 12 weeks of unpaid leave guaranteed by the federal Family Medical Leave Act or AARP's more generous 16-week program, also unpaid.

Another benefit assumed to be useful is the flexible spending account, governed by the Internal Revenue Service and widely offered by companies. It permits the use of pretax dollars for dependent care, as long as the dependent meets the I.R.S.

definition. Virtually all children do, but most aged parents do not. That means tax breaks for baby sitters but not companions for the elderly.

Experts disagree about whether women will push employers for help with their parents, as they did 30 years ago when child care was their pressing issue.

Ellen Galinsky, 63, president of the Family and Work Institute, led the charge for a day care center at Bank Street College when she was a researcher there in 1969. After "huge resistance," the center opened in 1974. Ms. Galinsky predicts a similar awakening to elder care issues because "demographics are destiny."

"Everyone I know is dealing with this," said Ms. Galinsky, who recently stayed at the bedside of her 98-year-old mother for the last two months of her life. The institute allows unlimited sick leave for such family emergencies. But even with that leeway, Ms. Galinsky said: "I was on another planet. It's like no other experience. I barely have words for how hard it is."

Todd Groves, founder of LTC Financial Partners in Seattle, who advises human resource managers on long term care, is not convinced that women like Ms. Galinsky will have the same galvanizing effect this time around, regardless of their numbers or their passion.

"Back then you still had a paternal business culture," Mr. Groves said. "Now people feel out on their own. They are fearful about their careers and don't feel they can ask for help."

New Home Sales Slumping (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

The downturn in the housing market is deepening, with new home sales at a nine-year low, prices down for the fourth month in a row and mortgage applications at their lowest point in three years.

Last month's 1.08 million rate of new home sales was 10.5 percent below January's rate and down 13.4 percent from a year ago, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

New home prices have declined steadily from a median of $243,900 in October to $230,400 last month, the agency said.

The rapidly decelerating housing market is causing concern on Wall Street and at the Federal Reserve. A collapse in the market is one of the biggest risks facing the U.S. economy because it would drag down consumer spending that has been closely linked to climbing house prices and kill thousands of high-paid jobs in the real estate industry.

"Bubbles burst, they really do," said Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisers. "The Federal Reserve has to be concerned that just may happen, which could make them more cautious going forward."

The Fed is scheduled to meet on Tuesday to decide on raising interest rates once again. While most Fed-watchers say another rate increase is in store next week, the faltering housing market may influence the Fed to consider pausing later this spring.

Federal Reserve Bank of Boston President Cathy Minehan said this week that the Fed's forecast of "solid growth" in the economy this year was predicated on the housing market cooling off or leveling. But anything more dramatic than that would be "a downside risk to growth," she said, because it would cause consumers to stop using their houses like ATMs and cut back on spending.

"We see construction diminishing somewhat and real estate prices flattening, not declining," she said. "Clearly, however, we could be wrong on the magnitudes."

Housing wealth, which surged by $5 trillion in the first half of the decade, has been a powerful generator of consumer spending since nearly 70 percent of American households own homes. Consumers liquidated as much as $600 billion of their home equity last year to spend and invest, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., eclipsing their $375 billion gain in after-tax income.

Mr. Naroff said the home market's steep decline since the fall may start snowballing and affecting consumer wealth. Already, sluggish sales and traffic have prompted homebuilders to offer discounts and incentives on homes for sale, but they will have to start cutting prices in earnest if they want to unload the record inventories of unsold homes they've been accumulating, he said.

Unsold new homes totaled 548,000 last month or 6.3 months of homes at the current sales rate -- a stunning 45 percent above year-ago levels, according to the department.

"The product overhang just keeps growing," in both the markets for new and existing homes, where unsold homes also are at record highs, said Mr. Naroff.

"Declining new home prices would ultimately spill over into the existing home market," where the consuming public would start to feel the pinch, he said.

Economists say falling home prices could wreak disaster on consumer finances, not only by preventing many from cashing into home equity as they have been to boost their incomes and spending, but also by putting many borrowers on shaky financial ground because they took out huge mortgages with backloaded payment schedules to purchase their homes.

Meredith Whitney, executive director at CIBC World Markets, said the Fed has been trying to cool down the housing market with sharply higher short-term rates, and that is hurting the most vulnerable borrowers who took out adjustable-rate mortgages keyed to rates driven higher by the Fed.

Caught between the squeeze of rising rates and a falling market, these borrowers -- most heavily indebted segment of the consuming public -- will fall into a spending slump this year because they have taken on burdensome and risky mortgages and are too overstretched to maintain their spending and debt payments, she said.

"The picture is getting less and less pretty," said Phillip Neuhart, economist with Wachovia Securities. But he noted that other housing reports, notably one showing a 5.6 percent boost in existing home sales in January due to unseasonably warm weather, are not signaling as profound a weakness as yesterday's report.

"One month of surprisingly weak new home sales does not constitute a market bust," he said. "However, if new home sales were to continue their plummet and existing home sales follow suit," the Fed would have to start worrying about the health of the economy.

New-Home Sales Fell In Feb.; Inventories Rose To New Record (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Sales of new homes fell more than expected in February, while a record number of houses sat unsold, according to a Commerce Department report released yesterday.

The inventory of 548,000 new single-family homes -- the largest since the department began tracking data in 1963 -- represents a 6.3 month supply of houses. In comparison, the supply in January was 5.3 months; in February of last year, it was 4.4 months.

The pace of sales fell 10.5 percent last month to an annualized rate of 1.08 million. It was the largest percentage drop in almost nine years.

The median sales price also dropped for the fourth straight month, to $230,400.

Taken together, the figures provide further evidence that the housing boom of the past five years is ending, economists said.

"The numbers are really, really, really weak," said Patrick Newport, economist at Global Insight, a Massachusetts-based market research firm. Newport had expected sales to drop by a much slower rate of 3 percent.

Despite the report, shares of large home-building firms remained stable yesterday. NVR Inc. stock closed at $775.98, up a third of a percentage point, and Toll Brothers Inc. stock closed at $34.35, down a third of a percentage point.

Yesterday's report came a day after the National Association of Realtors released a survey showing that existing-home sales had increased in February after a five-month decline. According to the survey, sales of existing single-family houses, townhouses and condos went up 5.2 percent from January, but were down 0.3 percent from February 2005.

Economists attributed the increase to warm weather, which spurred sales, particularly in the Northeast and the Midwest, regions typically more affected by climate.

Market observers cautioned against reading too much into monthly changes in either report. The new-home statistics, in particular, are based on a small sample with large margins of error. And the "noise" in the data is amplified when "markets are turning," said Susan Wachter, professor of real estate and finance at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School. For example, Wachter said, limited-time incentives that home builders started offering at the beginning of the year, such as help with closing costs, could have propped up January figures by luring in buyers who may otherwise have waited until February.

But there is no question, experts said, that things are cooling. "All of the numbers are basically telling you the same thing," Newport said. "We're just going to see a continued slowdown over the next few months and it's probably going to extend into the next few years."

In the government report released yesterday, the South region, which includes the Washington area, saw a more moderate decline in sales compared with the nation as a whole. The region experienced a 6.4 percent decline compared with the previous month, and a 9.6 percent drop from February 2005.

"The market has peaked. Now the question is, when do we start going down the back side?" said Christopher Thornberg, an economist for the Anderson Forecast at UCLA's Anderson School of Business. "I don't hear the wind whistling past my ears just yet. But I think I will over the course of this year."

U.S. Economy: New Home Sales Fell Most In Nine Years (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Courtney Schlisserman Joe Richter

March 24 (Bloomberg) -- Sales of new U.S. homes slumped by the most in nine years and demand for business equipment declined last month, prompting some economists to lower their growth forecasts.

Home purchases fell 10.5 percent to an annual rate of 1.08 million, causing prices to fall and leaving more houses on the market, the Commerce Department said in Washington. Orders for durable goods excluding transportation equipment fell 1.3 percent, the most since July, the department also said.

``The new home sales report is in an indication of what we'll see in the remainder of 2006 for housing, and that unequivocally points to a slowdown," said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight, a forecasting firm in Lexington, Massachusetts. At the same time, he said, ``this will be more of an average quarter for business investment, not a stellar quarter."

The drop in durable goods orders caused economists at Morgan Stanley to mark down their first-quarter growth estimate to 4.2 percent from 4.6 percent. U.S. Treasury securities rose on speculation less business investment and slower home sales will limit the number of Federal Reserve interest-rate increases.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell 6 basis points to 4.67 percent at 4:04 p.m. in New York. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point. The dollar fell to $1.2039 per euro, the first drop in five days, from $1.1973 late yesterday.

`More Cautious'

February's decline in home sales was the biggest since April 1997. Economists expected new home sales to fall to a 1.2 million rate from January's originally reported 1.233 million, according to the median of 61 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey. Estimates ranged from 1.17 million to 1.275 million.

``Consumers are a little more cautious," J. Larry Sorsby, chief financial officer of Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., New Jersey's largest homebuilder, said in an interview. ``You can't open a newspaper these days without seeing someone saying the housing market is softening."

The report comes a day after the National Association of Realtors said sales of previously owned homes rose 5.2 percent last month to an annual rate of 6.91 million. Purchases of new homes are considered a leading indicator of housing because they are based on contract signings, which typically occur at least a month before the closing. The rise in February sales of existing homes may have reflected purchase decisions made in January, when record-warm temperatures brought out buyers.

The median selling price of a new home last month fell 2.9 percent from February 2005, to $230,400, the first decrease since December 2003 and the biggest year-over-year decline since January 2003.

The number of homes for sale rose to a record 548,000 from January's 525,000. At the current sales pace, there were enough new homes on the market to satisfy demand for the next 6.3 months, the largest amount in more than a decade.

Less Affordable

Rising mortgage rates are making new homes less affordable. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage rose to 6.25 percent in February from 6.15 percent the month before, according to Freddie Mac.

Sales fell in two of four regions. They declined 29 percent in the West and 6.4 percent in the South. Sales rose 12.7 percent in the Northeast and 5.2 percent in the Midwest.

Orders for durable goods excluding transportation equipment fell after rising 1.6 percent a month earlier. A jump in demand for commercial aircraft led to a 2.6 percent increase in orders for all durable goods after an 8.9 percent decrease.

Economists projected durable goods orders would rise 1.3 percent in February, based on the median of 70 estimates in a Bloomberg News survey. Orders excluding transportation equipment were forecast to rise 1 percent.

Aircraft Orders

Orders for transportation equipment rose 13 percent after falling 29 percent in January. Aircraft orders jumped 53 percent after falling 70 percent in the previous month. Bookings for motor vehicles fell 3.3 percent.

Chicago-based Boeing Co., the world's second-biggest maker of commercial airplanes, said it received 25 aircraft orders in February, down from the 39 in the previous month. Boeing's orders more than tripled to a record 1,002 last year on demand from Asian and Middle Eastern carriers.

Production Cuts

Production cuts by some automakers may have restrained durable goods orders in February. Cars and light trucks sold at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 16.6 million during the month, down from 17.6 million in January.

General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., the two biggest U.S. automakers, on March 1 said they will cut second-quarter production in North America after reporting U.S. sales declines in February.

Sales of non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft, which the government uses to construct quarterly gross domestic product figures, fell 1.1 percent in February after no change. Orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft, a proxy for future business investment, fell 2.3 percent last month after rising 0.3 percent.

Unfilled orders of business equipment rose 0.5 percent in February after no change.

Inventories of durable goods fell 0.5 percent after rising 1 percent in January. Unfilled orders, a gauge of future production, rose 0.9 percent after falling 0.2 percent.

Signs Of Slowdown In US Housing (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

Sales of new US homes plunged 10.5 per cent last month, prices fell and the stock of unsold homes hit its highest level in 10 years, providing the clearest indications yet that the red-hot housing market may be cooling.

A big slowdown could prompt consumers to cut spending and boost savings. Such a shift could help reduce the current account deficit but at the cost of significantly slower growth.

New home sales slid to 1.08m, the fourth consecutive decline, and the price of new homes fell 3 per cent from a year ago. With a flood of new properties coming on to the market, at the present pace of sales, it will take 6.3 months to clear the backlog.

Economists have long been expecting a slowdown and some have predicted declines in prices. “New home sales are softening fast,” said Celia Chen, a housing expert at Economy.com. “Affordability has declined to a near 15-year low. Rising mortgage interest rates and rising house prices are constraining demand.”

Ian Morris, economist at HSBC, said: “Over the next 12 months we suspect a hard landing is more likely.” But there had been regional factors in the slowdown. Sales fell in the west but rose in the midwest and north-east.

The rising stock of unsold houses could lower prices still further. Research at HSBC suggests that seven months’ supply of unsold housing will mean a soft landing for the market. But if the figure rises towards nine months it will be a hard landing.

New-Home Sales Tumble 10.5%; Durable-Goods Picture Is Mixed (WSJ)

By Kemba J. Dunham

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

Sales of new homes in February took the biggest one-month drop in nearly nine years as inventories soared, in the latest sign that the housing market is cooling. Meanwhile, a separate report used to forecast the health of the manufacturing sector offered a mixed reading.

The Commerce Department Friday said newly built single-family homes sold at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.080 million units in February, a 10.5% drop after a revised 5.3% decline one month earlier. The February drop was the largest since the same percentage decrease occurred in April 1997.

The new-home data followed Thursday's more optimistic report on existing-home sales. The National Association of Realtors said sales of previously occupied homes, which account for about 85% of the residential market, climbed 5.2% in February. Economists, however, suspect sales were inflated by unusually warm weather.

The reality regarding the state of housing demand "is probably somewhere in between the two reports," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital Markets. Economists point out that the new-home sales series is extremely volatile during the first few months of the year. Mr. Stanley added that such huge monthly increases and declines aren't uncommon and there usually are significant revisions to the data.

Still, "the main message is that new-home sales are coming off at a faster clip than we had expected," said Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. That was illuminated this past week when KB Home, one of the nation's largest home builders, said new-home orders fell 12% during its first quarter ended Feb. 28.

In a separate report, the Commerce Department Friday said new orders for durable goods -- vehicles, machinery, appliances and other items intended to last more than three years -- rose a greater-than-expected 2.6% to $215.8 billion in February. That is up from a revised 8.9% plunge a month earlier.

Economists say the durable-goods picture tends to be muddled because month-to-month changes can be extreme, particularly in the areas of defense and aircraft. Indeed, the February increase was fueled by a 52.5% rise in civilian aircraft orders and a 104.1% rise in defense orders. Also, the January plunge stemmed from a 70.1% decline in civilian aircraft orders.

Stripping out the volatile transportation category, new orders for durable goods declined 1.3% in February, following gains of 1.6% in January and 1.9% in December. Orders for motor vehicles dropped 3.3% in February after a 3.2% decline in January. Meanwhile, nondefense capital-goods orders excluding aircraft -- considered an important indicator of future business-equipment investment -- fell 2.3%. Though the decline follows a four-month cumulative increase of more than 6%, some economists were nevertheless disappointed.

"While nothing is falling apart, there is clearly a softening on the domestic variables that influence manufacturing," said Cliff Waldman, economist for Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI.

In the new-home sales report, economists said the most troubling factor was the severe climb in inventories. There were about 548,000 homes for sale at the end of February, representing a 6.3 months' supply at the current sales rate. That is up from a 5.3 months' supply a month earlier. Some pointed out that this could have reflected an increasing number of speculators putting homes on the market.

The median sales price of a new home declined to $230,400 in February from $234,200 a month earlier, while the average sales price rose to $296,700 from $287,200.

New-Home Sales Rise In Region (LAT)

By Annette Haddad

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

While the U.S. posts a 10.5% month-to-month fall, Southern California records a 9.5% gain.

In what's increasingly becoming a tale of widely divergent regional real estate markets, Southern California's new-home sector is holding up much better than other parts of the nation and even the rest of the state.

The latest evidence came Friday when the Commerce Department reported that the number of new single-family homes sold nationwide fell 10.5% last month from the month before, to an annual rate of 1.08 million units, marking the biggest drop in new-home sales in nearly nine years.

The drop pushed a gauge of the volume of unsold new homes to its highest level in more than a decade. In February, 548,000 new homes went unsold, representing a 6.3-month supply — meaning it would take that long to sell them at current sales rates. In January, there was a 5.3-month supply.

In the West, which includes California, the sales plunge was even worse: down 29.4%, partly reflecting stalling sales in Sacramento and the Central Valley and in other Western states such as Arizona.

Yet in Southern California, sales of new single-family houses and condominiums saw their strongest February since 1988, according to statistics compiled by real estate research firm DataQuick Information Systems. Last month, sales rose 9.5% to 4,980 from January's 4,550, and were up 19% from the year before.

By comparison, new-home sales in the Sacramento area have been much weaker, DataQuick said. Although sales there were up 13% in February from the previous month, that was after January marked the worst month in six years. As many new homes were sold in December as in January and February combined, according to DataQuick. And sales plunged 45% in February from the year before.

What's more, the inventory of unsold new homes in Southern California, although rising, is below levels elsewhere in the West and in the nation.

In February, there was a 2.1-month supply of unsold new homes from Ventura County to the Mexican border, said Steve Johnson, director of the Southern California region for real estate consulting firm MetroStudy. Around Phoenix, there's three times the inventory available.

The reason for the difference: There has been less home building in much of Southern California, thanks largely to tight governmental regulations and a lack of available land.

"We just don't have much excess supply," Johnson said.

The Southland housing market also is holding up better because its economy is more diverse and job creation remains strong, thanks in part to growth in such sectors as tourism, trade and aerospace. The region also is proving to be less volatile because the presence of real estate speculators has been less than in other hot markets.

However, the Southland's February inventory of unsold homes was up 80% from a year earlier, Johnson said, suggesting that demand here was cooling nonetheless.

"Builders used to be able to take the 'Field of Dreams' approach — built it and they will come," Johnson said. "Now they have to do their homework and evaluate the market more carefully."

One thing builders are finding is that rising home prices, coupled with rising mortgage rates, are tempering the ardor of prospective buyers, experts said.

Many Southland builders are working to adjust their strategies to accommodate the more-reticent attitude of buyers.

They are building smaller homes, such as condominiums and town homes, or converting existing apartment units into for-sale housing, which are usually priced lower than single-family houses.

Builders also have scaled back the number of homes released for sale at their new-home communities. "Builders will shift their mix of products to accommodate the market," said John Karevoll, chief analyst for DataQuick.

That has helped local builders avoid having to offer discounts or other concessions to stoke buyer demand. At certain new-home communities in Sacramento, for instance, builders slashed prices to close sales.

"The Sacramento market went up very quickly, perhaps too quickly," said Patrick Duffy, a market analyst for Hanley Wood Market Intelligence.

Builders in Southern California, he said, generally are reluctant to offer price cuts or free upgrades.

"It's like car dealers," Duffy said. "Once you start offering incentives, then everybody starts expecting them."

Stocks Rise Slightly Ahead Of Fed Meeting (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

Stocks inched higher, as investors did some last-minute fine-tuning of their portfolios before an impending meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers.

Economic data from the Commerce Department contributed to the gains, after a seesaw day of trading. Durable-goods orders rose 2.6% in February, better than analysts expected.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 9.68 points, or 0.1%, to 11279.97, nearly unchanged for the week and within reach of a six-year high. Boeing and United Technologies were among the Dow's strongest components, helped by the durable-goods data.

The government also reported that new-home sales plunged 10.5% in February, the biggest drop in almost nine years.

Although that might sound like bad news, it was something of a welcome sign for investors hoping the Fed will limit further interest-rate increases, convinced the economy isn't overheating. Higher interest rates typically are a negative for the stock market because they increase costs for businesses and consumers.

"Investors are reasonably comfortable with what's going on," said Robert E. Weissenstein, managing director at Credit Suisse Securities LLC. "They're focused on the positive aspects of the housing market slowing down, not the negatives."

The Fed's rate-setting committee, which meets Monday and Tuesday, is expected to raise its target short-term rate by a quarter percentage point to 4.75%. But Wall Street has been busy guessing how far the Fed will go beyond that level. Federal-funds futures indicate investors expect one more increase in May, bringing the rate to 5%.

Other stock indicators followed the Dow higher. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also gained 0.1%, or 1.28 points, to end at 1302.95, off 0.3% on the week.

The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.6%, or 12.67, to close at 2312.82, up 0.3% on the week. Talk of a possible merger of Lucent Technologies and Alcatel helped the tech sector, as did Thursday night's news that Google will be added to the S&P 500.

Holding stocks in check all week was a gradual rise in oil futures; they rose 2.4% on the week, to $64.26 a barrel. In major U.S. market action:

Stock1 and bond prices2 rose. The 10-year Treasury note gained 17/32, or $5.31 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.673%. The 30-year bond gained 30/32 to yield 4.693%.

The dollar weakened3, to 117.45 yen from 117.90 yen; the euro rose to $1.2036 from $1.1974.

U.S. Stocks Rise As Home Sales Ease Fed Concern; Lucent Gains (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

March 24 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rose after the biggest reported drop in new-home sales since 1997 and falling orders for business equipment diminished the risk that the Federal Reserve will persist in raising interest rates.

``Hopefully this puts a ceiling on where the Fed ultimately goes," said Wendell Perkins, who helps manage $1.3 billion at Johnson Asset Management in Racine, Wisconsin. ``This, generally, would be a positive" for the market, he said.

Phone-equipment makers rallied after Alcatel SA said it may buy Lucent Technologies Inc. for at least $12.6 billion. A gain in oil prices lifted energy shares. Google Inc. climbed after being picked to join the Standard & Poor's 500 Index.

Losses for retailers and real-estate developers, among industries affected most by higher rates, limited the advance and left indexes little changed for the week. Fed policy makers will meet next week.

The S&P 500 rose 1.28, or 0.1 percent, to 1302.95. The Dow Jones Industrial Average added 9.68, or 0.1 percent, to 11,279.97. Google's gain aided the Nasdaq Composite Index, which advanced 12.67, or 0.6 percent, to 2312.82.

This week, the S&P 500 slipped 0.3 percent, while the Dow industrials rose less than 1 point. The Nasdaq added 0.3 percent. All three have gained more than 4 percent so far this year as investors bet profit growth will outpace gains in borrowing costs.

Interest Rates

Remarks by Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and a report on producer prices earlier in the week increased speculation the Fed will keep raising rates past midyear. Data yesterday showing that sales of existing homes unexpectedly rose in February had reinforced those expectations. The Fed will boost the main U.S. interest rate a 15th time to 4.75 percent on March 28, according to all except two of 90 economists surveyed by Bloomberg.

A U.S. Commerce Department report today indicated the housing market is cooling after a five-year boom. New-home sales fell 10.5 percent last month to an annual rate of 1.08 million, the biggest drop since April 1997, from a revised 1.207 million in January. The number of homes for sale rose to a record 548,000 from January's 525,000.

Excluding more-volatile transportation items, factory orders for equipment made to last at least several years fell 1.3 percent last month, the biggest drop since July, according to another Commerce Department report.

Lucent

Lucent, the largest U.S. maker of phone equipment, jumped 24 cents, or 8.5 percent, to $3.06. Alcatel, the biggest maker of broadband Internet gear, may buy Lucent to create a communications-equipment company with combined sales of more than $25 billion. Alcatel American depositary receipts, each representing one regular share, added 25 cents to $15.70.

Lucent had the biggest gain in the S&P 500, followed by phone-equipment makers Tellabs Inc. and Ciena Corp. Tellabs advanced $1.11, or 7.8 percent, to $15.35, while Ciena rose 34 cents, or 7.1 percent, to $5.15. Nortel Networks Corp., North America's largest telephone-equipment maker, added 12 cents to $2.93.

A gauge of energy shares gained 0.6 percent for the largest advance among 10 industry group in the S&P 500. Chevron Corp., the No. 2 U.S. oil company, rose 94 cents to $57.57. BJ Services Co., an oilfield contractor, rose 51 cents to $33.52. Crude for May delivery climbed 0.6 percent to $64.26 a barrel in New York.

Google

Google added $23.91, or 7 percent, to $365.80. The most- used Internet search engine will replace Burlington Resources Inc., an oil producer being sold to ConocoPhillips, on March 31. Google fell 18 percent this year before being tapped for the index amid concern growth may slow.

Google had a market value of $101.6 billion at the close of trading yesterday, while Burlington was worth $33.9 billion.

``Indexers have to raise money to pay for Google because the market cap for Google is substantially higher than the name coming out," said Peter Boockvar, equity strategist at Miller Tabak & Co. in New York. To do that, funds that track the S&P 500's performance have to pare their stakes in the other 499 companies in the benchmark, which may pressure the index, he added. ``This is how the game works."

Retailers and real-estate companies slid ahead of the Fed's meeting next week.

A gauge of retailers dropped 0.6 percent for the biggest decline among 24 groups in the S&P 500. Home Depot Inc., the No. 1 home-improvement retailer, fell 69 cents to $43.12. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the biggest retailer in the world, slipped 35 cents to $48.19.

Real-Estate Companies

A measure of real-estate companies slid 0.5 percent, extending its drop for the week to 3 percent. Vornado Realty Trust, a property owner with investments in retailers including Sears Holdings Corp. and Toys ``R" Us Inc., slumped 44 cents to $95.41. Archstone-Smith Trust, an apartment developer, lost 50 cents to $48.20.

The durable-goods-orders data pressured some industrial companies. Caterpillar Inc., the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, slumped 76 cents, or 1 percent, to $75.50 for the second-biggest drop in the Dow average.

Tim Hortons Inc. surged $5.01, or 22 percent, to $28.17 in the stock's debut. The No. 1 Canadian doughnut chain had the biggest North American initial public offering in nine months. Wendy's International Inc., which owns Tim Hortons, had the third-biggest decline in the S&P 500, falling $2.08, or 3.2 percent, to $62.93.

About seven stocks advanced for every four that declined on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.46 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 12 percent less than the three-month daily average.

Cephalon Slides

Cephalon Inc. dropped $9.51, or 13 percent, to $63.80 after its drug for attention deficit disorder in children was deemed not safe enough by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to be put on the market. Credit Suisse cut its price forecast on the stock to $70 from $86, citing the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0022248

Apollo Group Inc. lost $2.12, or 4 percent, to $51.60 for the second-biggest drop in the S&P 500. The No. 1 U.S. for- profit education company's share-price estimate was cut to $62 from $66 by Morgan Stanley analyst Chris Gutek, who wrote that declining enrollment was ``troubling."

Iran's Nuclear Steps Quicken, Diplomats Say (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin And Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Tehran reportedly is gearing up for uranium enrichment. A split in the Security Council may impede efforts to halt the program.

VIENNA — With efforts to halt its nuclear program at an impasse, Iran is moving faster than expected and is just days from making the first steps toward enriching uranium, said diplomats who have been briefed on the program.

If engineers encounter no major technical problems, Iran could manufacture enough highly enriched uranium to build a bomb within three years, much more quickly than the common estimate of five to 10 years, the diplomats said.

Iran insists that it is interested only in producing electricity, which requires low-grade enrichment of uranium.

New information about Iran's program came from diplomats representing countries on the United Nations Security Council. They were briefed by senior staff of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which maintains monitors in Iran. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because the briefing was private.

Even as Iran apparently moves forward, diplomatic efforts to persuade it to halt its nuclear work appeared to be faltering in the face of distrust among powerful Security Council members and disagreements over the best strategy.

"We're getting conflicting signals from the United States; it now appears they want to escalate the situation," said a senior diplomat in Vienna. "The Russians see that as a slippery slope."

Officials said Iran was on the verge of feeding uranium gas into centrifuges, the first step toward enrichment. That move is in keeping with Iran's experience level and its previous statements, experts said.

According to one non-Western official who closely follows Iran's progress, engineers at a pilot plant in Natanz are likely to start crucial testing in the next couple of days to ensure that the centrifuges and the pipes connecting them are properly vacuum sealed. They are likely to begin feeding uranium hexafluoride gas into a series of 164 connected centrifuges within about two weeks, the official said.

Diplomats and experts say Iran has forgone usual testing periods for individual centrifuges and small series of linked centrifuges, instead apparently trying to put together as many as possible, as quickly as possible.

They said Iran also was likely to begin assembling more centrifuges in mid-April to put together additional cascades of linked centrifuges. The pilot plant can hold up to six cascades of 164 centrifuges each. It could take many months to complete that work, the diplomats said.

The U.S. and its British, French and German allies believe Iran intends to build nuclear weapons, and must be stopped before learning how to enrich uranium. They view the ability to operate a series of centrifuges as a technological tipping point.

"If you can do one centrifuge, you can do 164," said Emyr Jones Parry, British envoy to the U.N. "If you can do 164, you probably can do many more. That means you have the potential to do full-scale enrichment. If you can do enrichment up to 7%, you can do 80%. If you can do 80%, you can produce a bomb."

Policymakers watching Iran's program are making two separate assessments: a technical one based on Iran's ability to enrich uranium and a political judgment on whether Iran is attempting to make a bomb or merely trying to enrich uranium to a low level for civilian purposes, as Iranian officials insist.

The three-year time frame for Iran to produce a bomb cited by diplomats is the same as an estimate by former nuclear weapons inspector David Albright.

In a paper that will be released Monday by the Institute for Science and International Security, which Albright founded, he and a colleague give a detailed description of how, under a best-case scenario, Iran would be able to manufacture enough highly enriched uranium for a crude nuclear device in three years. Albright cautioned, however, that Iran faces many technical hurdles it might find difficult to overcome.

Gary S. Samore, a former nonproliferation expert at the National Security Council, now at the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, also said it was far more likely that the Iranians would encounter problems and that it could take them four to five years.

If Iran decides to make highly enriched uranium, it would need either to do so clandestinely, or leave the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which prohibits signatories from producing highly enriched uranium.

The IAEA board of governors reported Iran to the Security Council for failing to respond to requests from inspectors for information about its program, which it kept hidden for 18 years.

All the members of the Security Council agree that Iran should not be permitted to produce a bomb. Under an agreement with Russia and China, the council only began to discuss Tehran's case in mid-March. The next steps are hotly disputed.

The European Union and the Americans want to exert vigorous pressure on Iran. They insist on a reinstatement of a total moratorium on uranium enrichment that Iran had voluntarily put in place in late 2004 while negotiating with the EU. The U.S. and EU are willing to use a U.N. procedure that gives Security Council resolutions the force of law, and to impose sanctions.

The Russians and the Chinese, mindful of the buildup to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq three years ago, fear that taking too hard a line would lead to an escalation of tensions that could result in military action against Iran. They believe that sanctions and other measures might push Iran to abandon the nonproliferation treaty, which keeps international inspectors in the country.

Russia and China would be willing to allow Iran to retain a small cascade of centrifuges for research purposes.

The difference among the permanent Security Council members suggest it could be a long time before they reach a consensus.

"I don't think anyone can predict if there will be serious action in the Security Council," said Stephen G. Rademaker, acting assistant secretary of State for security and nonproliferation, in an interview this week.

The U.S. and its allies face the difficulty of allaying Russian suspicion that reporting Iran to the Security Council was a way to make the case for military action.

"The Russian concern is with the medium- and long-term plan: 'Where's it going?' " said a diplomat from a European Union country. "Even though we say military action is not an option, they have a concern that we're going down a route that ends up in a single place."

The diplomat said the West's counter-argument is that moving ahead in a unified way sends a signal that the five powerful permanent members of the Security Council are united and that Iran needs to listen.

However, getting Russia on board probably will be more difficult after a letter written by John Sawers of the British Foreign Office to his counterparts in the United States, France and German, was leaked this week. The letter touched on several issues, including the need for the U.S. to be involved in a package of incentives for Iran to halt its uranium enrichment, but it also made it clear that the U.S. and its European partners jointly were negotiating a position without consulting the Russians and Chinese.

"Moscow is unlikely to agree to anything devised behind its back and then presented as the sole solution possible," said Russian Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov.

In the meantime, the situation is changing daily as the Iranians move ahead.

"We're getting to the point where this fundamental difference between the U.S. and EU position and that of the Russians is being overtaken by Iran's … putting new facts on the ground," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a nuclear nonproliferation expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, who previously worked for the U.S. State Department on nuclear issues. "Iran is closer and closer to enrichment, so the effort to deny them the capability is rapidly failing."

AFP, March 25, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Europe next week for talks to be dominated by the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, diplomatic sources said.

The trip will begin Thursday in Germany and also take in France and Britain -- the three European Union countries that had led negotiations to press Iran to suspend all uranium-enrichment activities.

The German government confirmed that Rice would meet Chancellor Angela Merkel and Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin Thursday.

Government spokesman Thomas Steg told a press conference that their talks would cover a wide range of topics, including the Iranian nuclear crisis.

He said Rice's trip would also help prepare the way for Merkel's next visit to the United States in May when she is to attend the 100th anniversary celebrations for the American Jewish Committee in New York.

No press conference has been scheduled as yet during Rice's visit to Berlin.

Rice last came to Germany in December at the height of the controversy over European countries' reported involvement in clandestine CIA flights.

The diplomatic sources said Rice would stay in Berlin for a few hours Thursday before continuing on to Paris and then London.

Rice displayed impatience Thursday with slow UN talks on Iran's nuclear activities.

DOJ_NMG_0022250

"There is no time for delay in taking on this issue," Rice said of the discussions on a draft UN Security Council statement on Iran that has faced objections from Russia and China.

"There can't be any stalling. The international community has got to act."

A Western diplomat said Thursday that the UN Security Council would not reach agreement this week on a Franco-British statement demanding that Iran suspend all uranium-enrichment activities.

The diplomat, who asked not to be named, said the council's five veto-wielding permanent members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- were too far apart for a deal to be sealed this week.

Washington and its European allies have been pressing Tehran to suspend its uranium-enrichment activities and return to negotiations on economic and other incentives for abandoning any nuclear weapons aspirations.

Iran Dispute 'long Way' From Military Solution: US Army Chief (AFP)

AFP, March 24, 2006

The top US military officer said here that Washington does not consider military action as an immediate option to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

"Iran is a long way from needing any kind of military solution," General Peter Pace, the chairman of the US joint chiefs of staff, said in an interview with the NTV news channel during a visit to Turkey.

"The United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia-- other countries, certainly the Turkish government -- are all working to persuade the Iranian government to function in a way that is not dangerous or threatening to its neighbors, to have power, but not nuclear weapons power.

"There are many more things to be done politically and diplomatically before anybody, any country, considers some kind of a military option," he said.

Pace denied media speculation that the United States might be seeking the use of Turkish military bases for a possible strike on Iran, Turkey's eastern neighbor.

Earlier in the day, Pace addressed a conference on global terrorism in Ankara, and on Thursday met Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and the chief of general staff, General Hilmi Ozkok.

Sharon's Spirit, And Absence, Pervade Election (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 24 — On Ariel Sharon's 78th birthday a few weeks ago, those closest to him joined his two sons around the bedside where he lies, silent and comatose, in a hospital on a hill high above Jerusalem. They chatted and ate cake made by a friend of his late wife, Lily, using her recipe.

Uri Dan, a Sharon intimate and chronicler since 1954, was among them. "The Jewish Caesar is there alive," he said. People come up to Mr. Dan all the time to express their pain, he said.

"They knew they could sleep at night because he was not sleeping, that there was someone to guide the Zionist ship in a sea full of mines," he said. "They feel that the captain is gone."

Nearly three months after Mr. Sharon's major stroke on Jan. 4, his spirit hangs over this Israeli election, as the country prepares to give its verdict on Tuesday on Kadima, the centrist party he created.

Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, leaves Mr. Sharon's big chair empty at the center of the cabinet table and does not use the prime minister's office. Mr. Sharon's huge photo is wrapped around the suburban headquarters of Kadima, whose name means "forward," and the party's e-mail messages still come from kadimasharon.co.il.

Yet the image of Mr. Sharon, so recently considered the indispensable figure in Israeli politics, has now faded from the advertisements and even the television programs.

Mr. Olmert has carefully tried to extract himself from Mr. Sharon's huge shadow, forced by politics to create his own identity as a prime minister, and not just as a clever, cigar-smoking aide. He and Kadima pay every due respect to their fallen leader.

But it is their opposition, especially the Likud Party that Mr. Sharon broke apart, that uses Mr. Sharon's image more to portray the former general, whom the rump Likud battled to the end and regarded as a betrayer, as a heroic figure in contrast with their present foe, Mr. Olmert.

"Olmert's real race wasn't against the opposition," said Aluf Benn, a political correspondent for the daily Haaretz. "It was against the shadow, the candidate who isn't here: Sharon." By now, he said, "the public doesn't talk about Sharon very much."

But Mr. Sharon's absence has probably cost Kadima at least six parliamentary seats. His illness and a less dynamic group of contenders seem to have taken the passion out of an election that is about important issues, including the next Israeli pullout from the West Bank. Kadima is still well ahead in the polls, though complacency and an expected low voter turnout could hurt it.

Mr. Sharon is missed in the alleys of the Mahane Yehuda market, where Jerusalemites were shopping for the weekend amid the smells of spices, baking bread and freshly butchered meat.

"I think about him all the time," Leah Nakash, 70, said when asked about Mr. Sharon. She stopped to squeeze some tomatoes, then said: "I hope he'll get better, but I think there's no hope. We pray for him."

She would have voted for Mr. Sharon at the head of Kadima without a second thought, she said. Now, she is not so sure, torn between Mr. Olmert's Kadima and Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud. "It wasn't a very safe country with Sharon," Mrs. Nakash said. "But now, it's a little more dangerous."

Yitzik Sasson, 51, has four children and lives in the settlement of Qiryat Arba, where he works in security. He said that he had moved there less for ideology than for cheap housing, but that he would also have voted for Mr. Sharon. Now he is torn between Mr. Olmert's Kadima and Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu, a hawkish Russian-oriented party that wants to swap Arab Israeli towns for West Bank settlements.

Mr. Sharon has a great legacy, Mr. Sasson said, and the country is somber, but life continues. "Of course, I hope he'll get better," he said. "But he won't return to anything."

At first, Mr. Sharon's image was everywhere, and Kadima's first television spots emphasized his stewardship and his "team." But by the end of January, the party jingle was "Kadima Israel," not, as planned, "Kadima Sharon."

Eyal Arad, one of Mr. Sharon's closest political advisers, continues to advise Kadima. "Sharon founded Kadima, selected the people and Ehud Olmert to be his deputy," Mr. Arad said. Inside the new party, "there's a strong commitment to continue what he started to make happen," he said. "The emotional commitment is stronger than what you usually get in campaigns."

The focus groups continue to show strong attachment to Mr. Sharon, Mr. Arad said, as a guarantor of security. "Now he's gone, people wonder, 'What will happen to us?' They're looking for someone not with a particular policy statement, but someone who can continue the same path as Sharon."

The effort has been to portray Mr. Olmert and his team "as good enough people to follow in the footsteps of Sharon," Mr. Arad said. "People liked the center, and Sharon promised to build them a home there. They liked the builder. But the wish for the center and the liking of the plans doesn't disappear."

But there is less passion.

Mr. Dan, Mr. Sharon's friend and defender, is fiercely hopeful. Israel is "a country of at least a miracle a day," he said. "And we may find ourselves one day coming to Sharon, 80 and recovered, and asking him, 'Can you get us out of this mess?' "

But Idan Haroush, 23, like most Israelis, has no such faith. He works in his family's hardware shop; he wears an earring and a sweatshirt reading, "No Bad Power!"

"I'm very patriotic," he said. "I think about what Sharon did for the country. But Sharon is history, I'm sorry to say it."

As Israel Votes, Sharon's Vision Is Taking Hold (WSJ)

'Disengagement' Becomes The Best Hope for Security For Many Weary of Violence

JERUSALEM -- When Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon became incapacitated in January, his political agenda looked as if could suffer a similar fate.

But as Israeli voters prepare to go to the polls on Tuesday, Mr. Sharon's controversial vision for Israel has done more than survive. Kadima, the political party he created just weeks before suffering a brain hemorrhage, may score a sweeping victory, according to polls. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, previously Mr. Sharon's little-noticed deputy, is poised to ride Mr. Sharon's legacy to the prime minister's office.

That could mean important changes in Israeli policies, especially concerning relations with the Palestinians. And it could present new challenges for the U.S. and Europe when it comes to Middle East peacemaking. Under the 60-year-old Mr. Olmert's surprisingly assertive leadership, Kadima is pushing forward Mr. Sharon's ideas for reshaping Israel's future faster and more forcefully than Mr. Sharon did.

The party, whose name means "forward" in Hebrew, has embraced an idea that just a few years ago was so controversial few Israeli politicians spoke openly about its full implications for Israelis, Palestinians and the international community. Dubbed "disengagement," the idea is straightforward: Israel can't expect to negotiate a deal with the Palestinians or to crush them militarily, so it must separate from them by drawing its own borders based on what's best for Israel.

Mr. Sharon rarely spelled out what that could mean -- certainly not with the clarity Mr. Olmert has adopted. The notion of unilaterally setting borders flies in the face of decades of internationally backed Middle East peacemaking efforts. Those efforts, including the Bush administration's signature "road map" initiative, envision Israelis and Palestinians eventually negotiating mutually acceptable borders for two states with intertwined economies and a shared capital in Jerusalem.

The idea is also not simple to implement. Among the roughly seven million people of Israel, it almost certainly invites a nasty brawl, politically and literally, with supporters of nearly a quarter-million Jews who have settled in the West Bank during the decades of occupation. Many of those settlements would have to be dismantled to create the borders Kadima now favors drawing unilaterally. For the nearly four million Palestinians, it would mean having Israel impose frontiers that cut through land where they live and work without consulting or compensating them.

Some large settlements that Mr. Olmert has vowed Israel will keep jut far into the West Bank, cutting Palestinian cities off from one another. And for all sides it could mean managing a downward-spiraling Palestinian economy that leaves more Palestinians angry and, perhaps, violent.

A few analysts argue disengagement might lead in the end to a better solution for all sides. It would begin to roll back settlement expansion that has inflamed Palestinians for years. And if Hamas, the militant group swept to power in recent Palestinian elections, focuses more attention on Palestinians and less on attacking Israel, both sides could wind up curtailing the activities most provocative to the other. "You'll have two parallel processes," says Asher Susser, director of the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University. "Maybe in the end a better result emerges than you could get through negotiations."

But others worry that aggressive unilateral moves by Israel to set borders could enrage Arab governments, isolate Israel and subvert what has long been considered the only viable end game -- two states with mutually agreed borders.

For many Kadima supporters, the immediate goal is security. They don't see how negotiations or military force has made them safer. And Mr. Sharon, a longtime security hawk and settlements advocate, offered them a decisive way out.

Disengagement remains so closely associated with Mr. Sharon that supporters sometimes talk as if Mr. Sharon were still heading Kadima. "I wouldn't have voted for him in the past, but I like the path Sharon took," said Osnat Acker, a 24-year-old student from Jerusalem, at a Kadima rally where huge posters of Messrs. Sharon and Olmert hung side by side in large hall. "The last few years have been the worst. Sharon opened a way to end this situation. I'm pessimistic it will end, but if someone opens a gate, we have to try to go through it."

Many predicted that Kadima -- which Mr. Sharon formed by luring high-profile politicians from both the left-leaning Labor and right-leaning Likud parties -- would crumble without Mr. Sharon's forceful and popular personality at the helm. After Mr. Sharon's stroke, Mr. Olmert and a team of Mr. Sharon's longtime advisers held the party together by twisting arms behind the scenes and laying out the disengagement vision with a clarity and forcefulness Mr. Sharon himself never dared.

"Olmert has taken it much, much further than Sharon," said Avraham Diskin, a political scientist at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Disengagement might never have taken hold without Mr. Sharon. The son of Russian immigrants, he is a former general who participated in all of Israel's wars. As defense minister, he orchestrated Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982. He lost that job after an Israeli inquiry held him "indirectly responsible" for the massacre of Palestinian refugees by Israeli-allied Christian militiamen in a Beirut camp.

In and out of government, Mr. Sharon was a huge supporter of Israel's settlers. He encouraged thousands of Jews to move to the Palestinian-dominated West Bank and Gaza Strip, helping transform the settlement enterprise into a national and religious movement from the mid-1970s on.

Mr. Sharon became prime minister in 2001 as a period of relative calm between Palestinians and Israelis was coming unraveled. It was the fruitless end of a decade-long negotiation between the two sides that had become known as the Oslo Process. Mr. Sharon bitterly opposed it as offering far too much to the Palestinians.

His first years in office saw a spiral of violence. Radical Palestinian groups tapped what seemed like an endless reservoir of suicide bombers to kill Israelis. Israelis re-extended a taxing military occupation of Palestinian territory. Israel methodically assassinated the leaders of terrorist groups, sometimes hitting Palestinian bystanders in the strikes.

Then, in late 2003, came rumblings of change. Mr. Sharon sent his deputy, Mr. Olmert, to represent him at an annual commemoration day for Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion. In his speech, Mr. Olmert raised eyebrows with a vague call for Israeli leaders capable of making "a painful compromise."

His speech was widely viewed as a trial balloon -- Mr. Sharon testing public reaction to an explosive idea. Behind the scenes, he and his inner circle had decided on a plan that would be bitterly divisive for Israelis: dismantling all 21 settlements in Gaza. Containing about 8,000 Jews among about 1.3 million Palestinians, the settlements were simply too draining for Israel to defend, Mr. Sharon believed.

The notion of separating Israelis from the Palestinians had bubbled beneath the surface prior to this. Mr. Sharon had backed construction of a security barrier that attempted to divide the two populations -- and that helped reduce the number of suicide attacks. But Mr. Sharon always described the barrier -- a combination of walls, fences and checkpoints winding from north to south though the West Bank -- as merely a way to stop suicide bombers. When it cut deep into Palestinian-dominated areas, often dividing Palestinian towns and fields, he denied it constituted a border or had any political significance.

Mr. Sharon emptied Gaza and four West Bank enclaves of Jewish settlers in a tumultuous few weeks last year. Against expectations, his popularity rose among Israelis.

Still, many fellow conservatives, who cherished the settlers and saw any pullback as rewarding terrorists, were only beginning to realize the extent of Mr. Sharon's plans and his determination to carry them out. Some could scarcely believe one of the biggest backers of the settlement movement was now determined to clip its wings. Mr. Sharon made clear he had every intention of keeping the largest settlements. He also vowed to keep the whole of Jerusalem, which today is informally split into Israeli and Palestinian parts and contains holy sites for Jews, Muslims and Christians, though Israel controls the entire city.

When members of his own Likud Party challenged him late last year, however, Mr. Sharon again shocked Israelis by leaving a party he had been a part of for decades. He formed Kadima on Nov. 21, quickly pulling in important politicians from the Labor Party to go along with a cadre of conservatives who followed him out of Likud. Simultaneously, he began to prepare for next week's elections.

Within weeks, Mr. Sharon had reshaped Israel's political landscape. Then, on Dec. 18, he suffered a minor stroke. After a brief hospitalization, he was given a blood thinner and even went back to work, hammering out Kadima's lineup. But while resting on his farm in Southern Israel's Negev region on Jan. 4, Mr. Sharon suffered a massive brain hemorrhage. Israel was in crisis.

Mr. Olmert was named acting prime minister 20 minutes before midnight that evening. A highly defended motorcade picked him up at his home the next morning and whisked him to the prime minister's office. There, Mr. Olmert presided over an emergency meeting of the cabinet. Mr. Sharon's chair sat empty next to him.

Kadima had no plan for how to carry on without Mr. Sharon's towering presence. Even after Mr. Sharon's first stroke, discussion of a succession plan, "was like eating pork in a synagogue," said one senior Sharon adviser.

Kadima still had no finalized positions, no set list of candidates, not even an official No. 2 behind Mr. Sharon. Mr. Olmert wasn't particularly popular among Israelis, according to opinion polls taken before Mr. Sharon's incapacitation.

To prevent infighting, Mr. Olmert personally called members of Mr. Sharon's brain trust of private advisers and asked them to stay on. They urged Kadima members to remain on board. Kadima would crumble if they scurried back to their former parties now. Kadima needed, in the words of one Sharon adviser, "to stay in line."

The party overcame the immediate crisis a month later. With Mr. Sharon still unconscious, the dozen founding members of Kadima met behind closed doors in a room at the Knesset, Israel's parliament. There they voted unanimously to make Mr. Olmert Kadima's new leader, according to people familiar with the meeting.

Mr. Olmert, a lawyer who entered politics at age 28, had been mayor of Jerusalem for a decade before joining Mr. Sharon's government in 2003. Before Mr. Sharon's incapacitation, Mr. Olmert was an important player in Kadima, but hardly one of its more charismatic figures.

With the election just a few months away, Kadima strategists had been gearing up for a campaign built around Mr. Sharon -- especially his record as someone capable of leading Israelis down a difficult new path. They had also planned to be careful about outlining what exactly that meant.

Indeed, Mr. Sharon and his inner circle deliberately stopped short of even drafting a detailed internal plan for themselves. That would have involved naming settlements for evacuation, which would infuriate many Israelis. They also knew any talk of setting permanent borders unilaterally would encounter stiff resistance from the outside world, particularly Europe and the U.S. Mr. Sharon was a master of ambiguity, leaving all sides guessing but trustful enough to go along. Mr. Olmert and Kadima strategists soon decided that wouldn't work for him.

Another historic turn worked in favor of a more aggressive plan. In late January, Hamas won a sweeping victory in Palestinian elections. While Hamas stopped attacks in the past several months, the group still calls for the destruction of Israel. Potential Palestinian negotiating partners appeared further away than ever.

Kadima is now attempting to create a sense of a historic moment -- with Mr. Sharon still comatose but present in spirit at every turn in Kadima's campaign. Mr. Olmert now wants a clear electoral mandate for his plan to separate Israel from the Palestinians and draw permanent borders on Israel's terms.

Mr. Olmert has made clear that all but the biggest settlements outside the security barrier now under construction could find themselves outside Israel forever. Kadima, he states clearly, wants to set those borders within just a few years.

To gain support from the left, he has said that if a reasonable Palestinian negotiating partner emerges, he would negotiate those borders. To bolster his right, Mr. Olmert says the Israeli military would continue to occupy evacuated settlement lands so the Palestinians can't claim to have driven Jews from them. But he's hammered home that Kadima aims to establish permanent borders for Israel.

That message has resonated with voters so far. Recent polls show Kadima becoming the largest bloc in the Knesset, capturing perhaps as much as double the number of seats as Likud or Labor. Still, even with a strong showing, Kadima won't be able to rule without forming a coalition government. That could force Mr. Olmert to water down his agenda. Some predict the party will come unraveled as it tries to implement its plans in the years ahead.

Pollsters also caution that polls may not reflect the actual results. The number of undecided voters is unusually high, and it's unclear how many Israelis will turn out to vote in a campaign dominated by an untested new party.

But whatever the outcome, the appeal of separation isn't likely to evaporate with a Hamas-led government representing the Palestinians and an Israeli public tired of dealing with an occupation.

An Unloved Vote Winner (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

If Ehud Olmert next week fulfills a life-long ambition to become prime minister of Israel, it will not be on the basis of his personal popularity. In a telling response to pollsters, evidently running out of questions to ask the public in one of the country's least animated election campaigns, only one in eight Israelis queried said they would want him as a dinner partner.

It is a statistic that might floor a more sensitive candidate. But Mr Olmert has grown a tough skin during an abrasive political career spanning more than four decades in which he has rarely gone out of his way to court the public's affection.

Comparing him with his nearest rivals, Labour's Amir Peretz and Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu, Nadav Eyal, the daily Maariv's commentator, wrote: "The difference between him and the other two is that Olmert has never sought love. He just wants to win."

The acting prime minister is a career politician, a relatively rare phenomenon in a country that during its 58-year history has been principally governed at the top by a succession of founding fathers and ex-generals.

Absent is the whiff of cordite that trailed the likes of Ariel Sharon, perhaps the last example of a disappearing breed. Mr Olmert favours elegant suits, Havana cigars and a daily six-mile jog. It is a style perhaps better suited to a maturing Israeli state in which sociologists note the decline of ideology and the rise of a more hard-headed pragmatism, a longing for bourgeois normality in the midst of a deeply perceived existential threat.

The frontiersmen of the West Bank settlements, once fêted by rightwing politicians such as Mr Olmert, are rapidly going the way of the almost extinct socialist kibbutzniks as models of Zionist idealism.

So, even though they may not like him very much, enough Israelis are apparently prepared to vote for him next Tuesday as the standard-bearer of the new centrism to hand him sufficient seats to form the next coalition government. They probably would have preferred Mr Sharon as a safer and more experienced pair of hands. But the stroke that incapacitated the prime minister in January catapulted his successor into power earlier than had been expected.

The fact that his elevation owed more to accident than design did not mean, however, that it was one for which Mr Olmert had not long prepared. He is said to have dreamt of becoming prime minister since he was a boy growing up in the uncertain first decade of the new state, an ambition that was to win out over a parallel obsession with soccer.

He was born in 1945 to a Russian-born father and Ukrainian-born mother, activists in the militant rightwing Irgun that harried the British in the closing years of their mandate. His political home was the revisionist Herut party, a movement that brooded on the sidelines during the first three decades of Labour Zionist domination before coming to power in 1977 as the most ideological element of the rightist Likud bloc.

Unlike Mr Sharon, latest in a line of powerful mentors to whom he attached himself, Mr Olmert was a political princeling, heir to a pre-state tradition that dreamt of an Israel that would span both banks of the Jordan river. He was a member of the rightwing Betar youth movement and remains a loyal supporter of the Betar Jerusalem soccer team that bears its name. Mr Olmert, however, has travelled considerably further than many of his fellow fans, whose aggressive anti-Arabism has given the club a reputation for unbridled -jingoism.

While his political transformation in recent years is seen by some rivals as political opportunism, Mr Olmert never entirely fitted the mould of unreconstructed rightist. He first made his mark as a precocious 20-year-old, eight years before he was to become the youngest member of the Knesset, when he upbraided Menachem Begin, the veteran Herut leader, for losing six elections in a row and called on him to resign.

He was among those of Yitzhak Shamir's inner circle who in 1990 persuaded the then prime minister to start peace talks with the Palestinians and Israel's other Arab neighbours. A Herut heir, he married a committed leftwinger, the artist and writer Aliza Richter, of whom he joked: "Thirty five years of Aliza working on me are at last starting to bear fruit."

For a decade from 1993, Mr Olmert laboured in the relative backwater of the Jerusalem mayor's office after Mr Netanyahu, three years his junior, won the Likud leadership. He used his municipal role in part to promote the expansion of Jewish settlements around the city.

Mr Sharon summoned him back to national politics for the 2003 election, although the low 34th place he secured on the Likud electoral list was a reflection of his lack of popularity within the ruling party. He coveted the finance minister's post that went to Mr Netanyahu. But the consolation prize of the deputy premiership put him in poll position when Mr Sharon was felled by a stroke.

During Mr Sharon's second term, he emerged as the prime minister's most loyal ally and most trusted aide. He embraced and promoted Mr Sharon's politically risky plan to turn his back on a legacy of expansion and disengage unilaterally from Palestinian territories for which Israel had no long-term use. Both men argued it was the only way to preserve Israel's existence as both a democratic and Jewish state.

In some ways, Mr Olmert had moved beyond his mentor, who, despite a career aggressively promoting the settler cause, was ultimately seen as returning to his Labour Zionist roots.

Mr Olmert, who had long since burnt his bridges with much of the Likud leadership, is credited with encouraging Mr Sharon to abandon it and form the Kadima party as a platform for possible further territorial moves.

The new centrist faction has faltered slightly in opinion polls since Mr Sharon's exit from the political scene, but Mr Olmert's delicate handling of the succession has won him plaudits for statesmanship even among those who baulked in the past at his argumentative style.

He has declined to occupy the prime minister's seat until he earns it on his own merit and has been sparing in his usual sharp-tongued criticism of his rivals. His enemies on the right have nevertheless accused him of exploiting the Sharon legacy by posing as natural heir-apparent.

Apart from set-piece interviews, he has been remarkably absent from a generally low-key campaign. Perhaps it is the right approach towards an electorate that would not invite him for dinner.

Talk Of Peace Negotiations Has All But Ended In Israel (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

BINYAMINA, Israel - Drora Vered is tired of fruitless peace talks with the Palestinians; so tired that she supports completion of the contentious separation barrier that slices through parts of the West Bank.

"I want a wall," Vered said as she threw up her hands in her living room. "We're here, you are there and a wall in between us until we meet again."

The 58-year-old tour guide's view is shared by many Israelis, who are expected to endorse a risky strategic shift in Israel's quest for security. Few people who are preparing to vote Tuesday talk about peace. Instead, they talk about giving the next government a green light to set Israel's boundaries without negotiating with the Palestinians.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said that within four years he wants to shut down the more remote Jewish communities in the predominantly Palestinian West Bank, formally absorb the bigger Jewish settlements around Jerusalem and retain a protective military presence in the occupied valley near Jordan.

The "convergence plan" being pushed by the fledgling Kadima party, now headed by Olmert, is proving to be popular with voters such as Vered. But even some supporters of this unilateral approach concede that ignoring the Palestinians isn't likely to lead to long-term peace, much less near-term stability.

"Unilateralism cannot forge a lasting peace," said Yossi Alpher, a former director of the Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University who now runs the www.bitterlemons.org political Web site. "It can't forge any peace. Unilateralism creates a better territorial situation looking towards a peace process somewhere down the line."

Critics of the plan say it's likely to backfire. Instead of buying Israel a few years of stability, they warn, the idea of effectively seizing more West Bank land that's supposed to be part of a Palestinian state, walling Israel behind the separation barrier and retaining a military presence near Jordan will only inflame frustrations.

"I absolutely don't think there is a unilateral solution that works," said Shibley Telhami, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution's Saban Center for Middle East Policy. "It works fine as a tactical argument, but it isn't going to solve even the immediate problems. I don't think that worsening economic and political conditions in the Palestinian areas are going to be helpful to the Israelis."

In fact, Telhami said, a second settlement pullout could end up further empowering Hamas, the Islamist militant group that now dominates the Palestinian Authority. Hamas has argued that its suicide-bombing strategy was a main reason that Israel withdrew from the predominantly Palestinian Gaza Strip last summer.

Edward Abington, a former U.S. consul general who's now advising Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, said the plan as laid out by Olmert did little more than create more politically palatable Israeli domination.

"What the Israelis are saying is they've given up on any idea of any kind of agreement leading to statehood with the Palestinians," Abington said. "What they have settled on instead is reorganizing the occupation in a way where, by Israeli calculations, they will be more secure and suffer less in the way of casualties. It's not stable."

Unilateralism has quickly become Israel's populist political movement. And, for the first time, Israelis will have a chance to formally endorse the idea.

When Ariel Sharon became prime minister in 2001, he publicly rebuffed talk of abandoning some 250,000 Jews living in disputed West Bank and Gaza Strip settlements amid millions of Palestinians under Israeli military rule.

So many people were shocked in 2004 when Sharon unveiled his plan to raze all 21 Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip and end Israel's military presence in the coastal region, which is home to 1.3 million Palestinians.

Israel's pullout from Gaza last summer won broad support from the Israeli public, and Sharon was considering a similar plan for the West Bank when his political career was cut short by a debilitating stroke in January.

Olmert, then Sharon's second-in-command, stepped in as acting prime minister and leader of the new breakaway Kadima party, which is expected to win the most parliamentary seats Tuesday.

Olmert has made it clear that he'll form a coalition government only with smaller political parties that support the idea of a partial West Bank pullout.

"I want to make this clear, so that no one is in any doubt: I intend to implement this plan," Olmert told Israeli television last week. "Anyone who does not wish this plan to be implemented will not be in my coalition. I do not intend to compromise on the details of the plan. This is the plan, and there is no other."

The idea of going it alone has gained greater cachet since Hamas won control of the Palestinian Authority through elections in January.

Hamas has ruled out recognizing Israel as a nation, much less negotiating with it. That's allowed Israeli politicians to shun Hamas as a potential partner and has given more credence to the unilateral proposal.

Miri Eisin, a former intelligence officer in the Israel Defense Forces, said that, while risky, unilateralism was the only option Israel had now.

"Anybody will tell you that you can't define a border unilaterally; that's an oxymoron," Eisin said. "But the alternative is to negotiate, and that's not feasible with Hamas."

Eisin admits that peace isn't on the horizon, but she sees no other alternative after years of suicide bombings and peace talks that produced few stable results.

"It's a different mood," she said. "Israelis don't talk about peace. We talk about nonviolence. We talk about separation. The last five and a half years have pretty dramatically changed the Israeli society's psyche and the political realpolitik."

'Everything Is Open' (NSWK)

Even with a clear front runner in next Tuesday's Israeli parliamentary elections, the makeup of the future government—and its relations with Hamas—remain uncertain.

Mahmoud Zahar is an unlikely expert on Israeli politics. In the almost two decades since he helped to found the Islamist group Hamas, Zahar has lived through six Israeli election cycles. But the most important lesson his experience has taught him is that predicting the results is a fool's errand—even in a year when one party seems poised to dominate. "Israeli society is divided into so many parties and sectors," Zahar told NEWSWEEK earlier this week at his Gaza City home. "Even in one party there are different sectors." Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima bloc may seem poised to crush its nearest rivals in next Tuesday's parliamentary polls. But Zahar knows the real game doesn't begin until the postelection horse-trading starts—an inevitability in a nation where 15 different parties are likely to win seats in Parliament, and none a majority. "In Israel, everything is open," Zahar says.

On the surface, this year's contest has been one of the least dynamic in recent memory. Despite a string of jarring plot twists—like the incapacitating illness of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the surprise victory of Hamas in January's Palestinian elections—the poll numbers have hardly budged. The latest projections suggest Kadima will win roughly 37 of Israel's 120 Knesset seats, Amir Peretz's Labor Party around 19 seats and Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud Party about 14—pretty much exactly where they were three months ago. Olmert's numbers jumped slightly after Israeli troops raided a Jericho prison a week and a half ago and seized a Palestinian militant. But a week later, they were right back to preraid levels. So much for what the pundits were calling "the Jericho effect."

What accounts for the stability? A lack of disruptive suicide attacks, to start. In 1996, Likud candidate Netanyahu came from behind to defeat Labor's Shimon Peres—thanks largely to intensified attacks from Zahar's associates in Hamas. "If they lose their security just before the election, they are not going to vote for the present government," says Zahar. But this year, Hamas seems committed to at least a short-term truce. Of course, that doesn't mean it can control all the factions in the Palestinian territories, and last-minute attacks could still shake up the numbers. Just last week, Israeli police chased down a van on the main highway from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv after the Shin Bet security service warned of a possible imminent attack. As helicopters swooped overhead in pursuit, traffic backed up for miles. When Israeli troopers stormed the van, they discovered an unexploded 15-pound bomb.

As the Israeli campaign limps into its final days, there are some signs that hard-liners are beginning to make gains. One surprise candidate: Avigdor Lieberman, a controversial Russian immigrant whose Israel Beitenu Party advocates shifting some Israeli Arab villages to Palestinian control. Lieberman's bloc could win as many as 10 seats in the Knesset, a dramatic jump from the early days of the campaign. But the gains would come partly at the expense of disenchanted hawks in Likud. And Lieberman's surge probably owes more to his catchy ad campaign than to any bedrock shift in the Israeli electorate. Lieberman's secret weapon from America: Republican Party strategist Arthur Finkelstein, a veteran of Israeli campaigns who helped supercharge Israel's political system by introducing the techniques of modern campaigning in the 1996 election cycle. In this campaign, Israelis all over the country are repeating Lieberman's catchy tagline in Russian: "Nyet, Nyet, Da" (No, No, Yes). Even rival strategists, like Kadima media boss Eyal Arad, admit Lieberman's ads are some of the best of the campaign. (For a look at some of the Israeli political ads, see "Air Power: A Fight for the Last Voter.")

If Hamas was one architect of Netanyahu's victory in 1996, Arad was the other. As Netanyahu's campaign manager in that contest, Arad deftly exploited Israeli security fears. But Arad switched loyalties when Sharon abandoned Likud and now finds himself in a unique position to savage his former boss. Kadima's attack ads in this cycle have made quick work of Netanyahu. The most effective one: a smarmy image of Netanyahu's face with a simple voice-over: "Once was enough." Arad's tougher challenge has been to convince swing voters that Olmert is as dynamic a character as Sharon, who is still in a coma and not expected to recover. These voters "lean toward Kadima," Arad told NEWSWEEK recently at his party's Tel Aviv production offices. "But they're hesitant about Olmert." Yet ads alone can't do much to shape these kinds of long-term perceptions. Only time—and not a few external factors—can do that.

Zahar's Hamas organization is perhaps the ultimate X factor. Around the same time Israelis will vote next week, Zahar is expected to be named the Palestinian Authority's new foreign minister. Saddled with crushing budget shortfalls, Zahar will travel the Middle East trying to woo potential donors. It won't be easy. So far, "nobody is committed except Saudi Arabia," Zahar says. And that's where Olmert's real problems could start. For now, Hamas is busy trying to seat its own government and has little interest in antagonizing Israel as it attempts to recover aid money. But if the economy continues to deteriorate, "the people are not going to allow Israel to starve them," Zahar warns. Such a situation could lead to what Zahar describes—a little menacingly—only as "problems. For us, and the Israelis." Olmert and Kadima may well weather the fire from their political opponents in Tuesday's election. But in the Middle East, the real trouble often starts only after the returns are in.

Israeli Arabs Feel Little Stake In Vote (LAT)

By Laura King, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

As they gear up for polls, some in the minority electorate say they feel cut off from the state.

NAZARETH, Israel — Lounging in the doorway of a dress shop just down the street from the towering Basilica of the Annunciation, Majdoline Mimo shook her curly head and clucked her tongue at the mention of Israel's elections Tuesday.

"I'll cast a blank ballot," the young Israeli Arab woman said, as her girlfriends nodded in agreement. "I don't see any party that really represents my goals."

Arab citizens of Israel make up 13% of the country's eligible voters, and if numbers alone were what counted, they would be a powerful political bloc, eagerly courted by all sides. Instead, the mood among the Arab electorate is largely one of listlessness. Pollsters are forecasting that their turnout will be low, and those who do vote are likely to divide their support among a number of small Arab parties.

In Nazareth, Israel's largest Arab-dominated city and the town where Jesus is believed to have spent his boyhood, nearly all those asked said they felt cut off from the Jewish state and its institutions. But according to the polls, up to one-fifth of Arab voters will nonetheless cast ballots for one of the mainstream Israeli parties.

Israel's left-leaning Labor Party is expected to attract considerable numbers of Arab voters, in part because of its leftist platform and in part because it is headed by Amir Peretz, a Moroccan-born Jew whose native language is Arabic.

"Everyone is saying we should vote for the Arab parties, because they are our own people, but to me it is throwing the vote away," said Azhar abu Hamad, 19, in Nazareth. She said she would vote for Meretz, the most leftist of what people here call the "Zionist" parties.

Three Arab parties are likely to divide the rest of the Arab vote among themselves, for a total of about 10 of the 120 seats in the Knesset, or parliament.

A political bloc of that size can often wield disproportionate clout under Israel's parliamentary system by positioning itself as a swing vote. But the Arab parties tend to be sidetracked by their differing ideologies, which run from Islamist to communist.

"If we ran a single Arab list of candidates, everyone would have to pay more attention to us in the parliament," said Yusef Habiballah, a student from a village outside Nazareth. "But it seems we can't find a way to unite."

Some commentators have predicted an "echo effect" from the triumph of the militant group Hamas in January's Palestinian elections, with a surge in support for Islamists. But others say they do not see these candidates winning a much larger following than usual — in part because the Islamic movement is split into two factions, one of which is boycotting the balloting.

In Nazareth, where tensions between Christians and Muslims occasionally boil over into violence, many expressed nervousness over a vote boycott called by a little-known Islamic group calling itself Ansar Allah, or Followers of God. The group distributed fliers describing the Knesset as a defamer of the prophet Muhammad.

Boycott calls have come from secular Arabs as well, including some intellectuals who see the vote as an exercise in colonialism because Israel's Arab citizens are a downtrodden minority.

Joblessness and poverty rates are much higher among Israeli Arabs than among the Jewish majority. Arabs as a rule do not serve in the Israeli army, which gives many young Israelis a boost in their career prospects.

Arab cities and towns inside Israel receive substantially less funding than Jewish municipalities. And a poll last week suggested that a majority of Israeli Jews regard Arab citizens as a threat to national security.

"People feel disaffected, certainly," said Sammy Smooha, a University of Haifa sociologist who specializes in Israeli Arab issues. "Many Arab citizens feel that Jews view them as disloyal to Israel."

Most of the Arab candidates use their campaign appearances to drive that point home. At a town hall-type gathering in a Nazareth neighborhood last week, Azmi Bishara, a candidate for the nationalist Balad party, told the crowd: "Israel sees you only as a demographic liability."

"Our situation today is that of citizens without true citizenship," Ahmed Tibi, running on the ticket of the Arab Party for Change, told the Haaretz newspaper.

Most Israeli Jews paid little attention to campaign events on the Arab side. Somewhat tellingly, the debate among the main candidates of the Arab parties took place not on Israeli television, but on Al Jazeera, the pan-Arab satellite channel.

This month, the government of acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert proposed an initiative to guarantee more civil service jobs to Arab citizens, a gesture that even Israeli media described as an election ploy.

"Whenever the elections approach, the political establishment suddenly remembers that a fifth of the country's population is Arab, and that they are deprived," the mass-circulation Yediot Aharonot newspaper said in a commentary. "So all of a sudden, a program is devised for aid, rehabilitation, recovery…. It is very doubtful that even a small portion of this money finds its way to the Arab sector."

All the Arab parties have their own take on what is a central dilemma for Israeli Arabs: whether they should identify more strongly with their Palestinian brethren in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or seek to strengthen their own identity within Israel.

Balad, for example, calls for Israel to recognize Arab citizens as a national minority and grant them control over their own governing and cultural institutions. The communist-inspired Hadash party has advocated changing Israel's exclusively Jewish national symbols, including the Star of David on the flag.

But as the elections approached, many Arab voters acknowledged an overpowering sense of weariness with the political process.

"There are so many problems for which there seem to be no real solution," said Ayad Mahroun, a young Nazareth woman who said she would vote for Hadash, but only because she felt it was her civic duty. "We are looking for equality," she said, "and no election will bring that."

AFP, March 25, 2006

The Security Council was set to ask UN chief Kofi Annan next week to strike a deal with Lebanon on creating an international tribunal to try suspects in the murder of Lebanon's ex-premier, Argentina's ambassador said.

DOJ_NMG_0022259

Cesar Mayoral, the president of the Security Council for March, told reporters that the 15-member body would vote Tuesday on a French-drafted resolution urging Annan to negotiate an accord on the tribunal for suspects in the slaying of Rafiq Hariri.

Diplomats said the text was virtually certain to be adopted.

The draft, made available Friday, also asks Annan "to submit in a timely manner for the consideration of the Council a report on the implementation of this resolution ... including options for a funding mechanism appropriate to ensure the continued and effective functioning of the tribunal."

In a report released Tuesday, Annan suggested creation of a mixed tribunal involving Lebanese and international judges that "would best balance the need for Lebanese and international involvement in the work of the tribunal."

"That balance would be determined by such important characteristics as the tribunal's founding instrument, applicable law, location, composition and financial arrangements," it added.

It noted that Lebanese authorities believe that for security reasons the court should be established outside Lebanon.

The UN Security Council last December authorized Lebanon to create a special tribunal for the murder of Hariri and 20 others in a February 2005 bombing in downtown Beirut.

Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz, who is currently leading a six-month UN probe of the slaying, last week cited progress in the investigation but stressed that Syrian cooperation would be crucial to make further headway.

Two previous reports by Brammertz's predecessor, German prosecutor Detlev Mehlis, had suggested top-level Syrian involvement in the assassination plot, and blasted Damascus for failing to cooperate and actively seeking to mislead the investigation.

Syria, the longtime powerbroker in Lebanon, has denied any involvement in Hariri's murder and accused the UN panel of political bias.

From Dreamer To Contender (NSWK)

By Stephen Glain

Newsweek, March 25, 2006

Even though a national election isn't scheduled, human-rights activist Chibli Mallat is running for president. And his chances of winning are looking better all the time.

Chibli Mallat, a Lebanese human-rights lawyer and activist, is campaigning as an independent for his country's presidency. That makes him unique, for two reasons: First, in Lebanon's highly factionalized politics, no one gets anywhere without belonging to an ethnic or religious clan. Second, there are no scheduled elections to contest. Last year's Cedar Revolution, ignited by the killing of the Sunni political leader Rafik Hariri, may have put an end to Syria's decades-long occupation of Lebanon, but Syrian proxy Emile Lahoud remains as the country's president. Pro-democracy groups engaged in a so-called National Dialogue have as yet failed to hatch a plan to remove Lahoud without provoking a violent backlash from Damascus.

Nonetheless, political groups are jockeying for power, inspired in part by what they say is stiff pressure on Syria from Arab governments—in particular Saudi Arabia, which enjoyed close ties with Hariri—in favor of a peaceful transition of power in Lebanon. The 46-year-old Mallat's own poll numbers meanwhile, indicate he has reached spoiler status. This month, Lebanon's Maronite patriarch, the leader of the country's largest Christian sect, gave the candidate what was interpreted by some as a passive endorsement, and the Saudi and Iranian ambassadors have requested interviews with Mallat. He spoke with NEWSWEEK's Stephen Glain this week. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: What are the odds that Syria will remove Lahoud anytime soon?

Chibli Mallat: Considering that everyone in the National Dialogue accepts there is a crisis in the presidency that needs to be addressed and the only way to address it is with a new president, the likelihood is much higher today than it was two months ago. You could have a new president in a week or a month.

What makes you think Lahoud's presidency may be in jeopardy?

The Syrians will hang on to him as much as they can, but eventually they will cut their losses because Arab leaders are pressuring them to do so. It's because of Saad Hariri [Rafik's son and a political leader]. He is saying "I want him out," and the Saudis will not go against him on this, though the pressure is clandestine. The atmosphere has changed to the point where the Saudis are saying, "Let's agree on [a Lahoud successor]" rather than "let's not stir up change in Lebanon."

Assuming Lahoud goes and an election is scheduled, how do you rate your chances?

The [candidate] that is least objectionable to everyone involved is probably me, because while I belong to this Cedar Revolution atmosphere, I am not directly associated with or against any one camp. The patriarch came out with specifications for a best-candidate's profile—someone young, educated, middle of the road—which was read widely to be a reference to me. Since I announced my campaign, I've propelled my image from innocuous dreamer to one of the contenders on the public radar.

We had a poll done this week between me and [Gen. Michel] Aoun and the result was 59 percent for Aoun and 40 percent for Mallat, which is significant [considering] when I started out.

What is it about you that appeals to voters?

There is a sense of relative youth, a sense of novelty that is not available with other candidates, who are all either steeped in blood like Aoun or were in arrangements with the Syrians to be deputies of one thing or another. Most important, the political movement in Lebanon is a movement of the professional class, the middle class, and that is my profile. It is a revolt of the bankers and lawyers. To see them in the street is very unusual in Lebanon.

The leaders of the National Dialogue seem to be maneuvering to simply name a successor rather than hold an election. Wasn't the Cedar Revolution all about the popular yearning for a pluralist democracy?

Of course. But people in this country are so tired of violence in politics they don't see the importance of democratic competition. In democracy, there is the notion that the losers of today will be the winners of tomorrow. That alternation game is the essence of democracy, but there is a sense that Lebanon is so fragile and people are obsessed with consensus. The only practical alternative in my view is to allow the constitutional process to play itself out in the form of an election. That way, hopefully, the best person will emerge.

President George W. Bush continues to make the spread of democracy the cornerstone of his foreign policy. Does that sustain you?

I support his policy wholeheartedly. We activists in the human-rights community have been calling for democracy for years, and now that the Americans are embracing it, we won't turn back. My only request is that the policy be imposed without exemption. It is easy to attack Syria on the basis that it is not democratic, but it is important that the [United States] apply the same standards to Egypt, to push for peaceful change at the top there. That also includes Tunisia, which is an extraordinary dictatorship, and of course Israel, which is ruining the lives of millions of people under its occupation. The Bush administration must do something positive on this to show his call for freedom and democracy is not opportunistic.

Is the United States doing enough to pressure Syria to allow Lebanon full independence?

Short of sending 100,000 Marines to Damascus, my sense is the U.S. policy on Damascus is the correct one. I don't think sanctions would be useful in any way, and in fact they've proved counterproductive elsewhere. The Syrians are not behaving well on a number of fronts, including in Lebanon, and that will continue. But most worryingly, what we're seeing in Syria is that the country is going down the path of domestic violence. Every few days we hear of skirmishes and numbers of people killed. This touches a broad spectrum of the population, which is increasingly unhappy. It really has nothing to do with Lebanon, and it is bound to get worse.

Disgraced Defense Contractor Planned To Promote Democracy In Iran (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a new example of disgraced defense contractor Mitchell Wade's attempts to exert influence in Washington and beyond, Wade and two business partners formed a nonprofit group in 2004 to promote democracy in Iran, according to documents and interviews.

Wade and the two partners, who have been large contributors to Republican political campaigns, formed the Iranian Democratization Foundation in April 2004, according to incorporation papers filed in Washington.

The timing coincides with a push by opponents of the theocratic regime in Tehran to appropriate more money for democracy programs.

In November 2004, Congress approved spending $3 million to promote democracy in Iran. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last month asked Congress for a large boost in funding, to $75 million.

Behrooz Behbudi, who helped incorporate the foundation, said in a telephone interview that Wade "was supposed to get funds from the Congress" for the project. The two later fell out over business dealings in Iraq, Behbudi said.

Wade, who headed contractor MZM Inc., pleaded guilty last month to bribery-related charges and making illegal campaign contributions. His chief congressional patron, former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, pleaded guilty in November to taking bribes.

Wade's dealings, which include contracts MZM received from Pentagon intelligence agencies, are under investigation.

A phone call to Wade's lawyer seeking comment wasn't immediately returned.

Much is still unclear about the Iranian Democratization Foundation, including whether it ever took in money or carried out any activities. It was dissolved in November 2004 and apparently never filed federal disclosure forms required of nonprofits with more than $25,000 in income.

The foundation's existence was first reported this month by the Web log Talking Points Memo.

Behbudi, who lives in West Vancouver, Canada, and whose family was close to the late shah of Iran, said Wade apparently saw him as a conduit for helping expand his activities in the Middle East.

Behbudi said he was introduced to Wade by New York-based real estate developer Sonny Lee, the third officer of the foundation. The foundation's listed address was the same as MZM's.

"We wanted to bring freedom to the people of Iran, freedom from the mullahs," Lee said in a brief telephone interview. The project was stopped "after the government told us they would take care of that themselves," he said. He didn't elaborate.

Behbudi and Lee donated heavily to Republican political causes, according to federal records.

Behbudi gave $17,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 2003 and $1,250 to President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign.

Lee gave at least $41,250 to the Senatorial Committee and $2,000 to Bush. A biography on the Rotary Club of New York's Web site says Lee was twice awarded the Medal of Freedom by the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Lee, chairman of the Great American International Development Corp., called Wade "a good Christian man" and said they met through Wade's wife, Christiane.

Behbudi said he and Wade had a deal to try to get a contract to rebuild the gutted Central Bank of Iraq headquarters building in downtown Baghdad.

Behbudi said he traveled twice to Baghdad soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime and "came up with the most beautiful building" design for the new headquarters.

"Mitch was supposed to come up with the contracts and secure the funds. I was supposed to do the work," Behbudi said. But, he said, Wade never paid him for the design work.

Behbudi's account couldn't be independently confirmed. He said he had a signed contract with Wade, but had to check with his business partners before making it public.

Available contracting records show MZM got one contract for Iraq reconstruction, a $5 million award in March 2003 to provide linguists and interpreters for the Pentagon.

Cultivating The Seeds Of Democracy (LAT)

By Anwar Ibrahim, Anwar Ibrahim Is A Former Finance Minister And Deputy Prime Minister Of Malaysia. He Is A Visiting P

SINCE 9/11, the United States has pursued what the White House calls a "forward strategy of freedom" predicated on the belief that a dearth of democracy in Muslim countries has led to the spread of a deadly strain of Islamic extremism. Emboldened by a hard-won ideological victory over the regimes in Eastern Europe during the Cold War, the U.S. once again has sought to foment democracy abroad to ensure security at home.

However, as the first returns come in on this democratization effort in the Muslim world, there is growing anxiety in the U.S. about the resulting character of these nascent, freely elected governments. Some have begun to even question whether these countries have the innate ability to sustain democracy.

Although it cannot be denied that U.S. initiatives for reform have contributed significantly to developments in the Middle East, fear is growing that radicals may hijack democracy. Recent Islamist electoral successes in Iran, Egypt and the Palestinian territories have given rise to questions about the ability of liberal forces to prevail against fundamentalism.

For the United States, the fear is real, though perhaps tinged with a bit of Islamophobia: How terrible an irony it would be if this grand effort to spread liberty abroad resulted in anti-U.S. Islamic states imposing Sharia, or Islamic law, on their people.

The example of Hamas' ascension in Gaza and the West Bank presents obvious difficulties. But it would be fallacious to assume that it was democracy that voted in Islamic extremism. More correctly, it was the years of corruption and abuse of power of the Fatah-led administration that voted Hamas into power. If the exercise of democracy is about venting the people's anger and dissatisfaction with the powers that be, then the outcome was a foregone conclusion.

Be that as it may, there are some who say that "stability" not liberty is what the U.S. should be promoting throughout the Islamic world. Their view is that championing electoral democracy does not immediately serve U.S. interests abroad, particularly in the war on terrorism, and that the hearts and minds of terrorists and suicide bombers are not turned by the virtues of democracy. They say the war against terrorism must be waged with an iron hand, not kid gloves woven from the fabric of constitutional liberties.

These views on democracy and stability in the Muslim world are not only wrong but carry grave consequences.

In a way, Washington's strategy may be viewed as expiation for past sins, when the U.S. was a stumbling block to democracy in the Middle East. Iran was a democracy in 1953 when the CIA engineered the coup that transformed it into an absolute monarchy. The U.S. also has supported other tyrants in the region, including, of course, Saddam Hussein. All of this in the name of stability and security in the decades-long confrontation with the communist bloc.

Is Washington really caught between the Scylla of supporting dictators and the Charybdis of promoting democracies that could bring Islamist radicals to power?

THE BEST ANSWERS to the question of whether America should reassess its strategy lie in Indonesia and Turkey, refreshing examples of Muslim democratic self-assertion.

Seven years ago, Indonesia plunged headlong into democracy after more than 30 years of autocratic dictatorship. As the largest Muslim nation in the world, it stands out as perhaps the most significant political phenomenon in the recent history of democracy. Indonesians have gone to the polls twice since, and they overwhelmingly rejected the Islamist radicals, who then tried to push their agenda through other avenues. Again, this was met with a resounding "no" by the Indonesian people, including major Muslim organizations.

The press in Indonesia is free, and the elections are fair. Fundamental liberties are enshrined in the constitution and fully recognized and respected by the powers that be. For example, unlike in neighboring Malaysia, Indonesians may gather to protest government decisions and policies without fear of reprisals. Arbitrary arrests and political detentions are unheard of.

As fledgling democracies, Indonesia and Turkey still have a long way to go. In Indonesia, it is in fulfilling the socioeconomic objectives of democracy that can only happen over time. In Turkey, the containment of an unrestricted military establishment has aided in that country's European Union ascension. Nevertheless, they now stand as beacons, both for Muslim nations and for those who seek to help them.

To be successful in its efforts to spread freedom, the U.S. must remember that constitutional democracy cannot take root in a society, whether secular or Islamic, without the firm commitment of the politically empowered to protect the fundamental rights to liberty, equality and freedom of all.

The true cultivation of democracy requires more than simply the introduction of elections. It also requires the establishment of democratic processes and a leveling of the political playing field. It needs the guarantee of a separation of powers and the liberation of the judicial system from the stranglehold of autocrats and tyrants. Most of all, it requires the protection of fundamental liberties and a free press.

It is in these prerequisites of democracy that the U.S. and the Muslim world need to invest, with far more significant effort, for the causes of liberty to truly prevail.

Braving Jail For Democracy, But Is That A Goal Or A Tool? (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

CAIRO

WHAT makes a person go to jail for his beliefs and fortifies that person to hold strong while the moments of life — weddings, births, deaths — pass by?

Essam el-Erian missed six and a half years of freedom for his political work. In that way he has something in common with those who accepted prison to call for freedom from the oppression of the Soviet Union. He shares something in common with Riad Seif, a former prisoner in Syria who was recently released after serving more than five years for his democracy work, and Ayman Nour, sentenced to five years hard labor in Egypt after challenging the governing party's monopoly on power.

But Mr. Erian's push for democracy does not sit as well with those in the West, namely the United States and Europe, because while he calls for free elections, freedom of speech and due process, he freely admits that he wants those political changes to help bring Islamic law to Egypt. His critics believe that religious-based organizations like his want to use the mechanics of democracy to achieve power, but have no intention of actually supporting democratic values or practices.

"It is a duty to do it, it is a religious duty," Mr. Erian, 52, said when asked about his motivation. "I put my first footprint in this way more than 35 years ago, to save myself. Of course it may be difficult to understand, but secondly, it is to save our people. Our people look like slaves to dictatorships, and Islam came to release people from slavery to be only slaves of the God."

Mr. Erian is a leading figure within the Muslim Brotherhood, a fundamentalist Islamic organization that is technically illegal in Egypt but is officially tolerated. He has worked for decades to help the group emerge from years in the underground as Egypt's only real political opposition. He was released in October after his latest stretch in prison, five and a half months, and got right back to work, rejoining the ranks of the Brotherhood just as its members won 88 seats in Parliament, a small step toward realizing his dreams.

Yet, facing an increasingly intolerant government, Mr. Erian operates on a short leash, which can snap back at any time. On Wednesday, for example, as he tried to board a flight to attend a conference in Bahrain, he was stopped at passport control and denied permission to leave the country. No reason was given.

If he has his way, the Brotherhood will follow in the footsteps of Hamas, the militant Palestinian organization that won parliamentary elections in January. And that, critics say, is precisely the problem. The Brotherhood, they say, is professing fealty to democracy only to gain power, after which it intends to dismantle democratic practices.

Mr. Erian is clear about his agenda: transforming Egypt into his vision of an Islamic state, where the Koran is not just the basis of all law, as in Egypt today, but where it is the law. But he rejects those who say he and the Brotherhood are antidemocratic.

"The main goal of Islam is to liberate people," he said during an interview in the office of the Muslim Brotherhood on the banks of the Nile here. "The way that you can apply liberty in your life now is democracy. All are linked. They come from the same source. Of course you can find many, many Muslims, or the majority of Muslims, who do not understand that, but Hassan al-Bana, who is the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, said that freedom, liberty is one of the main pieces of Islam."

MR. ERIAN was born in a small village in Giza, called Nahya, not far from the Pyramids. His father was a teacher, and like most of the people in the village, he was raised observant, praying five times a day and fasting during the holy month of Ramadan. But he heard the call — to faith and politics — after an accident. He said he was about 15 years old when he was nearly electrocuted by touching the exposed wires on a lamp.

"I went to the street alone and asked myself, 'What am I living for?' "

For a teenager, the answer was found in the Muslim Brotherhood. "When I found the Muslim Brothers, of course, it was very good help for me because I put all my efforts in clear strategy, clear techniques, clear tasks," he said.

Mr. Erian, one of the two brightest students in his village, was selected to study medicine in Cairo. While in school, he joined a whole class of young people who were working to transform the Brotherhood with pragmatic ideas and a strategy of pushing the group into politics. Alarmed, the government struck back, and Mr. Erian, as the vanguard of that new generation, often felt the heat personally. He eventually earned a master's degree in clinical pathology but never managed to finish his medical training because he was sent to jail, he said.

Mr. Erian served in the Egyptian Parliament from 1987 to 1990 as an independent, because the Brotherhood could not run candidates as an outlawed group. In 1995 he was sentenced to five years in prison for belonging to a banned group that sought to create an Islamic state in Egypt. That conviction automatically disqualified him from running for public office again.

The Brotherhood has a violent past, and was outlawed after its members tried to assassinate Gamal Abdel Nasser even before he became president. Now it has to contend with that not-so-subtle undercurrent of suspicion that Mr. Erian and others are opportunists looking to ride the coattails of democracy to power — with no intention of then ever letting go. American policy makers have gone so far as to say they refuse to speak with the Brotherhood because of its illegal status. Recently, however, a British publication, The New Statesman, published documents on its Web site leaked from the British Embassy in Cairo in which an analyst there said that it was time to begin at least an informal dialogue with the Brotherhood.

MR. ERIAN bridles at the policy of opposing the Brotherhood because of what it might do, saying it diverted attention from more substantive issues. "The problem is that our rulers in this region are in power for half a century or more, supported by the states and they don't leave power," he said. "You are afraid that somebody else can come to power and not give away. Let us put guarantees to prevent this. Don't prevent people from change because you are afraid or because you are weak. Strengthen yourself, don't weaken the others."

Mr. Erian has picked supporters outside Islamic ranks. Saad Eddin Ibrahim, a Western-educated pioneer in pressing Egypt's government for accountability who found himself imprisoned some years ago for his trouble, said he trusted Mr. Erian. "Probably because of his moderate attitude and his outstanding leadership qualities, Mubarak's regime put Essam el-Erian behind bars," wrote Mr. Ibrahim while he was in jail. "So, let all the free people in Egypt and the world unite with him.

"Hands off Essam el-Erian, Mubarak!"

That call never did resonate, in Washington or Europe. But Mr. Erian said he did not care much, because he took the risks in support of his faith. "It is only to obey my God," he said.

U.S. Revokes Visa Of Pakistani Senator (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Musharraf Critic Was to Be State Dept. Guest

The Bush administration has withdrawn an invitation to a Pakistani lawmaker and a prominent critic of President Pervez Musharraf who was to arrive in the United States today as a guest of the State Department, setting off charges that the action came at the behest of the Pakistani government.

Sana Ullah Baloch, who had been invited by the State Department last year and issued a visa, was told recently by the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad that he could not attend a State Department-sponsored program on accountability in government and business and that a visa he had already received had been revoked.

American officials first told Baloch in a letter sent March 13 that they had taken the action because of "a recent withdrawal in funding which made it necessary for us to scale back the program."

In an interview Wednesday, State Department spokeswoman Nancy Beck said the problem was not funding but rather new information that was received after Baloch had been approved that "led us to believe he was not eligible for a visa." She declined to elaborate.

The incident has drawn sharp parallels with the case of Mukhtar Mai, a woman gang-raped in 2002 by a village council in Pakistan, who was prevented by the Pakistani government from traveling to the United States last summer to publicize her story. The government later relented.

The changing explanations fueled suspicion among some South Asia experts in Washington that Pakistan, a U.S. ally in the hunt for al-Qaeda leaders, asked the Bush administration not to permit Baloch to come to the United States. Baloch has been highly critical of Musharraf's handling of an intensifying conflict in Baluchistan, a restive province that Baloch represents in the national parliament.

"What is truly outrageous about his situation is this was a U.S.-government-sponsored trip," said Michael McFaul, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution in Washington, who spent three weeks with Baloch at a meeting at Stanford University aimed at promoting democracy and human rights. "Since when do we let other countries decide whom we should invite to our country?"

"We are all embarrassed because we all suspect the same thing, but so far the questions we have asked the administration remain unanswered," said Frederic Grare, a scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which was forced to cancel next week's event for Baloch.

Amnesty International's advocacy director for Asia, T. Kumar, said the group would bring the issue to the attention of Congress: "This is a coverup. This is a war on terror issue, and they need Pakistan."

Baloch's allies note that they have no direct evidence of their claims, and the Pakistani government and the State Department deny that Pakistan was involved.

Tariq Azim Khan, one of Baloch's fellow senators and a spokesman for the Pakistani government, joked that "it is surprising to note that Pakistan has that much sway with the State Department and the American Embassy in Islamabad."

Baloch was welcome to express his views anywhere, Khan said, adding that the Pakistani government itself had included the critic in many interparliamentary delegations. Khan described the unrest in Baluchistan as the work of a tiny but vocal minority, led by people such as Baloch, who Khan charged was upset because traditional roles of patronage were being sidelined by development programs.

Marvin Weinbaum, a former State Department analyst for Afghanistan who now works for the Middle East Institute in Washington, said the department's intelligence analysts may have learned something problematic about Baloch. But Selig Harrison, author of "In Afghanistan's Shadow," a book on Baluch nationalism, said that absent evidence, "one would discount that as simply a cover story."

In an interview via cellphone, Baloch said that his province -- the largest in Pakistan -- was being exploited for its natural resources, even as the region was starved of development funds. The province borders Iran and Afghanistan and is strategically important to oil-shipping lanes. Baloch said locals want more authority but were being undermined by the Pakistani government's leverage of radical Islam in the liberal-minded region.

"They don't want to allow any Baluch political activist to get in touch with the international community regarding the human rights violations in Baluchistan," he said, adding that about 600 people had been killed in recent months.

As Indian Premier Calls For Treaty, Pakistan Says Kashmir Is The Key (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

NEW DELHI, March 24 — Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called Friday for a far-reaching "treaty of peace, security and friendship" between India and Pakistan, in what appeared to be an effort to stanch criticism from across the border for inaction on the contested Kashmir region.

Pakistan politely welcomed the offer but pointed, not surprisingly, to the need to take on the Kashmir issue.

"We are not afraid of discussing Jammu and Kashmir or of finding pragmatic, practical solutions to resolve this issue as well," Mr. Singh said. He went on to say that territorial lines could not be redrawn — the Indian government's longstanding position — but that the two countries could work toward making them irrelevant, or as he also put it, "just lines on a map."

The two countries, violently separated at birth in 1947 but unable ever since to agree over who controls the Himalayan territory of Kashmir, have been engaged in peace talks for more than two years. Those talks have yielded little more than modest agreements to open train and bus links across the border.

For the last several months Pakistan has stepped up criticism of India for what it calls New Delhi's recalcitrance on resolving the Kashmir dispute. Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, for his part, has dangled the idea of greater self-rule for Kashmiris on both sides of the de facto border.

"I think it's a response to Pakistan's upping the diplomatic ante recently," said Kanti Bajpai, the principal of the exclusive Doon School in the Indian city of Dehra Dun and an expert on Kashmir.

India and Pakistan have fought three wars, two of them over Kashmir, and reached the brink of a fourth.

The spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry, Tasnim Aslam, on Friday called India's overtures positive but also described Kashmir as being "at the heart of conflict, mistrust and hostility" and having "bedeviled relations between the two countries for such a long time."

"We also need sincerity and flexibility in order to overcome the legacy of the past," Ms. Aslam said.

Mr. Singh praised General Musharraf's efforts to curb terrorism and urged him to do more. Mr. Singh also spoke of the need to address lingering disputes over the waters of Sir Creek, at the southern end of the countries' common border, and a dam called Baglihar on the Indian-held side of Kashmir that Pakistan fears will allow India to tamper with its water supply.

Mr. Singh's statement was perhaps more revealing for where it was delivered than what it said. He spoke at the unveiling of the latest bus link between the countries, this one cutting across divided Punjab from the Indian city of Amritsar to the Sikh pilgrimage site of Nankana Sahib in Pakistan, the birthplace of the Sikh religion's founder.

Punjab is the center of the carnage that characterized the partition of South Asia in 1947, when India and Pakistan won independence from British rule. Millions streamed across the frontier at the time, Sikhs and Hindus to India, Muslims to Pakistan.

Mr. Singh was among them. A Sikh, he was born in what is now the Pakistani province of Punjab, just as General Musharraf was born here in what is now the capital of India.

U.S. And Europe Plan Sanctions Against Belarus (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 24 — The United States and Europe said Friday that they would impose sanctions against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko of Belarus and other top officials for cracking down on a peaceful protest over his re-election, which was widely seen as a sham.

The swift and nearly unanimous condemnations from Western nations widened their rift with Belarus and posed new challenges for their relations with Russia, which has stood behind Mr. Lukashenko.

The United States stopped short of cutting its ties with the Belarus government, but a senior State Department official said that travel and financial restrictions already in place on "fewer than a dozen" Belarussian government officials would probably be extended to more than 50, including Mr. Lukashenko.

The European Union announced similar moves.

The announcements came as Belarussian authorities were processing hundreds of demonstrators in a Soviet-era prison here in the capital, and holding what the opposition described as closed trials without legal representation or defense witnesses.

The opposition also said that since their members were arrested in a police sweep early Friday morning, many detainees had been beaten, denied the use of toilets, forced to stand for hours in subfreezing temperatures, and packed nearly by the score into small prison cells.

"It is a horrible violation of human rights and the law," said Aleksandr Milinkevich, the principal challenger to Mr. Lukashenko in last Sunday's presidential election. "They do not consider us to be people."

Mr. Lukashenko made no immediate comment about the planned sanctions. But Belarus's Foreign Ministry suggested the West was being hypocritical and he hinted at retaliation.

"If the United States and European Union countries respect the people of Belarus, they should respect their choice," Andrei Popov, a ministry spokesman, said on national television. "The Republic of Belarus retains the right to take retaliatory measures.'

The threat seemed to expand on a remark earlier in the week by Mr. Lukashenko, who said Europe would hardly be able to restrict its trade with Belarus, a main transit route to the West for Russian gas and oil.

The United States said that it "condemns the actions of the Belarussian security services" in which "they forcibly seized and detained Belarussian citizens who were peacefully demonstrating against the fraudulent March 19 election results," according to a State Department statement.

The sanctions are likely to irritate Russia, which endorsed the presidential election on Monday and made light of the violence on Friday.

As many as 1,000 people have been arrested in the past several days for participating in rallies or supporting the opposition, including for trying to give demonstrators food, according to Mr. Milinkevich and Aleksandr Kazulin, another presidential candidate. The United States echoed appeals by both candidates for Belarus to release the detainees immediately.

"The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained, not only in the past 24 hours, but in recent days and weeks, simply for expressing their political views," said the White House press secretary, Scott McClellan.

Leaders of the European Union said they would add Mr. Lukashenko's name to an existing visa ban against six Belarussian officials. The move puts him on the same blacklist as Zimbabwe's president, Robert Mugabe, and Myanmar's military leaders, all of whom have had their European assets frozen.

The Polish foreign minister, Stefan Meller, said the new restrictions, which will take effect around April 10, could involve more than a dozen people. "This is a fight of good against evil," he said.

The officials subject to the sanctions would be forbidden to travel to the United States or Europe, or to fly on airlines belonging to any of those countries. Assets they hold in American or European banks will probably be frozen, though officials noted that the details had not yet been determined.

The administration hopes the threat of sanctions might change behavior in Belarus even before the new rules are put into place. Their goal, said the senior State Department official, who declined to be identified under department rules, is to "hold individuals accountable, to squeeze them" so that some might "peel off" to escape "the tightening noose."

The crackdown creates a fresh strain on relations between the West and Russia, which has congratulated Mr. Lukashenko for his official victory, and said the election, seen in the West as a farce, signified "the development of democratic institutions and the strengthening of the foundations of civic society in Belarus."

Russia, which holds the rotating chairmanship of the Group of Eight industrialized nations, showed no sign on Friday of rejecting its embrace of Mr. Lukashenko, who, according to official results, was re-elected to a third term on Sunday with 83 percent of the vote.

Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov, at a news conference in Moscow, dismissed the protests as "illegal activities." He accused the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which monitored the elections, of having prejudged them and of instigating the demonstrations that followed.

"It has played an inflammatory role," Mr. Lavrov said, according to a transcript provided by the Foreign Ministry. "To goad people into illegal activities is, I think, wrong."

Christian Strohal, director of the organization's human rights arm, responded in a statement that Mr. Lavrov's statements showed "a deliberate disregard" for the facts.

The State Department played down the American disagreement with Russia. A spokesman, Adam Ereli, noted that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke with Mr. Lavrov by telephone on Friday and did not even bring up the issue of Belarus.

Nonetheless, the West's actions may be seen as a challenge in Russia. "The United States and Europe have laid down markers that it will not accept fraudulent elections in Belarus," said Celeste A. Wallander, director of the Russia and Eurasia program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. The implication, she said, is that the West "will not accept fraud in Russian elections, either."

But James. M. Goldgeier, a Russia expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, said that message may be undercut by the fact that Russia faced no consequences after similar disagreements over other elections in its former republics over the past two years.

In Minsk, the police crackdown hardly lessened the tension. For all its speed and efficiency, with hundreds of protesters being removed from their camp on October Square by the riot police in less than 25 minutes, the action seemed to have done little to break the opposition's will.

Opposition members and relatives of those detained gathered outside the walls of the pretrial detention center and cheered every time a bus with detainees left the compound.

The unrest in recent days was the first sustained public dissent in the 12-year rule of a president often called Europe's last dictator. Freedom of assembly and speech are almost nonexistent here, and the economy remains managed by the state.

Mr. Milinkevich called for wide sanctions against Belarussian officials, including television journalists who he said knowingly spread lies on state television. He said a rally planned for Saturday would go forward, no matter how few people showed up.

The event seems certain to present a fresh challenge to the government, if only on a small scale. Several demonstrators who have thus far eluded arrest said they would appear on October Square, against the government's orders, in a continued show of civil disobedience.

One young man, who said he escaped from the crackdown early Friday by running from the police as they began seizing the demonstrators, stood on the square Friday afternoon, wearing a red-and-white button that read "For Freedom."

The protester, who gave only his first name, Mikhail, said that he would be back with more demonstrators on Saturday, and that he expected he would be arrested.

West Backs Sanctions Against Belarus (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus' authoritarian president, was on Friday night facing coordinated sanctions from the European Union and US, hours after riot police wielding batons arrested 200 people staging a peaceful protest over Sunday's disputed elections in the capital, Minsk.

EU leaders, at a summit in Brussels, and the White House both indicated they would impose visa bans on a wide range of senior officials from the former Soviet republic, including Mr Lukashenko himself. They also planned financial sanctions, such as freezes on bank accounts abroad.

The tough EU and US response set them sharply at odds with Russia. Moscow has accepted the election results and congratulated Mr Lukashenko on winning a third five-year presidential term with an official 82.6 per cent of the vote, on a 92 per cent turnout.

Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, on Friday accused the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe – which described the elections as severely flawed – of delivering a biased verdict and playing an "inflammatory role" in Belarus. The OSCE insisted it had given an "impartial, balanced picture of the entire election process".

In Minsk, Alexander Milinkevich, the main opposition candidate, vowed to go ahead with a peaceful rally planned for Saturday, anniversary of the start of an earlier short-lived period of independence for Belarus in 1918.

It was unclear, however, how many supporters would attend and whether the authorities would allow the rally to take place.

Several thousand opposition supporters have gathered on Minsk's central October Square each evening since last Sunday. But police at about 3am on Friday stormed a small colony of tents demonstrators had erected on the square in a round-the-clock protest, bundling their occupants into trucks.

The EU and US both condemned the crackdown, calling on the Belarusian authorities to release those arrested and refrain from action against any peaceful protest on Saturday.

Brussels and Washington have endorsed the findings of the 500-strong OSCE monitoring mission which concluded that last Sunday's election was not free and fair, and took place in a "climate of intimidation".

"Lukashenko will be banned from travelling to the EU," said Stefan Meller, foreign minister of Poland, which championed EU sanctions together with Lithuania – both neighbours of Belarus. He added that the new visa ban would apply to "many, many officials", and significantly broaden an existing ban imposed in 2004 on six lower-level Belarusian officials.

Scott McLellan, the White House spokesman, said the US planned "parallel steps involving targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions"

U.S. To Sanction Belarus For Stifling Protests (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Demonstrators Are Jailed in Capital for Rally Against Vote

The White House yesterday denounced the suppression of political protests against election fraud in Belarus and said the United States planned to join European nations in imposing sanctions on Belarusan leaders.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the United States demanded the immediate release of hundreds of protesters who have been arrested for demonstrating against March 19 elections, which President Alexander Lukashenko claims to have won with nearly 83 percent of the vote.

Riot police broke up days of demonstrations in Minsk, the Belarusan capital, early yesterday. About 200 protesters who had been camped in the main square were arrested and carted away in trucks.

The opposition, whose candidate received only 6 percent of the vote, charged that the elections were blatantly fraudulent, an assertion backed by independent election observers and the United States.

Under Lukashenko, 51, a former Soviet collective farm manager who came to power in 1994 as an anti-corruption crusader, Belarus has become one of the world's "outposts of tyranny," a phrase Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has used to describe half a dozen authoritarian countries. But the man Western critics have dubbed "Europe's last dictator" has won the support of Russian President Vladimir Putin, whose foreign minister defended today's police action against the protesters.

McClellan told reporters, "The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained not only in the past 24 hours but in recent days and weeks simply for expressing their political views."

He said, "We strongly condemn the actions by Belarusan security services," who "forcibly seized and detained citizens of Belarus who were peacefully demonstrating against the fraudulent March 19th election results."

Praising the European Union's decision to impose sanctions on Belarusan leaders, McClellan said, "We plan to take parallel steps involving targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions." The U.S. sanctions appeared likely to include travel restrictions against Lukashenko and other top Belarusan officials.

Lukashenko has denied being a dictator but has freely acknowledged his authoritarian tendencies.

"An authoritarian style of rule is characteristic of me, and I have always admitted it," he said in 2003, according to a BBC profile. "You need to control the country, and the main thing is not to ruin people's lives."

Election observers from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe concluded that the March 19 balloting was not free and fair, citing a "pattern of intimidation" by the state throughout the campaign. However, some Western and Russian polling organizations have found considerable popular support for Lukashenko in Belarus, which has recorded strong economic growth under his presidency and has avoided some pitfalls of the transition to capitalism experienced by other former Soviet republics.

Behind The Crackdown In Belarus (TIME)

By Yuri Zarakhovich

Time, March 24, 2006

Exclusive: "A legitimately elected President does not have to react so cowardly," an opposition leader tells TIME in an interview after police break up a five-day protest

After five days of protests against the reelection of Alexander Lukashenko as President of Belarus, police early Friday morning arrested hundreds in an improvised tent camp in downtown Minsk, installed there as a token of popular protest against an election widely described as fraudulent and unrecognized by the U.S. TIME's Yuri Zarakhovich discussed the overnight crackdown in a phone interview with Professor Alexander Kozulin, a presidential candidate from the opposition Social-Democratic Hramada party and one of the two top opposition leaders in Belarus.

TIME: The authorities have been promising not to crack down on what they called "a pathetic tent camp." Why such a change of heart on their part?

Kozulin: Lukashenko's lost his nerve. Tomorrow, Saturday, March 25, is a major national holiday, albeit unrecognized officially — the anniversary of the Belarus People's Republic, our independent state, proclaimed back in 1918 and destroyed several months later. Lots of people always gather to mark this day. Now, the anniversary coincided with mass election fraud protests. The opposition has called upon the people to come to the square en masse to protest. The authorities were scared that this "pathetic tent camp" worked as a toehold for the dozens of thousands who would show up tomorrow — and turn Minsk into a free city. So they moved to remove it.

TIME: How did the crackdown happen?

Kozulin: As the night was falling, most people left the square. Just some 300 kids were staying there to keep vigil overnight. Most of them students. When the police surrounded them, the kids just sat on the ground in a circle, holding hands. They did not resist. First, the cops removed all the media from the vicinity of the square, then they started carrying the protesters to prison wagons bodily. My two nephews were among those arrested in the square. They are still in jail.

TIME: How do the people react?

Kozulin: My mom, who survived the Nazi occupation, says that Lukashism is worse.

TIME: How so?

Kozulin: What happened last night is just a part of a general crackdown. They have been picking up people individually — not just opposition activists, but many of those who as much as dared bring food to the tent camp. Same as the Nazis arrested those trying to bring some food to concentration camps inmates. In just three days after the election, they have arrested close to 1,000 people, including the kids in the square. They had also arrested some 500 activists within the week before the election. They destroy this country's future when they stifle the people's right to self-expression and protest. They destroy this country's future when they thrown the young in jails. This is Lukashism.

TIME: What now?

Kozulin: Now they will cordon the square off and try to keep the people out. But the people will be coming tomorrow anyway. We have always called for peaceful protests, but now Lukashenko provokes violence. He will bear the entire responsibility, should it happen. The authorities should have learned to listen to their people. But they are provoking violence instead. This only proves once again that they are illegitimate, and that this "election" was a fraudulent farce.

TIME: Why?

Kozulin: A legitimately elected President does not have to react so cowardly. Lukashenko has overstepped all the boundaries. He is a menace to his own people. He has been scared of a revolution, but what he does not understand is that he has triggered that revolution himself. His abuse of power has triggered the most important revolution of all — the one in people's minds. Even many of those who had sided with him are now indignant at this rape of the Constitution and crackdown on the people.

TIME: What do you think of the world's reaction?

Kozulin: The U.S. and the E.U. stands have been very encouraging. However, it is important that they remain consistent positions, rather than just one-time declared stands. All the possibilities of talking with Lukashenko have been exhausted; he understands only the language of force. He is not a menace just to his own country; he is a menace to the world. If the international community wants to defuse this menace, the Belarusian issue must be brought to the U.N. Security Council and raised at the G-8 summit, planned in St. Petersburg, Russia in July. Otherwise, this summit will be just so much mockery of the G-8 principles.

White House Joins In Sanctions Vs. Belarus (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

The United States joined European nations Friday in imposing sanctions on Belarus in retaliation for a crackdown on political protesters after an election that the White House said was fraudulent.

Washington will act in unison with the European Union in applying targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions against President Alexander Lukashenko and others, the White House said.

"Our nation's thoughts are with those who have been harassed, detained, imprisoned or beaten for their efforts" to return freedom to Belarus, the White House said in a presidential message.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration urges "all members of the international community to demand that authorities in Belarus respect the rights of their own citizens to express themselves peacefully and to condemn any and all abuses."

He said the United States strongly condemned actions by Belarus' security forces who seized and detained citizens demonstrating against the results of the presidential election.

"The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained not only in the past 24 hours but in recent days and weeks simply for expressing their political views," McClellan said.

Russia, which is close to the former Soviet republic, has taken a different tack, saying the media had distorted the severity of the police action.

A State Department spokesman, Adam Ereli, said, "The Russians have obviously taken a position regarding the elections in Belarus I think that differs from ours."

"Every country is obviously free to decide what it wants to do," Ereli said.

Defiant Belarus Opposition Shifts To A Jailhouse Wall (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 24 — The young man stood by the prison wall and read the names to a crowd of family members.

"Vitushka," he said. "Ten days."

"Vinogradov," he said. "Ten days."

"Marchuk," he said, and repeated the same jail sentence, written on a scrap of paper he said the opposition had managed to smuggle out.

The center of the psychological chess game between the autocratic government of Belarus and its emboldened new opposition shifted Friday from a small camp on October Square to a pretrial detention center, where much of the opposition movement now finds itself locked up.

Since March 19, when President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko won a landslide re-election that the West and the opposition say was tainted by abuse and fraud, Belarus's opposition has challenged Mr. Lukashenko as never before, risking police violence and arrest to assemble in public and denounce the official result.

Mr. Lukashenko and his police forces, which had never allowed such dissent, refrained from arresting the demonstrators until early Friday morning, when the riot police broke up a demonstration that had continued for more than 80 hours.

The crackdown stopped the largest public display of defiance against Mr. Lukashenko's rule, but it was only the most visible effort of the government's effort to tamp down these protests before they spread.

During the demonstration, each time protesters ventured away from the relative safety of their camp, they faced a gantlet of undercover security officers, waiting at subway token booths, lurking on train platforms, loitering near their homes.

The officers arrested demonstrators by the score, and hunted for anyone believed to be a potential supporter or participant in the demonstration.

On Friday, the relatives of the detained and opposition members who had eluded arrest turned up at the jailhouse walls, demanding to know who was inside, and trying to get the officials to accept parcels for the detainees. The bags contained nuts, juice, toothbrushes and clean clothes.

The jail officials refused to accept them, just as they refused to provide a list of detainees, forcing the relatives to rely on the occasional call from within on smuggled cellphones, and to trade stories of beatings and young men spending the night shivering outside in the jail yard.

Sometimes the gates would open and several prisoners would be seen being transferred away by bus. "We are together!" their friends and family would chant. Sometimes an ambulance would appear, and the crowd would wonder who had been hurt?

One man passed the limited word they had of trials. The trend was clear: 10-day sentences. The charge: participating in an unsanctioned rally.

Jail sentences will not stop them, opposition members said. Their next move, they said, will be to try to assemble for another demonstration on Saturday.

But the government was already moving against them, deploying more police officers on the square, and using state television to denounce those already in jail.

A propaganda campaign was also under way. After the protest was broken up, state television showed images of a square littered with alcohol containers and pornography, along with syringes and packets of white powder, and suggested that the camp was simply a drug-fueled orgy.

"Of course it is easier to carry out different sexual experiments on psychologically unstable youth," the news broadcaster said. October Square, he said, was turned by the demonstrators into "an ugly, criminal tumor on Minsk's body."

But journalists for The New York Times passed all four nights night on the square and saw no alcohol, drugs or pornographic materials inside the camp. Minutes after the riot police departed early Friday, alcohol bottles and pornography were in abundance, as if they had been planted.

At the prison walls, the remaining opposition members said they were undeterred. "It is easy to sit in your warm kitchen and speak against this regime," said Sergei Karievsky, 50, an architect. "But if the sleeping society is ever going to be awakened, someone has to go out in the cold and fight for their rights."

Senators Soften Line On China Trade Sanctions (FT)

By Geoff Dyer And Chris Swann

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

Advocates of free trade were hopeful on Friday that a more conciliatory stance by two US senators who have threatened draconian legislation against China would help cool anger in Congress over China's trade policies.

Senators Charles Schumer of New York and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who sponsored a bill to place a 27.5 per cent tariff on Chinese exports entering the US, said the country had taken "a big first step" towards establishing a more flexible currency regime. Speaking on a visit to China, they said they would make a decision only next week on whether to put their bill for a vote on March 31. They hinted, however, that any vote would be delayed for at least a month.

The two senators have been visiting China this week to monitor progress China has made in reforming its currency, which they believe is 15-40 per cent undervalued. Their bill has become the focal point of growing commercial tensions between the US and China and prompted fears of a wave of protectionism.

"There has been a meeting of minds [on the issue of a floating currency] which we have helped accomplish," Mr Schumer said in Shanghai on Friday. "Before Sunday I would have characterised China's trade policy as mercantilist. But I am convinced now that the Chinese government agrees that the currency should float."

The idea had been included in China's 11th five-year plan, outlined this month, although it was added at the last minute, he said. His latest comments gave reason to believe that he would not push for a vote on the bill next week.

The softer tone may also take pressure off the administration of President George W. Bush, which has been struggling to contain mounting frustration on Congress.

"The legislation was unlikely ever to have become law, because the Republican leadership in the House would have been reluctant to let it go to a vote," said Dan Griswold, director of the centre for trade policy studies at the Cato Institute. "But as a symbol the proposed legislation was very unhelpful. The threat of high and sweeping tariffs against our third largest trading partner was the height of irresponsibility."

China revalued its currency by 2.1 per cent last July but since then the pace of appreciation has been slow, with the renminbi rising by less than 1 per cent against the dollar. According to Mr Schumer, Zhou Xiaochuan, the head of the Chinese central bank, explained that the government had needed time to establish the market infrastructure for a floating currency.

The senators did not give the Chinese a deadline for moving to a floating renminbi, although Mr Schumer added: "Six months is obviously too short for the Chinese,10 years too long."

Mr Graham was more sceptical. "Are they just doing the least amount possible or is there a genuine effort to embrace reform? The jury is still out," he said. However, he implied that any vote on the bill would be delayed at least until after the April visit to the US of President Hu Jintao of China. "By the end of April we will know more [about Chinese intentions]," he said.

Stephen Green, economist with Standard Chartered Bank in Shanghai, said: "We believe that Senator Schumer will not table the bill on the basis of the real progress that has been made...in part because of the pressure created by their bill."

However, Chuck Grassley, the chairman of the Senate finance committee, and Max Baucus, the ranking Democrat, may yet unveil even stronger draft legislation on China next week. It is expected to include provisions for the US to push complaints forward at the World Trade Organisation.

U.S. Firm, France's Alcatel See Bulking Up as a Key To Thriving in Telecom Gearing for Beijing Olympics

One key factor fueling the merger talks between France's leading telecommunications-equipment maker and its longtime U.S. rival is a looming competitive threat: China.

In a plan made public late Thursday night, Alcatel SA of Paris is pursuing a more than $13 billion merger1 with Lucent Technologies Inc., whose roots stretch back to Alexander Graham Bell's first telephone. The two came close to merging five years ago but talks fell apart.

Now, there is renewed urgency for a deal. Chinese upstarts such as Huawei Technologies Co. and ZTE Corp. are beginning to enter their turf with cheaper products, threatening to seize market share, take jobs and set industry standards for the huge Chinese market.

Alcatel, Lucent and its main competitors Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson, Nokia Corp. and Nortel Networks Corp., make technology that is largely invisible to consumers but underlies many of the services they use: telecommunications networks transmitting voice, video and Internet traffic.

Both Lucent and Alcatel hope that the fast-changing global telecom landscape will keep their deal from becoming a political football. A slew of other recent deals, including Dubai Ports World's plan to take over some operations at key U.S. ports and a possible purchase of Unocal Corp. by China's Cnooc Ltd., fell apart over U.S. opposition. Lucent may be an especially sensitive target, because its research arm, Bell Labs, develops defense and homeland-security technology. So far there hasn't been any uproar in Washington over the prospect of a deal.

Across the Atlantic, France has become increasingly prickly about mergers affecting its home-grown companies. The proposed Alcatel-Lucent deal would likely cost thousands of jobs, as the companies try to slash costs.

The planned transaction comes amid a massive consolidation of the U.S. telecom industry, which is still struggling to recover from a collapse that began in 2001. Some $200 billion of deals have been announced in the past two years. Most recently, AT&T Inc. announced plans to buy BellSouth Corp. for $67 billion. Other transactions have included Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI Inc., and the earlier purchase of AT&T Corp. by the former SBC Communications Inc., which took the AT&T name.

For Alcatel and Lucent, the deal makes sense because of the shrinking of the U.S. and European client pool and the prospect of stronger Chinese competition.

Last year, for instance, BT Group PLC of the United Kingdom signaled Huawei had arrived on the global stage by awarding it a sizeable piece of its multibillion-dollar project to upgrade its infrastructure. Huawei, based in the southern Chinese city of Shenzhen, started by concentrating its export strategy on developing countries, partly to avoid competing with the industry's giants as it built up its expertise, touting deals in Thailand, Indonesia and Bulgaria.

The pressures Lucent and Alcatel are facing in such markets was visible at an industry trade show in New Delhi this week. Just inside the main entrance, the first sight for many attendees was the giant booth of China's ZTE, where it demonstrated equipment for next-generation cellphone networks, wireless broadband and video cellphones.

For ZTE and Huawei, India is a second big opportunity to prove themselves against global competitors. Both companies played starring roles in the rapid buildup of China's wireless networks during the past six years.

Meanwhile, China is expected to start awarding licenses for so-called third-generation, or 3G, networks in the next six months in order to give its own state-owned phone companies time to prepare services for the 2008 Olympics in Beijing. China already is the largest mobile-phone market, and the upgrade may form the world's biggest high-speed wireless network.

To be sure, Chinese vendors including Huawei currently make up a fraction of the world market. They hold about 5% of the wireless market, including new contracts within China, and about 10% of the market for optical equipment such as switches, according to analyst Paul Sagawa of Sanford Bernstein.

"The biggest impediment to Huawei on a global stage is the lack of a service and support infrastructure," Mr. Sagawa says. "Carriers don't want to have to rely on engineers in Beijing to solve problems. They want people on the ground."

Once a highflying industry leader, Lucent now stands to represent something far different: the globalization of technology markets, where a few huge players supply gear to everyone from Polish wireless companies to Brazilian cable-TV firms.

In this transition, Lucent, once the most widely held stock in America, would enter a new era. As envisioned, the combined company will be registered as a French firm, have its executive offices in Paris and its operational offices in New Jersey, according to people familiar with the matter. It would trade on European markets, with its American depositary receipts still trading on the New York Stock Exchange. All told, Alcatel would hold about 60% of a newly combined firm.

Lucent would continue to hold power, too. Current Chief Executive Patricia Russo would become the company's chief executive, with Alcatel's Mike Quigley retaining his No. 2 spot.

Alcatel's Serge Tchuruk would be company chairman, and the two sides would share equal representation on the board.

The two sides have already had a preliminary agreement in place for about two weeks, said a person familiar with the matter. A final announcement could come next week, this person said, though the timing could slip. One item still on the agenda: the new firm's name. The two companies are more likely to choose an entirely new moniker than keep their existing names.

Lucent and Alcatel declined to comment.

Integrating two bureaucratic organizations -- Lucent has 30,000 employees and Alcatel about 56,000 -- would be a difficult task for any manager. Language differences and time-zone changes make that harder.

Industry observers have long expected equipment makers to follow the wave of mergers among operators that has marked the telecommunications industry in recent years.

But consolidation among operators in domestic markets is just one factor pushing equipment makers into each other's arms. New equipment makers have arrived on the scene as developing countries are becoming major markets for advanced technology. European and American companies don't have deep-rooted business connections to lock out the newcomers in those markets. Indeed, some countries see a political, as well as economic, advantage in working with manufacturers from other developing countries, such as China.

For Lucent, a deal with Alcatel would reinsert it in a larger company after a roller-coaster decade on its own. Spun off from the old AT&T in 1996, Lucent ultimately slashed close to 80% of its peak work force through spinoffs, buyouts and layoffs. Ms. Russo, a former Eastman Kodak Co. executive, became chairwoman and CEO of Lucent in 2002, and was credited with navigating the turmoil.

She tried to focus the company more on its customers, use its scientists to help solve their problems and to devise new business lines for the company, and expand into emerging markets, especially China. Lucent recently won bids to provide Internet-based network systems for television, telephone and high-speed data traffic that are expected to produce significant sales in 2007.

Lucent was profitable in 2004 and 2005, although most were paper profits from credits in the company's overfunded pension plans, not profit from operations.

It was in part delays in signing contracts to build China's next-generation networks that led Lucent to a loss in its first fiscal quarter of 2006, which began in October.

Any merger would mark a big boost for Alcatel and cap Mr. Tchuruk's decade at its helm. If successful, the move would stake Alcatel's future on increasing its market in the U.S. Lucent is strong in the wireless technology, called CDMA, used by big U.S. mobile-phone providers such as Verizon Wireless and Sprint Nextel Corp. Geographical reach in the U.S. was one of the main reasons Alcatel had sought a failed merger with Lucent five years ago.

The Marseilles-born son of Armenian immigrants, Mr. Tchuruk guided Alcatel through the tech bubble, and subsequent implosion, by streamlining operations and refocusing on telecom. He reduced Alcatel's work force by about 70%, or 40,000 employees, through job cuts and by selling off its mobile-handset division and engineering units.

Slowly, Alcatel emerged as a global leader in DSL technology, which updates regular telephone lines to carry high-speed Internet and other digital services. The company won major contracts with phone companies, which needed to revamp their lines to offer new services such as digital TV to compete with cable companies raiding their turf.

Even as Mr. Tchuruk had stabilized the business, signs of problems began emerging last year, analysts say. The company lost some contracts, issued profit warnings and experienced volatile swings. Alcatel also faced looming strategic choices: Should it focus investment on its dominant fixed-line business, or try to bolster its relatively weak wireless business through acquisitions?

Some analysts wonder why Mr. Tchuruk is plunging the company into a risky deal when Alcatel just now seems to have gotten its own house in order. "It would take a herculean feat to put two companies together," said Richard Windsor, an analyst at Nomura Securities. "You likely end up with a value-destroying merger."

Large buyers of telecom equipment signaled their support over the prospect of a deal. William Smith, chief technology officer of BellSouth, says that "there is an onslaught of new Chinese technology" that poses a threat to companies such as Lucent and Alcatel. By pooling research resources, the telecom industry could see the development of more new technologies, he adds. "You haven't seen any Nobel Prizes out of those organizations recently," he said.

Follow The Chopsticks (NYT)

China's relentless economic growth has created severe environmental problems and depleted its natural resources. Its energy demands have contributed to rising oil prices and the gases associated with global warming. So it is heartening when China, the world's most populous nation, takes steps to curb its appetites. We hope other countries (like the United States) may be similarly inspired.

Last week, Beijing announced plans to raise existing taxes and impose new ones on things like gas-guzzling cars and trucks, and disposable wooden chopsticks. The 5 percent chopsticks tax (a tax that also extends to floor planking) is intended to persuade people to buy reusable and plastic chopsticks in order to slow clear-cutting in Southeast Asia.

Similarly, Chinese officials announced a big jump in taxes on vehicles with large engines, while reducing taxes on smaller vehicles. This follows an earlier directive imposing more stringent fuel-economy standards on all vehicles sold after July 1. Taken together, the moves reflect growing official concern about the rapid proliferation of private vehicles in China.

This is good news for anyone worried about global warming because a big percentage of greenhouse gas emissions come from vehicles. Even with more efficient cars, however, China is expected to be an increasingly heavy producer of those gases because it relies so heavily on coal-fired power plants. The increased gases from these plants are likely to cancel out any savings from automobiles unless some way is found to reduce them.

Still, China is to be commended for using regulatory levers and economic incentives to encourage more efficient cars and trucks. Neither Congress nor the White House has done much of anything to improve the efficiency of this country's vehicles for the past 20 years.

Russia And China Bridle At Paying UN More (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

The US has sparked protests from Russia and China by proposing a fundamental change to the way contributions to the United Nations are calculated that would make them pay more.

The US, the organisation's biggest contributor, wants to shift from a formula broadly based on gross national income (GNI) to one that takes account of purchasing power parity (PPP) – a tool used by economists to compare living standards in different countries more accurately.

In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, before that hearing was delayed, John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, argued that the GNI-based calculations could be "greatly skewed by distortions introduced into the marketplace by -currencies which are non--convertible". By using PPP indicators "as an important economic tool in its discussions of scale of assessments", Mr Bolton says, the UN would be "be better equipped and have more balanced data".

But the move is a clear challenge to China and Russia, and to developing countries, whose relative wealth is considerably higher when measured by PPP.

"PPP would radically shift the balance," said one UN diplomat. "Developing countries would pay a lot more."

DOJ_NMG_0022274

China would be particularly affected: its share of world GNI is about 4 per cent, a UN economist said, but when measured by PPP it rises to 12 per cent.

Currently China contributes only 2.1 per cent of the UN's budget, while Russia accounts for 1.1 per cent. By contrast, the US pays 22 per cent, and France and the UK each pay about 6 per cent.

Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, told the FT that Beijing was "definitely opposed" to a PPP-based formula. He said there was no consensus on how it should be measured.

Andrey Denisov, the Russian ambassador, similarly hit out against the proposal, saying that Moscow was ready to consider increasing its contribution but that this had to be done "in a voluntary way", through a "more fair, less induced" mechanism.

The US proposal is being made as European countries seek to increase or remove a cap that limits to 22 per cent the percentage of the UN's core budget paid by any one member state. Without that cap, the US contribution would rise to more than 30 per cent under the current formula, a diplomat said. Meanwhile Japan is pushing what its diplomats describe as a more "modest proposal", which does not use PPP. It wants permanent members of the Security Council to pay at least 3 or 5 per cent of the core budget.

The US and Japanese proposals will be considered among others by an expert committee in June, ahead of a final decision by the end of the year.

AFP, March 25, 2006

The UN Security Council called for faster preparations for the African Union (AU) to hand over its peacekeeping mission in Sudan's western Darfur region to the United Nations.

The 15-member body unanimously adopted a resolution that also decided to extend for at least six months the mandate of the UN mission in south Sudan (UNMIS).

The text directed UN chief Kofi Annan, working with the AU and in consultations with the council "to expedite the necessary preparatory planning for transition" from the AU force known as AMIS to a UN operation.

This would include options for how UNMIS can provide transitional assistance -- such as in logistics, mobility and communications.

"The unacceptable violence in western Darfur and on the Chad border has influenced the discussions in New York about the renewal of the UNMIS mandate in a way that we are looking to help facilitate the transition to a rehatted UN force by putting in language and procedures to strengthen that now and not have to wait for six months," US State Department Deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said in Washington.

Early this month, AU foreign ministers agreed in principle at a meeting in the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa to transfer the AU mission in strife-torn Darfur to the United Nations. They also extended the current AMIS mission for six months.

The AU reached the decision despite spirited opposition from Khartoum, which argued that the transfer would risk worsening the situation in Darfur.

Friday's resolution also called on Annan to report to the council by April 24 "on a range of options for a United Nations operation in Darfur" and to continue to provide "maximum possible assistance to AMIS."

It asked Annan and the AU to consult with international and regional bodies and member states "to identify resources to support AMIS during transition to a United Nations operation."

The text also strongly condemned activities of militias and armed groups such as Uganda's rebel Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), "which continue to attack civilians and commit human rights abuses in Sudan."

Under pressure from Ugandan troops, LRA rebels have fled to southern Sudan and Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). Ugandan troops have permission from Khartoum to pursue the rebels on southern Sudanese soil.

Sunday Annan appealed for Sudanese cooperation in the handover of AMIS peacekeeping duties to the UN as security deteriorates in Darfur.

"The situation in Darfur is deteriorating. We must do everything to help the displaced people and those in need of assistance," he told a press conference at the end of a visit to the Indian Ocean island of Madagascar.

"I hope we will have the cooperation of the Sudanese government," he added.

In February, the Security Council approved contingency planning for a UN takeover in Darfur and Annan suggested that Western countries help by providing logistical support and air assets for the new UN force.

The 7,000-strong AMIS force, which was deployed in 2004, has been suffering from poor funding and inadequate resources to contain the escalating bloodshed.

The United States has been lobbying for the sending of a UN-led force, backed by NATO, and probably double the current AU deployment, to take over peacekeeping in Darfur.

War in Darfur broke out in February 2003, when black ethnic groups launched a rebellion against Khartoum that was brutally repressed by the Arab Islamist regime and local militiamen, the Janjaweed. Both sides have been accused of violating a truce signed in April 2004.

The combined effect of the war and one of the world's worst humanitarian crises has left up to 300,000 people dead and an estimated 2.4 million displaced.

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: the war in Iraq, tensions with Iran and the future of this woman. Our guest: the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

Then, will there be a White House staff shake-up? And what is at stake in the 2006 midterm elections? Insights and analysis from David Broder of The Washington Post; Elisabeth Bumiller, White House correspondent for The New York Times; Charlie Cook of the National Journal, and John Harwood of The Wall Street Journal and CNBC.

But first, as we begin the fourth year of the war in Iraq, we are joined by the secretary of state.

Welcome back, Madame Secretary.

SEC'Y CONDOLEEZZA RICE: Good morning. Nice to be with you, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Very disturbing headlines in the papers yesterday. The Russians helping Iraq and this is how it was captured in the paper: "Russian officials collected intelligence on U.S. troop movements and attack plans from inside the American military command leading the 2003 invasion of Iraq and passed that information on to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, according to a U.S. military study. The intelligence reports, which the study said were provided to Hussein through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad at the height of the U.S. assault, warned accurately that American formations intended to bypass Iraqi cities on their thrust towards Baghdad. The reports provided some specific numbers on U.S. troop units, locations, according to Iraqi documents dated March and April 2003 and later captured by the United States." Have you told the Russians, "What is going on?"

SEC'Y RICE: Well, we're trying first to make sure we understand fully what the documents say. These are documents that were found, an Iraqi source. And obviously, Tim, we would take very seriously any suggestion that this may have been done maybe to the detriment of the American forces. And so we will certainly raise it with the Russian government. We want to take a real hard look at the documents and then raise it with the Russian government.

MR. RUSSERT: But these are U.S. documents.

SEC'Y RICE: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: A U.S. report. You believe the report?

SEC'Y RICE: Oh, I, I certainly think there is a lot to this report. But we really haven't much had a chance to look at the documents in detail, intend to do that and then to raise it with the Russian government. I would hope the Russian government would take it seriously.

MR. RUSSERT: Will there be an investigation as to who leaked the information to the Russians?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, I, we'll just have to see. I, I don't want to get ahead of us, but obviously we take very seriously any suggestion that this may have been done at the beginning of the war.

MR. RUSSERT: Was it...

SEC'Y RICE: That would be a quite serious charge.

MR. RUSSERT: Could it have been deliberate misinformation?

SEC'Y RICE: I don't know. I think we really have to take a look at the documents. We're finding thousands and thousands and thousands of documents. And we're going to find some, some important and surprising things in these documents. I think we have to step back, take a hard look at the documents, but I—definitely we will raise it with the Russian government.

MR. RUSSERT: When we first went into Iraq, we had some unexpected encounters with Fedayeen and we lost dozens of American men. The Russians may have been responsible for American deaths.

SEC'Y RICE: Well, I don't want to try hypothetically to, to know what impact this might have had. I think the first thing we need to do is take a good, hard look at the documents and then we definitely want to raise it with the Russian government. And again, I would hope that the Russian government would, would take it seriously and, and give us a serious answer on what they find.

MR. RUSSERT: Back in June of 2001, the president said he looked Vladimir Putin in the eye, he got a sense of his soul, found him to be very straightforward and very trustworthy. Does the president still believe that President Putin is straightforward and trustworthy?

SEC'Y RICE: I really do think that the Russians have generally done what they said they would do. They said they were going to oppose the Iraq war and they did, and they told us that from the very beginning. So I don't have an argument there. And I don't want to jump to the conclusion that this was something that was ordered out of the Kremlin. We have to look at the documents, we have to go to the Russian government, but I would hope that the Russian government would take seriously any suggestion that they may have passed data to the Iraqis at the advent of the war.

MR. RUSSERT: But the Russian ambassador is the source. How could Putin not have known? And how could it be straightforward and honest for the Russians to help Saddam Hussein?

SEC'Y RICE: Tim, we have to get to the bottom of the facts of this. We will most certainly raise it with the Russian government. I've, I've said several times, it's a serious matter. But I don't want to jump out ahead and start making accusations about what the Russians may or may not have known. This is something in the relationship that we have with the Russians that really is candid and where we do talk about difficult things all the time, where I think we'll be able to talk about this and talk about it honestly.

MR. RUSSERT: Why won't the Russians help us get sanctions in the United Nations against Iran and try to stop them from developing nuclear weapons?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, we're not yet at the stage where we're seeking sanctions. What we're doing now is we're seeking a presidential statement that would make clear to Iran the international community's determination that it live up to the obligations that everyone thinks that Iran has. We're working through it. We have the same strategy here, we have the same view of the problem. The Russians do not want a nuclear weapon in Iran either. It's been very clear in everything that they have tried to do, in the way that they set up the civil nuclear cooperation with Bushehr, in what they offered the Iranians that the Russians also do not believe that there should be enrichment and reprocessing capability on Iranian soil. And enrichment and reprocessing capability is the core here. If you're able to enrich and reprocess, then the ability to build a bomb is, is there.

And so we and the Russians, the Chinese, and certainly the Europeans, have the same view of what is, what is to be prevented. Yes, we've had some tactical differences on how to get there, but I talked with my Russian counterpart on Friday, we agreed that our people would go back and work very hard this weekend, and we'll see where we are on Monday. We're considering whether it might be a good idea to get, after we have a presidential statement, get ministries together again with the, the P5, the permanent five of the Security Council, plus Germany, to talk about charting a course forward, because everybody takes very seriously Iran's intransigence and Iran's unwillingness to do what the international community is, is determined that it will do.

MR. RUSSERT: It is the policy of our government that Iran will not be allowed to develop a nuclear weapon?

SEC'Y RICE: Tim, Iran cannot be allowed to develop a nuclear weapon. That is the view of the international community, not just the United States.

MR. RUSSERT: This article is in The New York Times, "The reality is that most of us think the Iranians are probably going to get a weapon, or the technology to make one, sooner or later, an administration official acknowledged a few weeks ago, refusing to talk on the record because such an admission amounts to a concession that dragging Iran in front of the United Nations Security Council may prove an exercise in futility. The optimists around here," about the White House, "just hope we can delay the day by 10 or 20 years, and that by that time we'll have a different relationship with a different Iranian government."

That seems like a much different policy.

SEC'Y RICE: Well, I—since I don't know who this anonymous person is, I can't tell you what, what relationship it may have to the policy. I'll tell you who doesn't think that, I don't believe that, I don't believe that the president believes that, because we're doing everything that we can to send a strong signal to the Iranians that they have no choice. If they wish to be a part of the international community, they have no choice but to give up ambitions that could lead to the technologies that would lead to a nuclear weapon.

If the international community stays really solid here, Iran cannot stand the kind of isolation from the international community that, for instance, North Korea endures almost by choice. We really do have a chance to solve this diplomatically. But, Tim, I would be the first to say we can't afford to waste time. That's why we need our, our people in, in New York to really work toward this first phase. We need to see if that has an effect on the Iranians, and if it does not have an effect on the Iranians, we need to move to the next phase.

MR. RUSSERT: Which is?

SEC'Y RICE: The next phase is to look to further options in the Security Council, for instance, perhaps the Chapter 7 resolution.

MR. RUSSERT: Which is?

SEC'Y RICE: Chapter 7 resolution essentially gives the U.N., or the Security Council, the ability to compel a state to act. It can say that there would be consequences if actions are not taken.

MR. RUSSERT: Including military?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, no one ever takes anything off the table, but I believe we're a long way from, from that. We have the possibilities of financial measures that could be taken, bans against travel. There, there are a lot of options once you're in the Security Council. That's why it was very important to get this dossier, Iranian dossier, to the Security Council and why the diplomacy that we've been working over the last couple of years to get the Europeans and the United States on the same page and to now bring the Russians and the Chinese along has been so important.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you believe if the president chose to embark on military action with Iran, he would go to Congress for authorization first?

SEC'Y RICE: I'm not going to speculate on that. The president is clear that he keeps all of his options on the table. But, Tim, I think speculating about how we might set up military action isn't helpful at a time when we really are concentrating on the diplomacy. But I want to be very clear...

MR. RUSSERT: But you wouldn't go to Congress?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, Tim, of course the administration went to Congress the last time. And I would just ask people to look at the history of how this president has, has acted; he has taken Congress as a full partner in these matters. But I'm not going to get into a discussion of what the president may or may not do constitutionally.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn back to Iraq. The war is now in its fourth year, and these are the grim statistics: U.S. troops killed, 2,316; wounded/injured 17,271; Iraqis killed, an estimated, estimated number of 30,000; 130,000 American troops on the ground. When you were planning the war some three and a half years ago, did you have any idea that three years into the war those are the numbers that you would be confronting?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, I certainly thought that it would be difficult. I don't think anyone knew precisely what we would be facing in terms of numbers. And look, every one of those deaths is, is mourned by people in the administration because these are families that have lost husbands and wives and daughters and sons. But we also know that nothing of value is ever won without sacrifice.

We're in Iraq because the United States of America faces a different kind of enemy in a different kind of war. And we have to have a different kind of Middle East if we're ever going to resolve the, the, the problems of an ideology of hatred that was so great that people flew airplanes into buildings. Iraq was—Saddam Hussein's Iraq was a threat. Now that the...

MR. RUSSERT: But, but Saddam was not related to flying airplanes into buildings.

SEC'Y RICE: No, and we have never said that Saddam—Saddam was not related to the events of 9/11. But if you really believe that the only thing that happened on 9/11 was people flew airplanes into buildings, I think you have a very narrow view of what we faced on 9/11. We faced the, the outcome of an ideology of hatred throughout the Middle East that had to be dealt with. Saddam Hussein was a part of that old Middle East. The new Iraq will be a part of a new Middle East, and we will all be safer.

MR. RUSSERT: But Madame Secretary, weapons of mass destruction was the primary rationale given to go into Iraq. Lisa Myers of NBC News broke a story last week that the Iraqi foreign minister, Mr. Sabri, became a spy for the French and, and the CIA. And this is how it was reported: "Saddam Hussein's last foreign minister, Naji Sabri, was a paid spy for French intelligence, which later turned him over to the CIA to supply information about Iraq, its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs more than six months before the war began in March 2003, according to former senior intelligence officials. ...

"The sources said, he provided information that the Iraqi dictator had ambitions for a nuclear program but that it was not active, and that no biological weapons were being produced or stockpiled, although research was under way." That's a far cry from what the American people were told.

SEC'Y RICE: Of course, Tim, this was a single source among multiple sources, and the problem was that Saddam Hussein was unwilling, after multiple resolutions in Security Council, to account for his weapons programs. We all remember that the accounting of the U.N. mission that was supposed—the weapons inspection mission that was supposed to look into its weapons programs could not account for large stockpiles.

We all thought that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. He certainly had a very healthy appetite for them, and he had used them before, both against his own people and against his neighbors. He was a threat. This was someone flying against our aircraft—or, or shooting at our aircraft as they flew the no-fly zones. He'd invaded his neighbors. But the point is that now that he is gone Iraq has an opportunity to be a different Iraq in a different kind of Middle East.

I know it's hard, and I know that the numbers that you put up are difficult to see, and I know that the violence on TV is difficult. But I would ask people to, to look at the perspective here of what is really going on in Iraq. Under this, the violence—under the specter of this violence, you have Iraqis now—Sunnis, Shia, Kurds and others—determined to form a government of national unity. That's extraordinary in Iraq's history where they've always settled their differences by violence, not by politics. And when they succeed in that, you—they are going to have the basis for a very different kind of Iraq, and I think they're going to succeed.

MR. RUSSERT: But people are being asked to take your judgement on this, as we sit here this morning, and refer to previous judgements the administration made: weapons of mass destruction, there were none; we would be greeted as liberators, this is three years later; that it would not take hundreds of thousands of American troops to occupy Iraq. Tommy Franks, according to the book "Cobra II," said we'd be down to 30,000 troops in November of '03. The cost of the war: the budget director of the White House said it'd be $50 billion dollars, it's now over $350 billion dollars. Each judgement has proven to be wrong.

SEC'Y RICE: The judgement that has not proven to be wrong, Tim, is that the region is changing in fundamental ways and the region is better without Saddam Hussein. Yes, it is true that everyone thought he had weapons of mass destruction; he did not. It is, by the way, the case that the Iraqis are delighted to be rid of him. And some Iraqis, most Iraqis, in fact, are willing and want to keep coalition forces there until they can take care of this themselves. But we do have to keep things in historical perspective. These people are doing something that is quite unknown in the Middle East, and one has to ask, "What was the alternative?" Was the alternative to leave Saddam Hussein in power, continuing to threaten his neighbors, continuing with his windfall profits from the Oil for Food scandal, continuing to repress his people and build mass graves, continuing to use those Oil for Food profits to, again, build the infrastructure for his weapons of mass destruction?

MR. RUSSERT: But many will say he was contained by the no-fly zone.

SEC'Y RICE: I don't think that there is anyone...

MR. RUSSERT: He was in a box.

SEC'Y RICE: I, I do not think that he was in a box. It, it—the Oil for Food program alone shows that the billions of dollars that he was collecting, he was not just going to build palaces. This was someone who had an insatiable appetite to dominate his region.

Now, without Saddam Hussein, you can look across the region and see that a lot is changing, thanks to the president's democracy promotion and the hard work of people in those countries. You have Syrian forces out of Lebanon, you have Saddam Hussein out of Iraq. The people of the Middle East are taking on authoritarian governments across the Middle East. Kuwait has given women the right to vote. I'd be the first to say that these big, historical changes are turbulent and they're difficult. But the notion that somehow there was a placid Middle East, that if we'd just left it alone, if we'd just not invaded Iraq, if we'd just not overthrown dictators, if we'd just not challenged Syrian power in Lebanon everything would be just fine, is simply not true. It was that Middle East, the malignancy of the Middle East, that we "disturbed" that led directly to the 9/11 event.

MR. RUSSERT: The president said this week that whether there'll be troops in Iraq for the unforeseeable future will be determined by the next president, meaning we're going to have troops in Iraq at least through January of '09.

SEC'Y RICE: Well, the president was asked this question in a particular way, and he answered that some American troops may well be there for the next president. But I would just point to what the president has said continually, which is that American forces are going to come down commensurate with the need as Iraqi forces stand up, and they are indeed standing up.

General Casey has talked about a significant reduction of American forces over the next year, and that significant reduction is because Iraqi forces are taking and holding territory now. Because during this most recent uptick of sectarian violence, the Iraqi Army behaved very, very well. So Iraqi forces are getting better, American forces are ceding territory, and I think it's entirely probable that we will see a significant draw-down of American forces over the next, next year. That's what General Casey believes.

MR. RUSSERT: This year.

SEC'Y RICE: It's all dependent on the ground, but this is—on, on events on the ground. But as General Casey has said, "We see the progress of the Iraqi forces, we see the progresss of the political process, and there's every reason to believe that American can start to draw down."

MR. RUSSERT: Is the insurgency in its last throes?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, the insurgency politically is certainly in, in danger because the Sunnis who stood outside of the political presence...

MR. RUSSERT: But in terms of violence, is in its last throes?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, the insurgency is still able to, to pull off violence and kill innocent children, or kill an innocent school teacher, yes, they're able to do that, and they might be able to do that some—for some time. But what they've not been able to do is to disrupt the political process, what they've not been able to do is to set Iraqis one against another in the political process, they've not been able to stop free elections, they're not able to stop the formation of the government. A few violent people can always grab headlines and can always kill innocent people.

MR. RUSSERT: It's more than a few.

SEC'Y RICE: Well, it's a few in terms of the population of Iraqis.

MR. RUSSERT: But it could not exist without being enabled by the population.

SEC'Y RICE: Well, the population is less and less enabling. Every day there are reports that Zarqawi and al-Qaeda meet stiff resistance, indeed violent resistance, from Iraqi tribes. Sunnis are now a part of the political process. And I know that people wonder when will the government formation finish. It, it seems to be dragging on after the election. But I would just note, I read the other day someone said, "Well, they're dividing up the spoils of the offices." That's not what they're doing in this process. They are writing a government program on which the national unity will govern. They are writing the rules by which they will govern, and they're determining who will take key positions. So, this is an extraordinary matter, an extraordinary scene with Iraqi Sunni and Shia and Kurds all working together toward a unity government.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to Afghanistan. There's a story moving on the wires that the Afghan court has just dismissed the charges against this gentleman who had converted to Christianity. Are you aware that was going to happen?

SEC'Y RICE: I can't confirm that particular report, Tim. I know that the Afghans are working on it. They've been very aware of the issue and of the concerns about the issue. This is a young democracy that is working with a Constitution that, like many constitutions when they're first born, that the conflicts have to be worked out. We have our own history of conflicts that had to be worked out after a new Constitution. And so, the Afghans are working, working on it, but America has stood solidly for religious freedom as a bedrock, the bedrock of, of democracy. And we'll see, but I can't confirm that specifically.

MR. RUSSERT: Should American Christian missionaries be encouraged to go to Afghanistan?

SEC'Y RICE: Well, I think that Afghans are pleased to get the help that they can get. We need to be respectful of Afghan sovereignty.

MR. RUSSERT: Including Christian missionaries?

SEC'Y RICE: We have to be respectful of Afghan sovereignty. And, Tim, respectful of the fact that this is a country that is coming out of 25 years of civil war, a country that's going to have to find its own way, and a country that is going through one of the most difficult debates that any society goes through, and that is the proper role of religion in the politics of the state. It's a debate, by the way, that all of us went through at some point in our history.

MR. RUSSERT: But Madame Secretary, we talk all the time about spreading democracy, and your own State Department report on human rights abuses said Afghanistan says that Christianity is punishable by death, that missionaries, Christian missionaries, are not welcome, that women cannot get a passport or leave the country without permission of a man. This is a far cry from the responsibilities and rights given to most people who live in a democracy.

SEC'Y RICE: And it's also a far cry from the Taliban. This is a country that has come an enormous way in four years, where, yes, the issues of the Constitution are going to be debated in this very traditional society that is trying now to move to a modern political system. I would just ask people to remember how hard this was for us.

Tim, I am, I hate to say, 51 years old, but it's in my lifetime that black Americans were guaranteed the right to vote. Who are we to be so, so insistent that people must do this overnight? We're working with the Afghan government. They're moving in a democratic fashion. It's going to be hard. But when something arises, as with Mr. Rahman, it is the obligation of the international community and of the United States—and there has been support across Europe for this—that the Afghans be reminded that in their own Constitution they have enshrined the universal declaration on human rights which guarantees certain religious freedoms. We didn't have that Constitution with the Taliban to work with.

MR. RUSSERT: So Christians should be able to worship. People should be able to convert to Christianity in Afghanistan.

SEC'Y RICE: Of course, Tim. That our—the universal declaration of human rights is, is clear on this. But I would be the first to say that Afghans are going to have to work through some of the difficulties and contradictions.

MR. RUSSERT: But it can't be done on a case-by-case basis. It has to be ensured.

SEC'Y RICE: They will have to work through court cases, as we have, to interpret the Constitution. They will have to work through individual cases, and I'm quite certain that the evolution of Afghan democracy is going in the right direction. But I would just remind people that four years ago the Taliban was executing people wantonly in stadiums for playing music. This is a country that has come a very, very long way, and women were not being educated at all. It was punishable to educate women. This is a place that has come a long, long way. Let's support them in their quest to become a modern democracy.

MR. RUSSERT: You mentioned you're 51 and I'm curious if it's time for a career change. We've discussed future options for you on this program. Here is the headline all across the paper: NFL Commissioner Paul "Tagliabue Step Down in July." And here's our conversations in 2001, '02, '03, and '04 on this subject.

(Videotape):

MR. RUSSERT: In your next life, you want to be commissioner of the NFL?

SEC'Y RICE: Right.

SEC'Y RICE: I think the NFL is really a terrific institution.

I'd love to be associated with it someday.

MR. RUSSERT: Another first.

(End videotape)

(Videotape):

SEC'Y RICE: Tim, I'm going off to be commissioner of NFL, remember?

(Videotape):

SEC'Y RICE: I think Paul Tagliabue is doing a fine job as NFL commissioner, but I look forward to the day that he decides to retire and I, I very much think that the, the best job in America's got to be NFL commissioner.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: You just announced your candidacy.

SEC'Y RICE: I still think the best job in America maybe NFL commissioner. It's a little too soon for me. I've got lots to do as secretary of state. I think if my ship came in, it's going to have to leave the port without me.

MR. RUSSERT: So you're not interested?

SEC'Y RICE: No, not interested.

MR. RUSSERT: Now, Fred Barnes, a reporter, has close ties to the—sources to the White House, wrote this in The Wall Street Journal the other day, "Third Term for Bush. The president's most spectacular move would be to anoint a presidential successor. This would require Vice President Cheney to resign. His replacement? Condoleezza Rice, whom Mr. Bush regards highly."

SEC'Y RICE: We've got a great vice president of the United States in Vice President Cheney. He is doing a fantastic job for the president and for the country. He is really one of the strongest supporters that I've drawn on from time to time, and he's doing a great job. I think I better try to be secretary of state. You just gave a whole list of things that I have to work on as secretary of state.

MR. RUSSERT: But if the president, if the president came to you and said, "Dick Cheney's going to resign, I want you to be my vice president because I want you to run in 2008," you wouldn't say no?

SEC'Y RICE: Tim, I think we've been through this conversation about 2008. Not, not going to—I'm not going to do that, that's not what I want to do with my life.

MR. RUSSERT: Laura Bush said you'd make an excellent president, and, "I don't think we can talk her into running."

SEC'Y RICE: Well, that's—I really appreciate that the first lady, who I admire very much, thinks that, but the last part of that's right.

MR. RUSSERT: Will not happen.

SEC'Y RICE: I don't think it's going to happen.

MR. RUSSERT: Madam Secretary, as always, we thank you for sharing your views.

SEC'Y RICE: Thank you very much.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next, David Broder, Elisabeth Bumiller, Charlie Cook, John Harwood interpret the Washington political landscape, tackle the issue of immigration, and look at the midterm elections in 2006 right here on MEET THE PRESS.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we are back. Welcome all.

Immigration. Look at these scenes and these pictures from Los Angeles. Five hundred thousand people, according to police estimates, turned out to protest some of the immigration reforms that are being discussed, debated, perhaps legislated in Washington.

David Broder, how big of a political issue is immigration, and what are the potential pitfalls for politicians as they try to navigate the issue?

MR. DAVID BRODER: It started as a border issue in the states that have common boundaries with Mexico particularly. It has now become a national issue. Talking to Republican governor of Minnesota, it's a big issue in his state; suburban Illinois districts now find large Hispanic populations. It has become a much tougher issue for politicians of both parties, but particularly I think for Republicans.

MR. RUSSERT: The polling we have seen with the Wall Street Journal/NBC, 88 percent say it's a serious problem; 62 percent say that illegal, illegal, immigrants should not be allowed to become citizens, and 60 percent say that we shouldn't even give them guest-worker status to come here temporarily.

Elisabeth Bumiller, you wrote a piece in The New York Times. Quote, "Bush is facing a difficult path in immigration," talking about the joint pressures on President Bush. From the business community we need these people to work, because Americans won't do the jobs, and the conservative community is saying, "Illegal immigrants: get 'em out." What does he do?

MS. ELISABETH BUMILLER: He's trying to thread the needle and walk a very fine line between both of these groups. I mean, he's a, you know, governor—he a former governor of a border state so he—this is very close to his political experience. Emotionally he is—he gives—in the early days of this debate in 2004 he was giving very emotional speeches about America, the land of immigrants, and he was proposing this, this very, what many Republicans said was a very generous guest-worker program. He has pulled back a lot now under, under onslaught from, from conservatives, and now he's emphasizing the border security part of his plan. He's trying to do both. There's a lot—as we know, there's a lot of different proposals on the Hill right now; we'll see some of them next week. The White House is hanging back, waiting to see what, what comes out of the, out of the smoke, and then will, will weigh in.

MR. RUSSERT: Charlie Cook, it appears that the American people have very firm views about immigration, and that the president and other politicians are going to try to nuance the issue. Is that possible?

MR. CHARLIE COOK: Well it's a funny issue. If you ask people what's the most important problem facing the country, it's a small single-digit issue. But then once you raise it, boy, emotions run high and it's hard to split the baby. And, and I can see where the president's trying to go the, "Let's build, build a wall or build a barrier, stop illegal immigration, but for the people we have we've got to mainstream them and keep this work force going, because that's important for agribusiness and business."

MR. RUSSERT: Is that politically acceptable to conservatives?

MR. COOK: It's not acceptable to anybody, but it's the only way, I think—I mean, they're going to have to figure out a way to split the baby. Because one way or the other is, is, is just not going to work.

MR. RUSSERT: John:

MR. JOHN HARWOOD: Well, let's don't forget, Tim, Democrats are also split on this issue. A lot of African-Americans are not very sympathetic with the cause of the guest-worker program.

The White House, one of the ways Elisabeth mentioned, trying to thread the needle, one of the things they're looking at is trying to push the final resolution of this till after the mid-term elections. That also could happen on some budget issues as well as a way of trying to make some sort of common cause between moderate Democrats and moderate Republicans.

MR. RUSSERT: You know, in 2000, "Florida, Florida, Florida"; 2004, "Ohio, Ohio, Ohio." You look at 2008, that Electoral College map, and you look at states like New Mexico and Arizona and Colorado, some real potential swing states, and this issue could be very decisive as we play it through.

MR. HARWOOD: Well, let's don't forget one other thing, Tim. This was raised in the Virginia governor's race last year by the Republican candidate who went after some of these job centers that attract illegal immigrants. Didn't work for him. So sometimes the emotion of the issue doesn't always prevail.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to Iraq. A big discussion in our country about Iraq, the way the issue is being covered by the media. Vice President Cheney last Sunday made these comments: "There's a constant sort of perception, if you will, that's created because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad. It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress towards rebuilding Iraq."

Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld weighed in: "The terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq. I believe that history will show that to be the case. Fortunately, history is not made up of daily headlines, blogs on Web sites or the latest sensational attack."

And then this Wednesday, President Bush went to a town meeting in West Virginia of his supporters, and here's one of the questions that was asked:

(Videotape, March 22, 2006):

UNIDENTIFIED WOMAN: And I ask you this from the bottom of my heart, for a solution to this, because it seems that our major media networks don't want to portray the good. They just want to focus...

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: OK, hold on a second.

WOMAN: They just want to focus on another car bomb, or they just want to focus on some more bloodshed.

MR. RUSSERT: Does that issue work, that it's the mainstream media that's distorting the good news that's coming out of Iraq?

MR. COOK: I think it helps with the Republican base, but I don't think it helps with swing voters at all. First of all, it's the nature of news. I mean on the evening news at night, a car that isn't in Iraq isn't in the news—the house that doesn't burn, a building that doesn't burn, a killing that doesn't take place. News is when—is the aberration, is the change from normalcy.

Secondly, this--80 journalists so far have been killed over there. I mean it, it's, it's, I mean, getting out there and looking around, wandering around Iraq, looking for good news? Sounds to me like a good way to get killed.

And then the third thing is, I don't know if they really want to try to sell this, because people don't think that, that, that everything's fine. I mean, I think this is just an extenuation of holding up the banner that says "Mission accomplished." I mean, people don't think it's well, they can see that it's not going well. And what happens in 15 provinces doesn't matter. What—if they think that this thing is just really going to hell in a hand basket, it's kind of—I mean that's what, you know, that's that.

MR. RUSSERT: David Broder?

MR. BRODER: The ombudsman at The Post, Deborah Howell, has a very thoughtful analysis of this whole question in the paper today, which I would refer people to. I think the answer is that when there is this level of violence and turmoil in a country, that has to be the heart of the story that the press is, is telling. The other parts of it do get told, but they do not dominate the news and they can't dominate the news given the realities of that country.

MR. HARWOOD: Nor should they dominate the news. It's a very weak argument. When, when you have, as Charlie said, journalists over there who cannot move around the country to report because they know that, that they're in danger of being killed at any moment, that tells you about the state of security in the country. It's not good.

MR. RUSSERT: The White House?

MS. BUMILLER: The other thing that's interesting, what you didn't show was the president's response to her. I was there that day, and he was very, very careful not to jump on her bandwagon. In fact—I mean, obviously, he didn't have to, she did it for him. But the point is he said, "Look, wait a minute. You know, I understand your frustration, but we have a free press in this country, we can't tell them what to do." He pulled back somewhat from her comment.

And I think you're right, Charlie, that they aren't—they know they can't sell this, and when they've tried in the past, it has backfired on them.

MR. RUSSERT: But the president also said don't be afraid to go to blogs and find out some more information.

MS. BUMILLER: Yes. I mean, I mean, I'm, I'm—these are gradations here, I mean, in White House response.

MR. RUSSERT: But is the White House convinced that in order to secure the base of the Republican Party for the president, it doesn't hurt to go after the media a little bit?

MS. BUMILLER: Not—of course not. They do it all the time. And, and they complain all the time about, about, about what we do. But, but I, I have noticed this past week Scott McClellan saying, the White House press secretary, you know, "We're not blaming the media for the war in Iraq." He said that a couple times this week, and so, so it, it's—they're—again, they're being a little more careful here than usual.

MR. HARWOOD: And did you really fall asleep in that press pool, or was that a cheap shot by the president?

MS. BUMILLER: It was completely inaccurate. I won't say I haven't nodded off in previous speeches, but not that one.

MR. RUSSERT: There is a difference between, difference between meditation and sleep, you see.

David Broder, let me turn to the, the rebellion that I sense with some House members, particularly in the Republican Party when you go talk to them privately. You captured it in your column this way: "The conflict [over Dubai Ports World] brought to the surface deep-seated resentments from the Capitol end of Pennsylvania Avenue toward the people around the president - and, surprisingly, toward Bush himself. The harmony that had prevailed during most of Bush's tenure - the deference that a Republican-controlled Congress has generally shown to his wishes - disappeared. Even the normal circumspection with which congressional Republicans treat the White House withered in the unexpected heat of this dispute." And then this: Congressman "Tom Davis of Virginia, a committee chairman, told The Post, 'This is probably the worst administration ever in getting Congress's opinion on anything.'" Ouch!

MR. BRODER: Well, you'd heard this kind of comment—all of us had—privately from Republicans on the Hill. But the fact that somebody like Tom Davis, former chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, is saying it publicly, on the record, gives you a measure of the sort of fall-off of any sense of either loyalty or intimidation, whatever you want to call it, to the White House. They feel that they are on their own and that the president is going to take care of his business, but they're going to take care of their own.

MR. RUSSERT: One of the things being talked about, Elisabeth Bumiller, is a staff shake-up at the White House.

MS. BUMILLER: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: This is how you reported it: "Republicans outside the White House said that they had pushed Mr. Bush not to replace" Karl "Rove," the chief political operator, deputy chief of staff, "but rather to bring in someone at the same level or above, perhaps as minister without portfolio. One Republican said Mr. Bush should view it as replacing a top-notch pitcher struggling in the later innings of a baseball game, rather than as a vote of no-confidence in a friend." So who's the reliever?

MS. BUMILLER: Well, there's lots of names out there. You've heard them as well as I have. Ed Gillespie, you know, Bill Paxon, there's lots of names. The question is, are they going to do it? And, and right now, there's, there's a lot of talk at the White House, there's no indications the president has signed on to this idea. Karl Rove has told people that he thinks that bringing somebody in without a clear line of authority is a mistake. It—and, and the bottom line is what is this going to—is this going to help with the war in Iraq, is it going to help with—you know, that, that—is it going—you know, we're, we're not talking about changing policies here, we're changing about, you know, changing, you know, some, some personnel. So that's—it's unclear if anything is going to happen.

MR. RUSSERT: John:

MR. HARWOOD: Chances are pretty good something will happen. The president, of course, didn't rule out the idea of bringing someone on. Bill Paxon's a possibility, Vin Weber's also a possibility. And I think over time you could see some changes in the White House staff as well. When you look at sort of the, the big three, or, or the, the biggest names in the White House, Andy Card, Karl Rove, Dan Bartlett, you could see some change over time. Andy Card probably the most likely to leave at some point, he's almost already the longest-serving chief of staff ever, you could see some change there.

MR. RUSSERT: On, on the verge of dethroning Sherman Adams...

MR. HARWOOD: You bet.

MR. RUSSERT: ...of Dwight Eisenhower fame.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to the midterm elections, where all these things invariably lead. Here's our latest numbers from the Wall Street Journal poll, right track/wrong track, the United States headed in the right direction: 26 percent, one of four; 62 percent say wrong track. And then the so-called generic question, "Who do you want to control Congress?": Republicans, 37 percent; 50 percent now, a majority, say the Democrats.

But as always, Charlie Cook is warning us to go slow. And here's his latest column from the National Journal, "Despite national political trends indicating that the GOP is in serious trouble, a race-by-race 'micro' analysis suggests that Democrats cannot easily seize control of the House or the Senate this fall. In the Senate, Democrats need a net gain of six seats. ... Democrats need to win in Tennessee [where Bill Frist is retiring] ... [and] have to run the table by defeating all of the most vulnerable Republicans while holding all of their own seats, including in Minnesota, where their incumbent is retiring, and in Washington state, where Senator Maria Cantwell faces a very strong challenger. They also need to hang on to somewhat more secure open seats in Maryland and Vermont, as well as 14 other incumbents. Although not impossible in a favorable political climate, this is a very tall order."

And here are the vulnerable states, according to The Cook Report, vulnerable senators: Conrad Burns in Montana, Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island, Mike DeWine, Ohio, Santorum in Pennsylvania, Jim Talent, Missouri, and the Tennessee seat.

Charlie, what do you see in the Senate?

MR. COOK: This is—you know, when you look at this election from the big picture, the national numbers, boy, it just looks horrible and it looks like, gosh, Republicans will be lucky if they hold on to anything. And then you do the race-by-race like this. Now, the thing is, the first three or four for Democrats probably aren't that hard. But when you get to the fifth and sixth seats, you get to, to, to winning in Ohio and you win—and, and talk about the Tennessee open seat, gosh, that's hard. I mean, it's going to take a real, real, real strong wind at their backs. And, and it's the kind of thing where there are structural barriers. I mean, 85 percent of all incumbent senators get reelected, and you've got to knock out five of them? You know, it can happen, but it's hard. And it's kind of like having structural barriers that are out there that are protecting the Republican majorities, and if this is a Category 1, 2, or 3 hurricane, those barriers are strong enough, but if it's a 4 or a 5, they're not. And the question is how tall will it be?

MR. RUSSERT: And...

MR. HARWOOD: And, Tim, some of this—some of these ranges—races can change overnight in a hurry. Conrad Burns has now got a primary challenge from a significant Republican. There's some talk among Republicans that maybe Conrad Burns would find something else to do, maybe in the Bush administration. That could change in a hurry.

MR. RUSSERT: Charlie, you also say this about the House: "In the House, where Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats, only about three dozen are truly in play today." So it's, it's tough, and you have to get a straight, an inside straight.

MR. COOK: Right. There're basically 24 Republican seats that today are vulnerable. Democrats have to win 15 out of 24 and hold on to their 11 most tough—the toughest ones. And again, they can do it. There, there, if, if there were more Republicans retirements in tough districts, if—but redistricting and the incumbency advantages that have built up over the years just make pulling this kind of win hard unless it's a Category 4 or 5.

MR. RUSSERT: Well, in 1994, you talked about microchanges, 30 to 35 seats in the House, and the tsunami came. Republicans won 52 seats, electing Newt Gingrich speaker of the House. Newt Gingrich has now weighed in, David Broder, and said that the Democrat slogan in 2006 should be, "Had Enough?" And he thinks that would work.

MR. BRODER: What a helper Gingrich is. I think the Democrats' real slogan may very well be, "Wouldn't You Like To Have Somebody Watching The Store?" Because the sense that I get from talking to voters is that they are not ready to entrust the government to the Democrats, but they're not really comfortable with the way the Republicans have been running things. And the simple idea of having a little oversight, a little checks and balances back in the system is potentially a really powerful argument for Democrats.

MR. RUSSERT: Elisabeth Bumiller, when the White House hears "a little oversight, checks and balances," to them it means hearings with subpoena power.

MS. BUMILLER: That's right.

MR. RUSSERT: And they don't like that.

MS. BUMILLER: No, no. And, you know, Karl Rove has told people he's optimistic they can hang on to both Houses if, if—but he also has said, "Yes, it can happen," the way Charlie says. And you know, you're going to see—the president's out a lot these days campaigning already, raising money for candidates, and he's out in all these big states.

MR. RUSSERT: Because the last thing the White House wants is investigation into weapons of mass destruction...

MS. BUMILLER: The last.

MR. RUSSERT: ...into prison abuse, into religious rights in Afghanistan.

Drop, drop the issue and there's a hearing.

MS. BUMILLER: Right. I mean, that's the last—that's the last two years of the Bush presidency then, and they know that.

MR. HARWOOD: That's true, Tim, but let's keep in mind, first of all, keeping Republican majority is not the top priority for this White House, winning the war in Iraq is the top priority. And secondly, it might not be the worst thing to happen to George W. Bush. If Democrats had a weak majority, you could see some deals cut, especially on entitlement programs, the last two years, as Democrats try to resolve a problem before they hope they get a president in 2009.

MR. RUSSERT: David, is it enough for the Democrats to say, "We're not the Republicans," period, or do they have to come forward with a specific proposals to deal with these problems, including Iraq?

MR. BRODER: Well, if they're going to be responsible, they need some policy. And the great void on the Democratic side is nobody can tell you today what their policy is about Iraq, about entitlements, or about any of the other challenges facing the country. Whether they need that politically, somebody else is smart enough to decide, but if they're going to be a responsible party, they need to talk about policy.

MR. RUSSERT: Do they need to do it?

MR. COOK: See, I would argue that minority parties don't have to be responsible. That's the one good thing going for them, and when they try to be responsible, they're just going to dig themselves into a hole. I mean, you're on—your job is to throw rocks. Once you start offering alternatives, then suddenly you're playing defense as well. I think Democrats would be crazy, from a political standpoint, to offer up proposals.

MR. RUSSERT: That movie, "Cool Hand Luke," sometimes nothing's a real cool hand.

MR. COOK: Exactly.

MR. RUSSERT: Elisabeth, Afghanistan. A very thorny issue for this president who is very open about his Christianity, and now we have the situation where it appears this gentleman who converted to Christianity in Afghanistan has been spared the death penalty, but it's going to be an ongoing issue as Secretary Rice seemed to indicate, as that democracy in Afghanistan goes through some serious growing pains dealing with religious rights, women's rights, civil rights, human rights.

MS. BUMILLER: Right. Well, this is what happens when you call for democracy in, in problematic parts of the world. We saw this in the elections in the Palestinian territories. Obviously, what do you do when you call for a democracy and the wrong party wins, in your view? This is also what's going on in Afghanistan. The president was very—you know, you saw him this week saying this was deeply troubling. I was—it would be interesting to know what was going on behind the scenes and what kind of pressure was put on Afghanistan, our good ally. Obviously, it looks like they got out of this one for now.

MR. RUSSERT: John Harwood, Secretary Rice openly talking about American troop withdrawals. How much are politicians expecting to have significant troop withdrawals before the midterm elections?

MR. HARWOOD: I think Republicans are definitely expecting it, and that could change the political environment. That's one of the biggest drivers of this wrong-track sentiment that we've been talking about this morning. But as David discussed, Democrats don't exactly have a clear voice. They're going to try to finesse it this week and have an event drawing together all factions of the party behind—criticizing Bush and calling for some sort of transition without specifying exactly how it's going to take place. Trying to, to have an umbrella under which those who want to withdraw troops quickly and those who want to go more slowly can all rally behind.

MR. RUSSERT: Isn't that the Republicans' hope, David, that by October enough troops have come home the president can then give a speech which says, "You see, we're making progress. Stay the course, don't take a chance by going along with these other guys and doing something dangerous"?

MR. BRODER: If that happens, the Republicans would benefit and the country would benefit. And let's just hope that it's possible.

MR. RUSSERT: Charlie Cook, politically, will that be enough to deal with people's anxieties, concerns about Iraq?

MR. COOK: That would help a lot. I mean, your NBC/Wall Street Journal poll showed that Iraq was just a wet blanket over the administration. It was weighing everything down. And these Republican members, one of us—one of them told us he comes in for the Tuesday House Republican Conference lunch, and he can tell who's just gotten a poll back, that they have this shell-shocked look on their face. Somebody else said "ashen." One other member says suddenly they start going into fund-raising frenzies because they're getting polls back in their individual districts that are starting to reflect those national numbers that look so horrible for them.

MR. HARWOOD: It's March Madness for Congressional Republicans, too, Tim, I'll tell you that.

MR. RUSSERT: Speaking of March Madness, you're a Duke man. Who do you like now?

MR. HARWOOD: Boy, I'm rooting for George Mason. That's the, that's the underdog pick right now.

MR. RUSSERT: The Patriots. Charlie:

MR. COOK: LSU. I'm from...

MR. RUSSERT: Shreveport.

MR. COOK: ...Shreveport, Louisiana. Georgetown's out, so I'm for LSU.

MR. RUSSERT: David Broder.

MR. BRODER: Villanova.

MR. RUSSERT: Villanova.

I've got my BC hat. I was ready to wear this for the Final Four, but—huh?

I—you know what, you got to go for "Big Baby" Davis.

Elisabeth, you're the basketball fan.

MS. BUMILLER: Oh, yeah, I got—whatever you say, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: "Who's playing?"

MS. BUMILLER: Yeah, I'm better than that.

MR. RUSSERT: All right, you sure are. Elisabeth Bumiller, John Harwood, David Broder, Charlie Cook. We'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Don't forget you can now watch the entire hour of MEET THE PRESS whenever, wherever you want. Our MEET THE PRESS webcast posted each Sunday at 1 p.m. Eastern on our Web site: mtp.msnbc.com.

That's all for today. We'll be back next week. If it's Sunday, it's MEET THE PRESS.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone.

The immigration debate hits Congress this week after one of the largest protests in recent U.S. history. More than a million people -- half a million people marched in Los Angeles yesterday against House legislation that would make undocumented immigrants felons. They were joined by protesters in more than a dozen other cities, including 50,000 in Denver and 4,000 in Charlotte, North Carolina.

And we're joined now by two legislators at the center of this hot debate, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Arlen Specter, and Congressman Tom Tancredo, the leading House advocate for tougher immigration laws. Welcome to This Week, gentlemen.

TANCREDO: Thank you.

SPECTER: Thank you.

TANCREDO: Pleasure to be on the show.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Specter, let me begin with you. This is a very emotionally charged issue, and probably the most loaded word is amnesty. Because the bill you're talking about would give a path to citizenship or legal status for illegal immigrants, Congressman Tancredo and his allies say that's thinly disguised amnesty. How do you respond?

SPECTER: It's not amnesty, George, because these undocumented aliens are going to have to pay a fine. They're going to have to work for six years to be on the citizenship path. They're going to have to go through a criminal background check. They're going to be checked out very, very carefully. They're not going to go ahead of people who have been waiting in line for citizenship. They're going to go to the end of the line for people who have stayed at home and gone through the normal channels.

We're facing a difficult situation, because we have approximately 11 million undocumented aliens here, and we've got to find some way to deal with them. We have a national security problem. They've not been identified. If we do not have some realistic proposal to give them an opportunity to work lawfully and ultimately to obtain citizenship, then they're going to be fugitives, and we need to know who they are and where they are. And if they have criminal records, we need to send them back to their country of origin, but if they're prepared to work to become American citizens in the long line traditionally of immigrants who have helped make this country, we can have both a nation of laws and a welcoming nation of workers who do some very, very important jobs for our economy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: There you go, Congressman Tancredo. He says it's not an amnesty.

TANCREDO: Let's see. The Black's Law Dictionary defines an amnesty as a sovereign act of forgiveness for past acts granted by a government to all persons or certain class of persons who have been guilty of a crime or a deceit.

Now, let me tell you, it is an amnesty. The crime they have committed is coming into this country without our permission. The penalty that is supposed to be applied to that, under the law that we have today, is deportation. If you say you can be here, you can do that, you can come across the border without our permission, and you will be able to stay -- and, yes, there will be some, you know, a little fine or whatever, that's -- it's not deportation, it is amnesty. And what it does is send a horrible message.

Thursday, I was speaking to a group of people who were being -- who were becoming naturalized citizens -- and I do this fairly often -- and it's a great opportunity to meet these people. It's a wonderful experience. There are about 60 people who were taking their oath of citizenship. And every time I go and speak to these folks, I always give them two messages. I say, number one, welcome to America. And, number two, thank you for doing it the right way.

Because, you see, when you reward millions and millions of people, which Senator Specter's bill does do, for coming across the border the wrong way, doing it illegally, then you -- it's a slap in the face to every single person who has done it the right way, and to everybody who's waiting out there to do it the right way. It's bad policy. And it's also, I think, for the Republican Party especially, bad policy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you're saying that all 11 million or so undocumented aliens in the country right now should be deported? We should go after them, round them up, send them home?

Here's what you should do. You should begin a very -- I know this is a radical proposal I'm about to make here, so everybody hold on to their seats, but let's try this. Let's try enforcing the law. We don't actually even need another law on the books. We don't need Senator Specter's. We don't need any that I have introduced.

No law is necessary if we actually enforce the ones we have on the books today, because one of those laws that would go a long way towards solving this problem, by the way, if you enforced it is the law against employers hiring people who are here illegally. If you actually began to enforce that, then you would see that millions of people will return home to their countries of origin voluntarily because, frankly, there's nothing else to do.

If you can't get a job in this country and if you can't get social service benefits, you go home. Those folks who won't do that, yes, you do need to deport because that is the law.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Specter, the business community.

TANCREDO: Now, when...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Excuse me, Congressman, let me bring in Senator Specter here.

TANCREDO: I'm sorry.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The business community seems dead set against that kind of an instant check system. They say it's not going to work and they're afraid you're going to be criminalizing employers.

SPECTER: Well, we are working on a system to make it pretty much work like a credit card, but when Congressman Tancredo says they're going to go home voluntarily, I think that is wishful thinking. We have created the demand for these workers. There are 11 million of them who are doing jobs that nobody else wants to do.

If you're going to make them fugitives, if you're going to do what Congressman Tancredo wants to do, you're going to create a situation where, as President Bush last Monday in Cleveland said, you're going to be forcing them to come into 18-wheelers. Those are big trucks where they're stuffed in to come into this country illegally, and as President Bush said, that's not the American way to do it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Both of you believe that it should be a crime to knowingly provide assistance or services to illegal immigrants. And I want to show you something Senator Hillary Clinton said this week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY): I think we need to sound the alarm about what is being done in the Congress. This bill would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman Tancredo, she's basically saying your approach is unchristian.

TANCREDO: I'm not really surprised that Hillary Clinton doesn't know the first thing about the Bible. Her impression, her analysis, her interpretation of both the law and the Bible are certainly wrong to say the least. This has nothing to do -- the bill we passed out of the house has nothing to do with criminalizing good Samaritans nor anyone that...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, except, sir, let me interrupt you right there. You would make the a crime to provide some assistance to illegal immigrants, right? If someone were running a soup kitchen and knowingly providing assistance to illegal immigrants, under your bill, that would be a crime, correct?

TANCREDO: Actually, actually, the law that has existed in this country for years is the law that is being rewritten into this bill, because there was an amendment in the Senate in the ag bill that struck provisions of it. It's not new.

It's been on the books for years, and what it says is knowingly, willfully going out, it's like going to the border, you know, providing the transportation, hiding them when they're here, if you do those kinds of things knowingly, willfully aiding and abetting then you can be prosecuted. Nobody is talking about prosecuting, nor have we ever prosecuted under the law while it was in existence anyone for providing soup at a soup kitchen or a place of rest for somebody who turns out to be an illegal alien. That is ridiculous, and it's...

SPECTER: George, if I...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Go ahead, Senator.

TANCREDO: I'm sorry. Go ahead, Senator.

SPECTER: George, if I could make a comment. I don't really care what Senator Hillary Clinton has to say about the Bible, but when she says Congress is creating a situation which is harsh, bear in mind the House of Representatives has passed a bill, but the Senate is still a part of the Congress.

And we have our own ideas and we can make changes and go to conference, and, I think, come out with a sensible bill.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But what do you think about this provision itself?

(CROSSTALK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me just interrupt you right there -- about this provision that would require -- I mean would make it a crime to knowingly provide assistance.

Cardinal Mahoney of Los Angeles has said he would ask his priests to defy that legislation. He doesn't think they should be in the business of investigating like that. Do you think that provision should be part of the law?

SPECTER: I think it should be modified. I think that people who provide humanitarian assistance are justifiably worried that it is too broadly stated.

And I think, when we deal with smugglers who are bringing the people in for profit, it is one thing. And I think that's what we'll work out. There's a lot of times, George, where you have the House or even the Senate which will come up with language which is too broad.

And when it's analyzed and people read it, it'll be changed. And that language is too broad. But I'm not going to condemn the House bill for that reason.

I want to go to conference and I want to pass a Senate bill which is different -- go to conference and be sure we're not criminalizing people who are providing humanitarian assistance.

STEPHANOPOULOS: One other question on the House bill: It makes it a felony to enter the country illegally. Would your bill do that?

SPECTER: No, no. It is now a misdemeanor for somebody to come to the United States without going through the legal processes. And my bill retains that in its form as a misdemeanor.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So Congressman Tancredo, I want to -- Senator Specter says he wants to modify your bill.

Are you willing to have another look taken at that language to make sure that it's only punishing people who are ferrying immigrants across the border rather than those who might be providing some kind of other humanitarian assistance?

TANCREDO: Yes. If there is a need to do that, I'm more than willing to look at it.

Please understand why that law has been on the books for as long as it has. And please understand what happened when you actually -- what did happen is they repealed this. And, by the way, an amendment to the Ag bill repealed this provision of the law.

You know, you guys, there are organizations -- it doesn't say just any religion, it says any religion or religious institution or organization.

Now, there are certain organizations in this country affiliated with certain religions that have, in fact, provided that kind of safe haven for people.

Yes, I'm talking about Islam. And we have raided various institutions and closed them down because they give cover to, when somebody comes into this country illegally, especially someone who's coming in to do damage to us, they need cover. They need a place to go, a place to live, a job to be given.

That's what this particular language is designed to deal with. And so, you know, if you want to actually go and specifically say, but if you are providing food in a soup kitchen that nobody is going to bother you, I'm not against that.

But what happened is that the Senate did, in fact, with a very broad amendment, strike any way -- strike anything from the bill that would have criminalized that act.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me move on.

TANCREDO: And that went way too far.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me move on to another subject. Your house bill includes funding for $2.2 billion for a seven-mile wall across the border.

And I want to show a study by the Congressional Research Service that shows that the portion of the border where a wall has already been built in San Diego in 1992, they've actually had fairly good success in lowering the number of apprehensions from about 600,000 in 1992 before the wall was built to only about 200,000 today.

Senator Specter, your proposal, so far, doesn't include funding for a wall. Since it's shown to at least have had some effect in San Diego, why not expand it?

SPECTER: Well, our proposal does have provisions for a wall on metropolitan areas.

But we do not agree with the House bill about a 700-mile-long wall which is what they have proposed.

But there are areas in Arizona, for example, near border cities, San Diego, a border city, where we think the wall has some merit.

We want to use modern technological devices. We call it a virtual wall. We use overhead telemetry. We use unmanned drones. We increase border agents very, very substantially. We think we can make the borders secure without having a 700-mile wall.

STEPHANOPOULOS: We only have a couple minutes left. Congressman Tancredo, first, do you want to respond to that on the wall?

TANCREDO: Yes, you know, the 700 miles -- it didn't just, somebody flip a coin and come up with that particular kind of number. It was done because we looked at those traffic areas where we could, in fact, create an obstacle to the flow. And we wanted to direct the flow.

That's the way that the fence works, or the wall, as you say. It's really a fence. That's the way it does work. And it does direct the flow into areas where we can then have, as Senator Specter says, a virtual wall in place.

But it helps us. It's just one tiny part of a problem. One tiny part of an attempt to actually secure the border. And believe me, doing it just in the metropolitan areas, all that does, of course, is move those folks around it and into the deserts, and it's much more -- much more dangerous that way. So...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Before I let you go...

TANCREDO: ... there is a purpose...

SPECTER: George...

TANCREDO: There is a purpose for the wall.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Specter, before I let you go...

SPECTER: George, may I make...

STEPHANOPOULOS: One comment, but I also want to ask you one question. First, Senator Frist has said if you can't get a bill out of committee tomorrow, that he's going to bring a bill to the floor himself that doesn't have guest worker provisions. Are you going to get your bill out tomorrow?

SPECTER: We're going to get the bill out tomorrow, George. We may have to work very, very late into the night, but we will.

I'd like to make two points very quickly. One on guest worker. Before people can bring in guest workers, there has to be a demonstrated need that there's no American which can -- who can fill the job. So we're not going to be taking away American jobs.

The second point I want to make is the point that President Bush has made, and that is that we are a nation both of laws and a nation of immigrants, and I want to cite as exhibit A my own family. Both of my parents were immigrants. When the czar wanted to send my father to Siberia in 1911, he chose instead to come to Pennsylvania, and my mother came as a child of 6 with her family, also from Russia. And my brother, two sisters and I have contributed to America, like so many immigrants have.

And it's still a country of immigrants, and it can be both a welcoming country and a country of laws.

STEPHANOPOULOS: We're going to have to end there. Senator Specter and Congressman Tancredo, thank you both very much.

The roundtable is coming up, but first, a national treasure is melting away from global warming. We go to Glacier National Park with Montana Governor Brian Schweitzer.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: How much of the park used to be glacier compared to now?

SCHWEITZER: We had over 100 glaciers. Now we're down to a couple of dozen, and by 2025, 2035, at the rate they've been declining, there will be no glaciers in Glacier National Park.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Over the next two days, ABC News is taking a comprehensive look at the facts and fear of global warming. This division-wide series will examine the latest science and possible solutions.

And it comes at a time when a new poll we conducted with Time magazine and Stanford University shows Americans more worried than ever about it: 85 percent believe global warming is real, and seven in 10 Americans think government should do more to address the problem.

With the debate in Washington at a stalemate, we went out West, where mayors and governors of both parties are taking action. One of them is Governor Brian Schweitzer of Montana.

He flew us in his state helicopter over Glacier National Park, just a spectacular sight, and dramatic evidence that global warming is not, as some argue, a hoax.

The glaciers that gave this park its name are melting.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHWEITZER: If we were here in August, what you would see is just a patch of ice right along this ridge. And that would be (inaudible) glacier. In all the rest, the snow would be gone. But if you look at some photography that we have from 50 or 70 years ago, you'll see that this glacier covered this entire area.

STEPHANOPOULOS: How much of the park used to be glacier compared to now?

SCHWEITZER: We had over 100 glaciers. Now we're down to a couple of dozen. And by 2025, 2035, at the rate that they've been declining, there will be no glaciers at Glacier National Park.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is there anything you can do or any of us can do right now to prevent the (inaudible) these glaciers, or are they gone?

SCHWEITZER: Well, at the rate that we are increasing the amount of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, I suspect that if we stopped adding more carbon dioxide, even right now, the acceleration that we've had over the last 100 years probably cannot be stopped to save the glaciers here at Glacier National Park.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So what you're saying is, these are really some of the best, most persuasive evidence we have right now that global warming is real.

SCHWEITZER: Well, that and temperatures and precipitation from around the world. Some of the warmest -- well, I think ten of the warmest years that we've measured in the last couple hundred years have been during the last 13 years.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And if the warming continues, we're going to see more fires.

SCHWEITZER: Absolutely, because what will happen is, it will change the ecologic environment of the trees that have been adapted here. And for example, the spruce bud worm (ph) that is attacking the spruce trees that we have here and killing them. As those trees die, they become much more prone to lightning strike and burning because they dry out and we have all of that timber.

STEPHANOPOULOS: There is a move now to make this whole park a protected site in the United Nations. Tell us about that.

SCHWEITZER: Well, there's been a petition brought before the United Nations to do what we can to protect this park. This really is the canary in the mine, and people all over the world cherish Glacier National Park.

So there's a movement of what to do, what we can to protect Glacier National Park. But frankly, that's a global problem. CO2 that is emitted in Europe or Asia or North America or South America, it is all a contributor. So it means that the entire world would have to move and move quickly. I'm not optimistic.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Back on the ground, the governor was optimistic about his big idea for energy independence in the environment, converting coal into clean gas.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHWEITZER: We in America are the Saudi Arabia of coal. Montana leads the way. We have almost a third of the coal in America. The technology exists to convert that coal to energy without a smokestack, remove the mercury, the sulfur and even remove the carbon dioxide and pump it back into the earth where it came from. It's called sequestering the carbon.

If we do that we can produce the energy we need so we're no longer dependent on dictators from overseas. And it will create hundreds of thousands of jobs, and we will have less carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. It's a win for everybody.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The estimates I've seen is that the earliest you could have one of these companies up and running here to make any significant change is 2010, 2012, yet all the scientists say we have to act right now.

SCHWEITZER: It's even more critical than that. In China and India, they are building coal-fired plants at an unprecedented rate. During the next 30 years, China alone will put more carbon dioxide in the atmosphere with conventional coal-fired generators than all of the rest of the planet has during the last 150 years.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, then we have no hope.

SCHWEITZER: We do. We do have hope. If we develop this technology, this coal gasification technology, and we can transfer that technology to India and China, so that instead of building conventional polluting power plants they're using the kind of technology that already exists in this country, we could save the world and we could do it right here in Montana.

We've got to control our own destiny, and right now we import 60 percent of our oil, and most of it's coming from people that aren't our friends. And we give them money, they're using that money to try to destroy our way of life. Bad way to run a business.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Probably the most memorable line of the president's State of the Union address is when he said we have to end our addiction on foreign oil. Do you think he's serious about it?

SCHWEITZER: No. We're not taking the steps to end our addiction to foreign oil. We did nothing. We are not investing in alternative energies. We could do this. We could, within 10 years -- if we were challenged, if we had a chief executive that said to the American people, I will challenge you to wean ourselves from foreign oil in 10 years, you would unleash the greatest engineering...

STEPHANOPOULOS: The president did talk about alternative energy in his State of the Union.

SCHWEITZER: But you've got to take action. You can't just use words. Where is the action?

We need public-private partnerships in the same way that we beat the Russians when we decided we were going to win the space race. We created technology, engineering marvels that we've exported all over the world.

We could do the same with energy conservation, energy efficiencies, and new ways of generating electricity and making fuels in this country.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, and a lot of people say, though, unless you do something about consumption, unless you reduce emissions from our cars, unless we get rid of our addiction, the SUVs to pickup trucks, there is no way we're going to be able to do anything about global warming.

SCHWEITZER: There is no single silver bullet. But we've got to challenge our society and our economy to be more creative in all of these areas, generating, manufacturing and conservation.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Are you ready to challenge the drivers of Montana, the drivers of the West, and say, We have to have more fuel- efficient vehicles ?

SCHWEITZER: Well, I can challenge them right now.

My wife and I, Nancy, just bought a diesel-powered Volkswagen Jetta. And we will run it exclusively on synthetic fuel, biodiesel produced in Montana and coal-to-diesel, the synthetic fuel.

We're doing it. We would challenge every family in America to do the same.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You say that Western governors are going to have to lead the way. A lot of Democrats are also looking at your experience here -- Montana's a very red state; you're a Democrat -- for lessons on how they might win nationally.

What lessons can they draw from your experience here?

SCHWEITZER: Oh, I don't know if I have any lessons out here in Montana.

Folks on the East and West Coasts and the political experts -- they talk about red and blue states.

But when people go to the polls in places like Montana, they don't think of themselves as red or blue. They watch the folks. They're looking for people with good ideas. They're looking for people to be straight with them. That's all I've done in Montana.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But do you think Democrats in Washington have lost their way?

SCHWEITZER: Well, I think Democrats in Washington, D.C., mostly represent the coasts.

If you look at the map of the country, the so-called blue states if you will, you'll find that a great part of them are on the coasts. People are different on the coasts than they are in the heartland. They're different than we are in the Rocky Mountains.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The Democrats' front-runner right now is Senator Clinton. Can you sell her in the West?

SCHWEITZER: You know, I'll just give you a little history, a brief history of Montana. Bill Clinton got 38 percent the first time he ran; 41 percent when he ran for re-election. Let's see, John Kerry got 38 percent and Al Gore got 33 percent.

Probably Montana is not the state to look for to take us over the top in terms of a Democratic candidate.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: So Governor Schweitzer's bullish on doing something to solve global warming, not so bullish about his party's chances in Montana.

The roundtable is next with George Will, Fareed Zakaria and Katrina Vanden Heuvel.

And later, the Sunday funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHEN COLBERT, HOST, THE COLBERT REPORT: Even the weather page is in a state of moral decay. What's wrong with red, white and blue, USA Today?

(LAUGHTER)

This rainbow weather map is just another example of the homo- meteorological agenda.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our Voices this week, Harvey Mansfield and Naomi Wolf. As the political world continues to buzz about whether Condi or Hillary will be the first woman president, the Harvard professor and author of the controversial new book, Manliness, squares off with the feminist writer who taught Al Gore about earth tones on the politics of macho.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

HARVEY MANSFIELD, WRITER: Manliness I define as confidence in a situation of risk, and I think men have that more than women.

NAOMI WOLF, WRITER: I don't know what bubble he's living in. He's making these sweeping arguments as if from this bubble in 1955.

MANSFIELD: Politics is a field of competition, and women are less interested in competition. Just as they're less interested in sports. And indeed I think their interest in sports goes together with their interest in men more than in sports or politics directly.

WOLF: I don't think women think about their political convictions in that kind of, you know, nitpicky way. I think they're more concerned about clean air, clean water, good schools, health care. His timing is kind of weird because in the wake of 9/11 there has been a spontaneous sort of fetishization of big, strong, powerful men who kind of kill the enemy without thinking about their human qualities.

MANSFIELD: It's also the case that authority, manly authority needs to be prudent and sensible, and so it needs to be modified and qualified by prudence, you could say, or by intelligence and often by the prudence of a sensible woman.

WOLF: You know, George Bush does listen to women, and one of the things Professor Mansfield keeps doing in his book and his messaging, which I think is very unfortunate, is he really defines a manly man as one who really doesn't listen to women and who essentially has contempt for women.

MANSFIELD: I'm not advocating that manly men and in their excesses should be followed and obeyed. I'm just pointing out that manly is both good and bad, and that manly men have a certain nature which women must learn to understand and respect.

BILL MAHER, HOST OF REAL TIME : Well, the president was everywhere this week, wasn't he? I tell you, he doesn't give a press conference for three years, and now we can't get him to shut up. (LAUGHTER)

And, of course, he was blaming the troubles in Iraq on the media, saying they're not reporting the good news. And maybe that's true. For example, today in Baghdad, this is true, it was widely reported that gunmen killed four workers in a bakery. But no one mentioned that their banana bread is delicious.

(UNKNOWN): Every chief needs Indian on their side.

(UNKNOWN): Cleveland Hungarian community is planning a major event in Cleveland in October.

STEWART: That's how you take your shot when you get a question for the president? Some of the questions cut to the chase.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. The case against an Afghan man who converted to Christianity is dismissed, next on Fox News Sunday .

World hot spots. Afghanistan, where converting to Christianity can bring a death sentence. Iraq, struggling to stop sectarian violence. And Iran, defying the world with its nuclear ambitions.

We'll discuss all this with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Senator Carl Levin, a top Democrat just back from the region. Rice and Levin live, only on Fox News Sunday .

Plus, the battle for immigration heats up. Can the president control the debate inside his own party? We'll ask our panel, Paul Gigot, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams. And our Power Player of the Week takes care of the world's rich and famous, all right now on Fox News Sunday .

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Let's start with a quick check of the latest headlines. In Afghanistan, the case against Abdul Rahman, the man facing a death sentence for converting to Christianity, has been dropped this morning for lack of evidence. Officials say Rahman could be released from prison as early as tomorrow.

Iraqi politicians meeting for the sixth time Saturday failed to agree on a new government. Two congressional delegations this week pressured the Iraqis to overcome their differences.

And in Los Angeles and other cities, hundreds of thousands of protesters went to the streets to demonstrate against proposals in Congress to crack down on illegal immigrants. We'll have more on that story later in the show.

And we're joined now by the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

Secretary rice, welcome back to Fox News Sunday .

RICE: Thank you, Chris. Good to be with you.

WALLACE: Thank you. Let's start with Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who was being prosecuted for converting to Christianity. As we say, his case apparently was dropped this morning. What do you know?

RICE: Well, I don't have independent confirmation, Chris, of that news report, but I do know that the Afghan government was working on it, that they were looking at the judicial case here, and that they were working very hard to try and resolve it in a favorable manner. So I hope that, in fact, this has been done. WALLACE: If that is the case, if it is dropped, but not dropped because it's just wrong to prosecute somebody for exercising freedom of religion, but rather because of technical flaws, lack of information, he's mentally incompetent, does that end the controversy? Are you satisfied with that outcome?

RICE: Well, I think the question of mental incompetence, as far as I understand, has not been raised here, that this is really about the case itself. This is a complicated situation. We have been very clear with the Afghan government that the freedom of religion and the freedom of religious conscience is at the core of democratic development.

They have constitutional expectations that have been written in that they will, in fact, live up to the universal declaration of human rights which protects individual conscience on religion. So I do understand that they need to get through this case.

The fact is, Chris, this is a young democracy. It's a young democracy that now does have a constitution that is in accordance with the modern age, but, of course, they're going to have difficulties and conflicts. There are going to be cases that are going to go one way or another.

What we have to do is stand with the Afghans to continue to insist on the principle and to help them work through some of these contradictions. There's never been a democratic constitution, including ours, by the way, where we didn't have to have struggles and debates about constitutional interpretation.

WALLACE: So assuming that the reports are right and that the case is dropped for technical reasons, your reaction is...

RICE: Well, I would hope that, in fact, if that's the case that the Afghan government has done that, it would be a very good step forward. It would be a very good step forward.

Obviously, there will continue to be discussions in Afghanistan and between Afghanistan and the international community about the importance of religious freedom, about importance of adherence to the universal declaration of human rights. But we have to recognize that this is an evolutionary process.

This isn't the Taliban. We had no constitution to which to appeal, or the people of Afghanistan had no constitution to which to appeal, so Afghanistan's made a lot of progress in four years, and we need to keep that in mind.

WALLACE: Let's turn to Iraq and the military situation there. Much was made this week of a statement by the president that the decision on pulling the last troops out of Iraq will be made by future presidents, meaning it would be made after he left office in 2008.

On the other hand, that doesn't say that there won't be significant draw downs this year. What do you think is the likelihood that there will be a significant pullout of troops, U.S. troops, before the end of 2006?

RICE: Well, as General Casey has said, if Iraqi forces continue to develop in the way that they have -- they're taking and holding territory, they performed very well in the light of this recent sectarian violence, the army did -- then it is entirely likely that there will be draw downs of American forces over this next year.

It's conditions-based. No one wants to make any definitive statement because, of course, you want to know the conditions. But the Iraqi forces are making a lot of progress and the political system is making progress. I know it's slower than we would like it to be.

But for the first time, Sunnis and Shia and Kurds and others are sitting down, and they're working toward a government of national unity, and that also is an important part of the picture as to why the stability in this country will grow.

WALLACE: I want to talk to you about the political situation. They held elections there on December 15, and you came on Fox News Sunday three days later and we talked about this. Let's listen to what you had to say.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: When you talk to Iraqis, they recognize that they need to sustain the momentum out of this election. They need to sustain it because of the insurgency and the terrorists, and they need to get a strong message that the political system is moving forward.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: But, Secretary Rice, today, almost 3.5 months after those elections, they still don't have a government. They haven't sustained the momentum in the way that you were talking about there.

Why shouldn't Americans be outraged that while U.S. troops fight and die -- and in fact, since December 15th, 173 of them have been killed -- Iraqi politicians are haggling about jobs?

RICE: Well, I think, Chris, that is not the way to characterize what they're doing. What the Iraqis are doing, the Iraqi leaders are doing, is they're sitting down to form a government of national unity.

Now, whenever there is an election and you have to form a government of national unity, and no one can form a government on their own -- no one got enough votes to form a government on their own -- there are going to be negotiations, and sometimes protracted negotiations. That's not unknown in the west.

What the Iraqis are also doing, though, is that they are developing a program by which this national government will actually govern. They are developing rules and institutions that they will use to govern, and they are looking at what jobs will be held by whom.

So this is a complicated process that is likely to push them very much further forward once it is completed than just having people identified as prime minister and defense minister and so forth.

We have to understand that because the Sunnis have not been a part of the process, really, at the time even that the constitution was written, they have some very important -- really even existential -- issues that they are trying to deal with, and they're grappling with some of those during this period. They need to be able to talk to one another.

Now, everybody is putting considerable pressure on the Iraqis to get this done and to get it done quickly, but we do have to understand what's really going on here. They're not just dividing up jobs. They really are developing a program by which they will govern, and they are creating the institutions by which they will govern.

WALLACE: Secretary, Senate democratic leader Harry Reid said the following this week, and let's put it up on the screen, Where is Condoleezza Rice? Why isn't she over in the Middle East, as the chief diplomat of this country should be, trying to get the political forces to form a government over there?

I know you've got a strong ambassador in Iraq, but at a time when everyone says that forming a government of unity could help stabilize the security situation over there, shouldn't the secretary of state go to Iraq and directly confront these politicians and say get it done?

RICE: Chris, first of all, we do have a very good ambassador there with whom I speak every morning about what he needs to move the process forward. But Iraqis need to talk to each other. They don't need to talk to me. They need to talk to each other about what the future...

WALLACE: But don't we have a stake in this? I mean...

RICE: Of course.

WALLACE: ... we have 133,000 troops over there.

RICE: Of course we have a stake in this. But we also have a stake in an outcome for this national government that will be stable and sustainable. And that means that they have to work through some of these difficult issues.

Now, if I thought for one minute that it would make a difference for me to get on a plane and go to Iraq and sit with them to do this, I would do it. But that is not what they need at this point. What they need at this point is to work through these issues, work through them quickly.

Zal Khalilzad is providing all the support...

WALLACE: That's the U.S. ambassador.

RICE: The U.S. ambassador is providing all the support that they need, that they need to do their job, and when it is time for the United States to intervene at my level, I'm quite certain that I can assure you that we will. But right now, Iraqis need to talk to Iraqis and come to terms with some of these extremely difficult issues.

WALLACE: Different issue related to Iraq. There's a Pentagon report out this week that during the U.S. invasion of Iraq that Russians apparently were able to get information about U.S. war plans from sources in U.S. Central Command and pass those on to the Iraqis. Do you believe that to be true?

RICE: Well, I don't have any reason to doubt or confirm the report at this point. I do think we have to look at the documents and look very carefully.

I will tell you that we take very seriously any suggestion that a foreign government may have passed information to the Iraqis prior to the American invasion that might have put our troops in danger. Of course that's a serious matter. And we will raise it with the Russian government.

I do think we owe it to everyone to take a hard look at the reports and to really understand what's there.

WALLACE: Now, I want to -- because some of the information turned out to be true, some of it turned out not to be true, as national security adviser at the time, did you know this was going on? Was this, in effect, perhaps a way to spread disinformation to Saddam Hussein?

RICE: I knew nothing of the -- to my recollection, I knew nothing of these reports at the time that I was national security adviser. But I think we have to look at the reports and, indeed, raise it with the Russian government. And I would hope the Russian government would take seriously any such charges.

WALLACE: Now, you say raise it with the Russian government. Assuming that it's true, do you protest? How big a deal is this?

RICE: Well, let's see what's there and let's talk with the Russian government. I would not jump to the conclusion that this -- if, indeed, the reports are true, that it had to be Moscow-directed. So let's take a look and let's talk with the Russian government about it.

But I would think this is something that the Russian government would take very seriously as well.

WALLACE: Speaking of the Russians, they continue to block a statement coming out of the U.N. in effect saying to the Iranians knock it off with their program to enrich uranium.

Are you prepared to step up the pressure on Moscow to try to get -- at a time when the Iranians are defying the world's will?

RICE: Well, the Iranians are defying the world's will, and the international community needs to speak and speak with one voice. We and the Russians and the Europeans and others have the same view that was expressed in the board of governors resolution on February 4th from the International Atomic Energy Agency. That is that Iran needs to suspend its enrichment activities and return to negotiation. Nobody believes that Iran should have enrichment and reprocessing capability on its territory, because that is easily transferable or easily convertible into the technology to make a weapon. And so we have agreement on what Iran must do.

There are some tactical issues about how best to express that. I spoke with Sergei Lavrov, my counterpart, Russian counterpart, on Friday. We agreed that our people would work through this weekend -- I think they're going to meet later today -- to try and resolve these differences, because we do need to speak and speak with one voice.

The Security Council brings a weight to allowing the IAEA to do its job. The IAEA has to continue to do this work, because it's the technically competent agency, but the Security Council can lend weight to what the IAEA is doing.

WALLACE: I want to turn to a difficult subject. I'm sure you heard this week that a radio host in St. Louis made a racial slur in talking about your becoming possibly the NFL commissioner, and he was immediately fired for that.

As someone who grew up in the segregated south, are you surprised that in the year 2006 this kind of thing still happens?

RICE: Well, first, let me say that my understanding is that he apologized, said he didn't mean it. I accept that, because we all say things from time to time that we shouldn't say or didn't mean to say. And so I accept it.

We all carry, I think, deep scars of how the United States came into being with slavery as an initial birth defect for this country, of years and years of racial separation, of racial tension, of years and years of not being able to come to terms with what we, the people really meant.

And what it says to me is that even mature democracies like the United States -- we still have our difficulties. And it reminds me that when people say well, why haven't the Iraqis achieved this, or why haven't the Afghans achieved this, that maybe Americans should be a little bit more humble about how hard it is to build democracy, particularly to build multi-ethnic democracy.

WALLACE: How serious a problem do you think this country still has with racism?

RICE: Oh, I think the United States still bears the scars of our founding and still bears the scars of how hard it has been to overcome it. But, Chris, anyone who says that we haven't come a very, very long way, and that for the most part Americans interact with each other as Americans, I think is also not giving you the full picture.

I was just recently in Australia, and I noted for the students in Australia that should I serve to the end of my term, it would have been 12 years since there was a white man as secretary of state in the United States. Given our history, we've come a long way. WALLACE: Finally, and you'd be disappointed if I didn't, our 2008 question, because it's who we are and it's Sunday morning. Laura Bush, the first lady, said about you on Friday -- and let's put it up on the screen -- She'd make an excellent president, but I don't think we can talk her into running. I think she sincerely does not want to run, but I wish she would.

A couple of questions. First of all, have you ever discussed the idea of a presidential run with Laura Bush?

RICE: I've generally said to the first lady, who is a dear friend as well, exactly what she said, that it's not something I want to do.

WALLACE: Has she urged you to do it?

No, we've not had discussions at that level. I think my friends know that I see my life differently, and I know that there is a lot of speculation, there's maybe going to continue to be a lot of speculation, but I know what I want to do with my life, and that isn't it.

WALLACE: And what do you say to the first lady, who may be watching this morning, about her wish, despite all of this, that you run for president?

RICE: Well, I'm really honored that she would think so, but I know that we're going to -- whatever happens in 2008, we're going to have a good candidate in the Republican Party. We're going to elect a good president and, like all Americans, I'll be there to try to support them.

WALLACE: But it won't be you.

RICE: Won't be me.

WALLACE: Secretary Rice, as always, a pleasure. Thank you for coming in today. Pleasure to have you.

RICE: Thank you. Pleasure to be with you.

WALLACE: Up next, Carl Levin, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, just back from Iraq, right after these messages.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: For a different perspective now on key foreign policy issues, we turn to Senator Carl Levin, who spent the past week in Iraq, Afghanistan and other countries in the region.

Senator, welcome home and welcome back to Fox News Sunday .

LEVIN: Thank you, Chris. Great to be with you.

WALLACE: Thank you. While you were in Iraq, you met with the top political leaders. What's your assessment of the political situation there 3.5 months after the election?

LEVIN: That there's a gridlock and that the Iraqi leaders are going to count on us to protect them, and we should make it very clear to them that we're only going to continue to be there if they work out a political compromise, and that's the message they've not received.

Instead, they get the kind of excuses that we just heard as to how complicated it is, how difficult it is, that constitutions and cabinet selections take time.

They're behind their own schedule for selecting a cabinet, and instead of making it easy for them to continue this gridlock by telling us how complicated it is and by telling the American people to be patient, as the president recently did, we should be putting plenty of pressure on the Iraqis.

WALLACE: But what does that mean? How tough should we get? And specifically what should we do?

LEVIN: We should tell the Iraqis what three of us -- a bipartisan letter asked the president to do. Senator Collins, Jack Reed of Rhode Island and I asked the president to make it clear to the Iraqis that our continued presence in Iraq is dependent upon the Iraqis working out a broad-based political agreement.

Otherwise, they're going to continue to get the message, which this administration has given too often, that we're there as long as they need us.

WALLACE: Would you set a specific deadline?

LEVIN: I would not. I would put the word prompt in there, that they must promptly agree to a political settlement. We can't impose it on them. We can't select their leaders. But it's essential that they do it.

But the only way they're going to do it and the only chances that they have of succeeding in defeating the insurgency and ending the violence is if the political leaders come together in a broad-based government.

WALLACE: Let's turn to the military situation. As I say, you were there on the ground this week. What's your sense of the situation, the danger of civil war and how we're doing in training Iraqi troops to take over for U.S. troops?

LEVIN: I think we're making some progress in terms of training their army, but in terms of training the police to defend the nation, instead of just reflect sectarian points of view and react positively to the militias that they come from, we have not made much progress with the police.

And the police are key. They're the ones that are going to have to prevent civil war from happening inside Baghdad particularly, so the progress has been very, very slow with the police.

WALLACE: This week, Vice President Cheney noted that some top Democrats have objected to the NSA wiretap program, wanted to make changes in the Patriot Act, had called for pullouts, and then he said the following. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Leading Democrats have demanded a sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq, the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting, and with that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senator Levin, what do you think of that?

LEVIN: I think that there's been much too much incompetence in this administration and it's a perfectly proper critique of the administration that they've shown incompetence both in the way they've handled the war in Iraq as well as a lot of domestic issues, including Katrina.

So the issue of competence is a very legitimate issue both to raise and to go to elections on.

WALLACE: Before we leave Iraq, as the top Democrat in the Senate Armed Services Committee, what do you make of this Pentagon report that the Russians were passing on U.S. military secrets during the invasion to the Iraqis?

LEVIN: It's possible that it happened. Things like that happen with intelligence by various countries. It would be obviously plenty discouraging as well as disgusting if, in fact, they did it, but sometimes there's disinformation which is provided.

Anything is possible in the area of intelligence. I would not jump to any conclusion one way or the other without a much deeper investigation. But if, in fact, they did it, it, number one, wouldn't surprise me, but it would be very disgusting if they did.

WALLACE: And what would you do to the Russians?

LEVIN: Find ways to let them know that that kind of conduct is not going to be acceptable to us and a whole host of reactions and retaliations. But I wouldn't prejudge this. The intelligence world is a very murky world, to put it mildly.

WALLACE: Yes, indeed. Let's turn to Afghanistan, another country that you were in this week. What do you think the prosecution and now the release, apparently, the dismissal, at least, of the case of the Afghan Christian says about the spread of democracy and democratic values in that country?

LEVIN: That there's some hope, that obviously President Karzai was able to find a way to end the prosecution of this man, and that even though the prosecution is very discouraging, that the progress in apparently ending that prosecution of this man is encouraging. So I have some hope in Afghanistan.

Actually, this action reflects, it seems to me, a good reason to be optimistic about Afghanistan. We had the united world going into Afghanistan to go after the Taliban, unlike Iraq, where the world was divided. We had NATO with us as well as many other countries going into Afghanistan. NATO is taking over now in Afghanistan.

So there's really reason to be optimistic in Afghanistan. It's a much better scene than Iraq.

WALLACE: What do you think -- on a new subject, what do you think Senator Feingold's mention to censure the president for his NSA warrantless wiretap program?

LEVIN: Well, I think there, first of all, should be, obviously, a hearing as to what happened, the legality of it, the operations of it. I think the president made a mistake in not following the requirements of the law that he seek a warrant.

But in terms of censure, I would not reach any conclusion on that until there have been hearings both on the legality issue as well as how it actually operates, whether or not, in fact, there is probable cause to believe that somebody is engaged in some kind of an operation with the Taliban, as the president says there always is.

But is there, in fact, probable cause before phones are tapped? That is something which should be investigated by both the Intelligence Committee and other appropriate committees.

WALLACE: Well, let me ask you about that. You're a member of this new Intelligence Subcommittee that has been named to oversee the program. Have you been briefed and what have you found out?

LEVIN: My briefing is about halfway through. And I don't want to tell you what I found out. I'm not allowed to, except I'll tell you what my focus is.

My focus is to see whether or not the president of the United States accurately has represented this program as one where there must be probable cause to believe that before an American's phone is tapped that he is either a member of or affiliated with the Taliban or an affiliated organization, or an agent of Taliban or -- I mean, sorry, Al Qaida, excuse me -- a member or an agent of Al Qaida or an affiliated organization. That is what my focus is going to be, because if that's not true...

WALLACE: And what have you found out so far?

LEVIN: I'm not allowed to tell you what I found out so far because these briefings are highly classified.

When I'm finished with my review, which I hope will be in the next few weeks, I hope to find out -- I hope to find a way that I can either say yes, the president accurately reflected the program or that I disagree, but I'm not sure I'll be able to even do that within the rules.

WALLACE: Well, let me ask you, just to press this a little bit further, one of your colleagues on this subcommittee, a Democratic colleague, Senator Diane Feinstein, came out afterwards and said that she thought it was a very impressive program and didn't have a contrary word to say about it.

LEVIN: Well, she has, obviously -- she feels comfortable saying what she wants to say about her briefing. I don't want to say anything about the way this program operates or reach any conclusion until my briefings are concluded.

But then again, I hope to be able to find a way that I can either look people in the eye and say this program is one where there is probable cause of the precise type that the president assured the nation. That to me is critical.

Then if there is probable cause to believe that these people who are engaged in these conversations are Al Qaida-connected agents or members, then the question is is it legal, or do you have to modify the law in order to make it legal.

WALLACE: But there's a political reality in this, too, as I don't have to tell you. Do Democrats want to be in the position of investigating the president for possible censure, a president in the middle of wartime, over a program that, at least according to some people who have been briefed on it, including a Democrat, does a good job in protecting the American people?

LEVIN: No, I think it's premature to reach any conclusion about censure, and I would first put the inquiries before you reach any conclusion.

WALLACE: Do you think it was helpful to even raise the idea?

LEVIN: No, I think to say that you should censure the president before you have had the inquiries is premature, so I don't think it's helpful to reach that conclusion at this point.

WALLACE: We're going to have to leave it there, Senator Levin. Thank you. Thanks for coming in after your long trip and, I'm sure, considerable jet lag. Please come back any time, sir.

LEVIN: Thank you.

WALLACE: Up next, the fight over immigration policy. With both parties split, will there be any compromise? We'll find out from our panel, Paul Gigot, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams. We'll be right back.

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way. It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY): And it is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the scriptures, because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was President Bush and Senator Hillary Clinton talking about what promises to be an explosive debate this week in the Senate over immigration policy.

And it's panel time now for Paul Gigot of the Wall Street Journal and host of The Journal Editorial Report on Fox News Channel, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams, also from National Public Radio.

Well, as I said, the Senate takes on immigration this week, which not only divides the party but also causes some internal splits, especially among Republicans.

Bill Kristol, what do you think we should look for this week?

KRISTOL: A lively debate in the Senate for the next two weeks in which Republicans will split. And I think they may end up passing a comprehensive immigration reform, mostly with Democratic votes, but about a third of the Republicans voting for the broad immigration reform which includes border security, but also, in effect, a program of legalization for those who are now here illegally.

WALLACE: Juan?

WILLIAMS: I think that's right. I think that the president -- what you heard from the president a moment ago, Chris, was a warning to Republicans, because it's the Republicans that are split. You've got the populist base and a lot of populist anger as represented in the Minutemen and the like. But the business community is solidly with the president, so he's got the business community there.

The real question for the Democrats is how they play the unions. The unions clearly want something like the McCain-Kennedy bill which would allow for permanent residency if people can prove that they have a job and are willing to pay a fine and go through a process.

But to get back to the populist anger, the populist anger is all on the right, and the populist anger is at illegal immigration. We've got 12 million immigrants in this country illegally. That's a huge member.

But most of these people are not single men, kind of vagrants hanging around. They're mostly family people who simply want to, you know, create a better life, take advantage of education and economic opportunities in the country.

The far right, though, is all about building walls, which I think is totally impractical. You know, it cost $70 million to build a little wall in San Diego. They want to build a wall along a 2,000-mile border, but that's where the conversation is on the right.

LIASSON: Well, I think the big fight is going to become probably between the House and the Senate. What Mrs. Clinton was talking about in that clip you played was in the House bill that criminalizes instead of just making it a civil penalty to be an illegal immigrant, and...

WALLACE: Well, not only that, and also anybody who helps...

LIASSON: And anybody who helps them...

WALLACE: ... like a church or a charity.

LIASSON: ... and that's what she was referring to.

WALLACE: And that's what she was talking...

LIASSON: And that's why you have the Catholic Church in some areas saying we're not going to -- we're going to violate this law if it passes.

So I think that if the Senate does get some kind of comprehensive reform like the president wants, which includes border security and a path to legalization, then it goes to conference with the House, which defied the president on this and passed a bill only dealing with border security and not dealing with the problem of what to do with people who are already in this country illegally.

So then you're going to have a big debate, and there's going to be lots of splits in the Republican Party, and it's going to affect 2008 primary politics. And that's, I think, where you're going to have a big battle.

WALLACE: Paul, let me just -- I mean, we had huge demonstrations. There were about a half a million people in the street in Los Angeles yesterday. There were demonstrations in Phoenix, in Denver. I mean, this is a big issue on the street across the country.

What do you see happening in the Senate first, and then what do you see in terms of the ability to reconcile it with a bill already passed by the House, which is enforcement only?

GIGOT: I think the question is whether the Republicans in the Senate can save the House Republicans from their worst instincts. I mean, the House Republicans convinced themselves that being restrictionist in immigration is good politics. I'm not so sure it is.

There's a vocal, I think relatively small portion of the Republican base that wants a wall, the Tom Tancredo from Colorado Republican. They want that kind of wall set up. They want border control.

But there are other factions in the party base, including the business community, as Juan said, but also religious conservatives who are worried about, in their Good Samaritan role, being harassed, and then Hispanics.

I mean, President Bush won New Mexico in 2004 because he increased his share of the Hispanic vote. He had lost it in 2002. Republican share, presidential share of the vote, 21 percent. Bob dole in '96, 35 percent, I think, in 2000, 44 percent in 2004.

If they want to go in the other direction, they can follow the House Republicans.

WALLACE: Bill, let me ask you about the political side of this, because it certainly is going to factor into not only 2006 and the November elections but also into 2008, and you saw an interesting development this past week where Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, said if the Senate Judiciary Committee can't come up with a comprehensive compromise, I'm going to push an enforcement-only bill.

Where does this fit both in this year and two years from now?

KRISTOL: Well, Frist, who hasn't had a terribly successful pre- presidential campaign so far, is staking a lot on this. He wants to be the representative now of the enforcement-only, close-the-border, no-help-for-those-who-are-here-illegally Republicans. And there is a lot of support for that, or appears to be.

You can't go to a Republican gathering, a conservative gathering, and not hear a lot of complaints about illegal immigration, and Frist playing to that base. McCain is strongly identified with a more liberal approach, very much like Bush's, and I think it will be a huge issue in the 2008 Republican primary.

McCain and Giuliani probably will be the only candidates who are willing to take on this sort of apparent populist upsurge of concern.

WALLACE: You're talking about in the Republican Party.

KRISTOL: In the Republican primary -- its apparent populist upsurge of concern about illegal immigration.

I'm a doubter that this is -- but I'm biased on this. And Paul and I are both for the more liberal immigration policy. We're out of touch in some respect, or out of sync with a lot of conservatives and Republicans on the base.

And I personally am doubtful that this is such a good political issue, that restrictionism ever works politically. It hasn't in the past. It hasn't in the -- it didn't in the Virginia gubernatorial race last year when the Republican candidate made a big fuss about you're helping illegal immigrants. It didn't work at all.

But you know, these things don't work until they do work. I think religious conservatives are a key swing constituency on this. You have a certain kind of Perotista, populist conservative who wants to shut the border. You have the business community which wants workers coming in.

The swing constituency in the Republican Party is the religious conservatives. I think they will end up being more generous, let's put it this way, on immigration than restrictionist. And all these liberals who spend all their time denouncing religious conservatives are going to suddenly discover that if you want a generous immigration policy, it's religious conservatives who are going to save it.

WALLACE: Mara?

LIASSON: Yes, I also think that when you talk to key Republicans in states like South Carolina, which is what we're talking about when we talk about 2008 right now, among the base, there are a lot of small business owners, and they need this system rationalized for them. They don't want to be criminalized for hiring illegal workers.

So I actually think that Bill is probably onto something. The illegal immigrant population is surging in places like South Carolina, like Iowa, not just in the south and southwest. So I think that this is going to take a while to play out, but I do think the president was onto something in 2000. This was the way he showed he was a compassionate conservative, and I think in the end he'll...

WALLACE: Let me just ask you all, because we're starting to run out of time, bottom line -- and we'll start with you, Juan -- is Congress -- I mean, because you've got to not only get it through the Senate, then you've got to reconcile it with the House. Is Congress going to pass immigration reform this year and, if so. what will it look like?

WILLIAMS: Well, I think that they will pass some form of immigration reform if you can get out of the Senate tomorrow. This coming week is so critical. The negotiations -- and it has to do with politics. The negotiations, I think, are going to go away from the Frist side.

Frist is trying to endear himself to the far right with this, separate himself from the president. I just don't think that tactic's going to work. I just don't think the support is there because the business community is with the president. And Senator McCain, you know, his competitor for the nomination, is with the president.

So I think it goes away. So if you get this Specter-titled bill that says you can apply for residency and then get the Democrats in support of that, then I think the pressure comes down to the House.

The question in my mind is whether or not a lot of these House Republicans will respond to what is pragmatic as opposed to what is the populist spirit.

WALLACE: All right. I want everybody else to take a much shorter time in answering the question.

WILLIAMS: Sorry.

WALLACE: Bill, is there going to be a bill and, if so, what?

KRISTOL: The conventional wisdom is there can't be a bill. The House will never agree to a broader version of immigration reform that the Senate may well pass. I'm not so sure that there won't be a lot of pressure to pass the bill at the end.

The president would need to show real leadership and take on a lot of his own party...

WALLACE: And it would be comprehensive, in your view.

KRISTOL: I think so.

WALLACE: Mara?

LIASSON: Yes, I think when you've got Ted Kennedy, and John McCain, and the business community, and then Democrats and moderate Republicans, that's a pretty good place to start. But this will be an important test of the president's leadership and clout, which has been diminished.

WALLACE: Paul?

GIGOT: A couple of weeks ago, I would have said it's going to blow up, nothing gets done. But I think there's enough pressure now for Republicans to do something this year that maybe we can get something good out of the Senate and then a bill.

WALLACE: All right, panel. We have to take a break here. But when we come back, the international storm over this man, who was on trial for his life for converting to Christianity. Our panel takes up that issue right after this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: On this day in 1979, Egypt's Anwar Sadat and Israel's Menachem Begin signed a Camp David treaty ending 31 years of war between their nations. President Jimmy Carter brokered the deal during 12 days of talks.

Stay tuned for more panel and our Power Player of the Week. (COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: It's deeply troubling that a country we helped liberate would hold a person to account because they chose a particular religion over another.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was President Bush talking about the Afghan man who faced the death penalty because he converted to Christianity.

WALLACE: And we're back now with Paul, Mara, Bill and Juan. Well, as if the president didn't have enough on his plate, he had to deal this week with the case of Abdul Rahman, the Afghan Christian. And as we've been reporting this morning, it appears that an Afghan court has dismissed the case against him.

Paul Gigot, what do you make of all this?

GIGOT: Well, I think they're very happy at the White House about this. It's a good outcome, if it's true. It's a credit to Hamid Karzai, who would, I assume, have gotten this done. And it's a credit to the outside pressure, I think, that was put on him.

I mean, the State Department's first reaction was what the State Department's first reaction always is, let's not offend any foreign country, let's be mealy-mouths about it. But President Bush found his voice later. John Howard of Australia was very forceful on this.

And I think that you have to -- I mean, when we're engaged in liberating a country like this, and we helped to put the pressure on that government to form and write the constitution -- it's still one of the most liberal constitutions in all of the Muslim world.

So I think we have to speak up, and speak our mind, and speak with authority and build deep belief in our values, and that's what we did.

WALLACE: So was this a pure success?

LIASSON: I don't know if it's a pure success. I think it is really an interesting warning about what problems might come up in Iraq. Assuming they get a government established and sectarian violence under control, and those are a lot of assumptions, they're going to face some of these same problems.

In the constitution it says Sharia law is one of the sources for Iraqi jurisprudence, and you're going to have an independent judiciary, just like you did in Afghanistan, interpreting this law, deciding well, gee, is it a crime to convert to another religion other than Islam, punishable by death.

These questions are going to come up again and again. And the Bush administration is engaged in a very complicated project of trying to create democracies that are also Islamic. And these are the kinds of things that are going to come up. And I think that this was a really interesting example of all the contradictions that you're going to meet along the way.

WALLACE: Bill, I mean, that is the really interesting question, what some people would call the inherent tensions between the president's policy of trying to create democracy, which is, after all, really just a process, and also, on the other hand, the spread of democratic values in countries that don't necessarily embrace them, values like freedom of speech and freedom to exercise religion.

KRISTOL: Right. And Afghanistan is a democracy, and they've actually let this guy off. The only reason this charge came up was there was this bizarre divorce case and custody case, basically, in which the family used this against him. To be fair to the Afghan government, it's not like they're going out trying to find people who have converted to Christianity and trying to prosecute them and execute them.

WALLACE: But when they found him, the Afghan clerics embraced it.

KRISTOL: They did. But let's talk about Saudi Arabia. That's not a democracy. Is there freedom of religion there? Where are the odds for freedom of religion better, in Afghanistan and Iraq, which are moving toward democracy, or in Saudi Arabia, where all the realists -- they love the Saudi regime. It's very stable.

The House of Saud has kept the oil going for 60 years. Is there religious freedom in Saudi Arabia? So I would bet on democracy over propping up dictators.

WILLIAMS: You know, the problem here -- I mean, I think the State Department is happy. I think the White House is happy. The pope is happy. The pope had pleaded on this man's behalf.

But what you've got is an internal situation where we had an army lieutenant general, Mike Maples, say recently there is more of a threat to Hamid Karzai's government from the Taliban, from Al Qaida, inside Afghanistan than at any point since 2001. So the situation there is deteriorating.

And so now you have people on the ground who are saying wait a second, you mean to say that the British and the Americans are now telling us, and the pope is now telling us, what to do. And so it could, in fact, weaken Hamid Karzai internally in Afghanistan, which is not in our best interest.

If you get into the southern region of Afghanistan, where the Al Qaida is still, you know, working -- now they're doing less of really threats of direct war, more fire bombings, taking over villages, that kind of thing -- that's a threat to the U.S.

So what's striking to me about this story is we're still involved in a war in Afghanistan that we seem to have forgotten.

GIGOT: Juan, are you saying that we shouldn't have spoken up about this?

WILLIAMS: Of course we should speak up, Paul, but you have to play it -- you have to realize it has come at a cost.

GIGOT: Well, I'd rather put pressure on Hamid Karzai and that government to do the right thing -- and he's a pretty skillful politician. And I think the chances under him are a lot better for freedom for women, freedom of religion in Afghanistan, than they were before, certainly, and are pretty much anywhere else in the Islamic world.

WILLIAMS: These are things I believe in deeply. I mean, I'm not saying that we shouldn't speak up for them. But I'm saying if you're talking about a geopolitical dynamic the way that Bill was just talking about what's going on in Saudi Arabia, what we tolerate in Saudi Arabia, we are holding Hamid Karzai and the Afghan government to an interesting standard at a time when we would like their help in the bigger struggle to get Osama bin Laden.

WALLACE: Well, I want to just go back to what Bill said in sort of raising the bigger issue. And I have a feeling that you were going to react to this, which is that you heard from some of the real politic experts this week, Mara, who were saying I told you so, that this shows that trying to spread democracy without understanding the realities of what goes on inside these countries is naive. What do you make of that?

LIASSON: Look, it's difficult. To say that it's impossible because you can't -- I don't think that there is a big chorus that says Islamic countries and democracy can never be merged. I disagree. I just think there's a lot of difficulty along the way. And a commitment to the building blocks of civil society and democratic values, as you said, is a precursor to a successful democracy. Democracy is not just one election.

But I don't think this event has caused some kind of growing support for the view that you cannot have democracies in the Islamic world. I don't see that.

WALLACE: But I think you'd agree, Bill -- I mean, Madeleine Albright had a big piece in the Los -- Madeleine Albright, the secretary of state under Bill Clinton, had a big piece in the Los Angeles Times where she was, in effect, saying I told you so, and this idea of dividing the world into good and evil, and talking about democracy, and not understanding the culture of these countries creates more problems.

KRISTOL: I love Madeleine Albright lecturing the Bush administration on power politics. Madeleine Albright, who actually did compare Saddam to Hitler, who used extremely moralistic rhetoric when she was secretary of state, which I don't entirely disapprove of, who justified the war against Milosevic entirely on humanitarian and moralistic terms -- now she's suddenly a great advocate of real politic.

But it's a stupid real politic. Again, what's her suggestion? Would religious freedom be stronger in Afghanistan if it were not democratic? Is that the argument? No. It's ludicrous. We saw what a non-democratic Afghanistan was like in the late 1990s -- the Taliban. I don't think that was a lot of religious freedom there. That was her Afghanistan.

So when Madeleine Albright was doing such a wonderful job as a real politic secretary of state, Osama bin Laden was running training camps in Afghanistan. Period.

WALLACE: And what about the Palestinian Authority, where you end up with a Hamas in a democratic election?

KRISTOL: We've ended up with Hamas, I think in large part, because we tolerated a corrupt dictatorship in the Palestinian Authority.

WALLACE: All right. We're going to have to leave it there. Thank you, panel. That's it for today. See you all next week.

Time now for some mail about our interview last Sunday with Senator Dick Durbin about censuring the president over the NSA wiretaps.

John Dacy from Washington writes, Where have responsible Democrats gone? Is the party no longer interested in doing what is best for the country? Is the party only interested in turning everything into a peace of propaganda to regain power?

But Todd Rosenberg from Ohio has a different take. Durbin did a great job in countering your Republican talking points. If this was a deliberate attempt to allow the Democrats to explain their position, I applaud you.

Up next, our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: When power players visit Washington, they like to stay at a power hotel, and there is one spot that stands out, which leads us to our Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CHRISTOPHER HUNSBERGER, GENERAL MANAGER, FOUR SEASONS: For us, focusing on the luxury end of the business, it's all about service and it's all about the people that deliver the service.

WALLACE: Christopher Hunsberger is general manager of the Four Seasons, Washington's only five-star, five-diamond hotel.

And when you're charging $500 a night for a room, $6,800 for one of the five presidential suites, there's almost nothing you won't do for a guest.

HUNSBERGER: Simple standards such as making sure that we answer the phone within three rings, standards such as the fact that as we talk to you, we want to use your name two to three times in the course of the interaction. We have 20 different types of pillows here for all sorts of requests as it relates to pillows.

WALLACE: It's that attention to detail from Hunsberger and his staff of 400, or two employees for every room, that attracts heads of state like the late King Hussein of Jordan and now his son, King Abdullah, for celebrities like the Rolling Stones.

HUNSBERGER: You could have a head of state or two heads of state here at the same time. They might have an entourage of 15 or 20 staff with them, traveling with them.

WALLACE: One thing the hotel offers its VIP guests is privacy, but there are stories that come out, like the unnamed foreign dignitary who came with his six teenaged grandchildren.

HUNSBERGER: That head of state wanted to provide six Hummers, real live Hummers, and have them delivered to the hotel so that the teenaged children, who were of age to drive, could have the Hummers to drive around for a couple of days while they were here.

Several days later, we were asked by the head of state to arrange to have those six Hummers shipped back to the country where the head of state was from. That's not uncommon in the normal course of what we do here at the hotel.

WALLACE: Sometimes a dignitary may ask for something less elaborate, but not any easier.

HUNSBERGER: A very high profile head of state happens to have an attachment to a soda that isn't available anywhere else in the United States but Hawaii. We had to have it flown in, short notice.

WALLACE: What's your attitude toward those kinds of requests?

HUNSBERGER: Anything goes. As long as it's not something unlawful or immoral, we'll do it for the customer.

WALLACE: But it's the little things that can make the difference. Hunsberger focuses on everything from food...

UNKNOWN: We've got turkey (inaudible) and I've got (inaudible).

WALLACE: ... to flowers...

UNKNOWN: Every Wednesday, we refresh the bathroom orchids.

WALLACE: ... to the temperature in the indoor pool.

HUNSBERGER: We want them to feel like it's their home away from home when they're here in Washington. That's really what we try to create.

WALLACE: In a city as competitive as Washington, Hunsberger admits when a head of state leaves the Four Seasons for another hotel, it's a crisis. But he says that just makes him work harder to win the guest back from his rivals. HUNSBERGER: We like to think we're one step ahead of them all. But you know what? We're always looking in the mirror every day and saying, you know, we might have been good yesterday, but we've got to be that much better today.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: One last Four Seasons story. There was the dignitary who wanted his M Ms sorted by color, and because the official was superstitious, each bowl had to have exactly the same number.

And that's it for today. Have a great week, and we'll see you next Fox News Sunday.

CBS – FACE THE NATION

BORGER: And welcome to the broadcast. Bob Schieffer is off this morning. And joining us now, Senator Ted Kennedy.

Senator, thanks so much for being with us this morning.

KENNEDY: Delighted.

BORGER: Let's get right to this debate on immigration. We saw hundreds of thousands of people marching in the streets of Los Angeles yesterday.

And what they're marching about is a House bill that talks, really, about enforcement. It turns illegal immigrants into felons. It would build a 700-mile wall on part of the border.

Would you filibuster that kind of a bill in the Senate?

KENNEDY: Well, first of all, let me say it's better that we not pass a bad bill, just to pass a bill.

But having said that, I'm hopeful that we can have a bill that is going to really respond to the challenges that we're facing.

We're facing a national security challenge on our borders on immigration, so we have to get immigration policy correct.

Secondly, this issue is a values issue. Who will we permit to become citizens in our nation? And third, this issue is about economic progress and hope and opportunity.

In the time that I've been in the United States Senate, I've never seen a coalition come together like it has in trying to find a common-sense approach on immigration.

We have the leaders of -- the faith-based leaders in our community. We have leaders in our business community and leaders in our labor community. They understand that we cannot solve the problem of illegal immigration just by law enforcement alone.

We have spent $20 billion on chains and fences and border guards and dogs in the southern border over the last 10 years. And it doesn't work. What we need is a comprehensive approach.

I think President Bush understands it. I think John McCain understands it. And I think we have Democrat and Republican members that understand it. And, hopefully, we'll have a chance to have that kind of an approach in the Senate.

BORGER: Well, what do you say to people -- you mentioned Senator McCain -- you have a bill with Senator McCain that provides a path to citizenship.

After six years, people pay their back taxes; they pay a fine. And then they get to apply for citizenship. What do you say to people who say you're just giving amnesty to people who have broken the law?

KENNEDY: First of all, this is not amnesty. We are not putting anyone at the head of the line. Amnesty means forgiveness. It means pardon.

What we are saying is that there are 12 million individuals that are here in the United States. Why did they come here?

Basically, they came here for economic reasons because they wanted a job and they wanted to work. They wanted to provide for their families. And they wanted to continue dedication to their beliefs.

We have 70,000 (ph) permanent resident aliens in the military serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. And then, on the other side, you have employers that have got the magnet out there, that are willing to pay for those individuals.

We have those individuals here. This is part of the challenge that we're facing. We are facing the issues on the border. We're facing the pressure on individuals who want to come in on a temporary. And how are we going to adjust the status?

Our program puts those individuals here. First of all, they pay a penalty. They have to pay their taxes. They have to demonstrate they're working. They have to learn English. And they go to the end of the line -- not to the front of the line, to the end of the line. That's what's important.

BORGER: Let me ask you about President Bush because he says allow, these workers to be here temporarily and then send them home.

Do you think you and President Bush can come to some kind of a compromise on this because he disagrees with lots of people in his own party?

KENNEDY: Well, first of all, I respect President Bush and the fact that he's talked about this issue.

We're finding out now, on a complex issue -- we're finding out that the hard right of the Republican Party is doing everything they possibly can to make it a political issue.

Look at this, Gloria. At other times when we are facing major challenges in the country -- the ones that were the most obvious to me are the civil rights issues -- Republicans and Democrats came together on it. We came together even on the Medicare issue. We came together on the higher education issue.

And the real question is, will the Senate yield to the hard right and be distracted with, in effect, criminalizing the 12 million individuals in this country? I'm always interested in our Republican friends because they're talking about family initiatives.

And one of their family initiatives is going to mean that Cardinal Mahoney from Los Angels may very well be a felon, because as Cardinal Mahoney says, my dedication is to helping the poor, and I don't make a judgment about whether the person is here as a green card worker or as a legal immigrant.

BORGER: Senator, I'm going to now switch to other matters that involve the Senate. One is this question of censuring President Bush. Your colleague, Senator Russ Feingold, wants to have a vote on the Senate floor to censure the president for eavesdropping on Americans without court-ordered warrants. Do you support his move?

KENNEDY: Well, I hope it's not going to be necessary. The fact is that the American Bar Association has stated that the president has exceeded his authority by going ahead.

BORGER: Well...

KENNEDY: Excuse me. They have. The bar association, the Congressional Research Service has done it. There was dissent within their own administration. The Justice Department in terms of the actions on that part. Now, we are in the process now with the subcommittee that has been set up with Carl Levin and Dianne Feinstein and Jay Rockefeller. They're being briefed, and they are going to submit legislation to the Senate. I think the real test is, will administration cooperate? Or are they...

BORGER: Well, if there is a vote though, Senator, would you support it?

KENNEDY: Well, what I'm saying is, it's a close case. It's a close issue. What we want to do is to, first of all, what is most important is to assure the national security in the United States. And if there's information in there that is vital in terms of our military or for our security, we want to make sure that ware going to have access to it. That's number one.

But secondly, we are a country of laws. And we are a country of checks and balances. I was there at the time we passed what they called FISA which is the Foreign Intelligence Court wiretap. And it has worked very well. We only had one vote in dissent.

We had a President Ford at that time, an Attorney General Levi that invited the Judiciary Committee to come down to the Justice Department four different times and deal with our national security issues, and also deal with the issues regarding the oversight on it. That is the kind of action that we ought to have if we're going to just find a stone wall I think you'll find increasing support for it.

BORGER: Well, on another national security matter, there is a Pentagon report that has been out this weekend saying that the Russians provided intelligence to Saddam Hussein during the U.S. invasion. The administration is saying they are looking into it. The Russians are denying it. How important a matter is this?

KENNEDY: Well, I think it's a matter of enormous importance and consequence. Basically what that report is saying, we were endangering American lives, troops on this. And if this were to be true, this would, I think, be a matter of enormous significance and importance.

Now the administration -- and it's difficult for me to understand why the administration doesn't know today what happened. I can't think of anything that's on the president's desk or on the National Security Council desk more important. And I think we need an entirely new assessment of our relationships with Russia, should this be true.

BORGER: How so, if it's true?

KENNEDY: Well, we have the -- because they've endangered American lives.

BORGER: So what would you do? What would you do?

KENNEDY: I think you'd have to rethink whether we're going to the G-8 conference. Clearly, we're not going to have business as usual.

BORGER: That's an economic summit in St. Petersburg.

KENNEDY: That's an economic summit that establishes, helps establish economic policy between the industrial nations. I mean that's the next thing that's coming.

BORGER: So we should boycott it?

KENNEDY: Well, I would just say we're going to have a review about what the value is of our presence until we are going to be able to get to the bottom of it. I think it is a very, very serious issue and question.

BORGER: And let's move to the question of Iraq. The vice president was in that very chair.

BORGER: In this chair talking to Bob Schieffer last week. And he said something about your advice on foreign policy. And let's take a look at what he said, and then you can talk about it.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I would not look to Ted Kennedy for guidance and leadership on how we ought to manage national security, Bob. I think what Senator Kennedy reflects is sort of the pre-9/11 mentality about how we ought to deal with the world and that part of the world.

BORGER: Pre-9/11 mentality. What's your response?

KENNEDY: Well, I think we can get along with fewer wisecracks from the vice president and perhaps listening to some wise men and women on this issue.

I'd suggest that the vice president didn't get the 9/11. He didn't get it because 9/11 was as a result of the Taliban and Al Qaeda. And that is Afghanistan.

So, in response to the 9/11, the vice president recommended we go to war with the Taliban? No, to go to war in Iraq.

There was no question now about the misuse of intelligence. There's no question now, in looking at the 9/11 commission, that the association with Al Qaeda and 9/11 was completely fabricated.

There's no question now that the vice president's representation that there were weapons of mass destruction were wrong. There's no question, when he said that we would be welcomed as liberators, he was wrong. There's no question that, in his recent interviews, that he said we're in the last throes of the insurgency, he was wrong.

He's been wrong on every single instance. And I would hope that the president and the National Security Council would recognize that when they're listening to his advice.

BORGER: Well, you said yourself, after the president's press conference last week, that the president's stewardship of the war was, quote, not worthy of the sacrifice of our men and women in uniform.

Are you saying they're dying for a lost cause?

KENNEDY: No. Every individual, every soldier that's lost their lives and everyone that's been wounded is a hero -- is a hero. They're serving their country.

That was true in this war. It was true in Vietnam. Because they are risking their lives and the families are experiencing, in many instances, their loss, they are entitled to the best possible policy.

That's what this debate and discussion is all about. Now let me just say, I don't believe the world is safer today as a result of our going in to Iraq.

I think Iraq is a rallying cry for Al Qaida. I think we should have given the focus and attention onto Afghanistan. And I think that that's where we should have given our focus. And in the meantime, we see that the growth of the insurgency is developing very rapidly into a civil war.

BORGER: And Secretary Rice says that there's going to be a significant draw-down.

Do you want to withdraw right away? What's your timetable?

KENNEDY: No. First of all, I think what we have done, in contrast to what the administration has -- the newspapers today show that we're moving on into a civil war.

You can't read these papers into (ph) a civil war.

Two aspects of Iraq: First is the political, which is bringing the parties together; secondly, bringing the nations in the region together. Thirdly, we have to have the reconstruction.

But we have to recognize that our presence there is fueling the insurgency. And the best way to deal -- and we are a crutch to the Iraqis. We're a crutch to the Iraqis. And the best way to remove that crutch is to see a substantial withdrawal of American troops. That's what I'm for.

BORGER: OK. Thanks so much, Senator Ted Kennedy.

KENNEDY: Thank you very much.

BORGER: Thanks for being with us.

And I'll be back in a moment with the president's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley.

BORGER: And joining us now, White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley. Thanks for being with us this morning.

Let's start with that new Pentagon report we were just talking about with Senator Kennedy that says Russia gave Saddam Hussein intelligence about American troop movements. The Russians say it's nonsense. Are they lying?

HADLEY: We don't know yet. We know there's a document. We know that got into the hands of the Iraqis. We know that it dealt with war plans that we had. And for that reason, we take very seriously. Anytime a country provides information to an enemy that would potentially put people at risk, we take that very seriously. We will be raising it with the Russians.

There are a lot of things we don't know. We don't know how they got it out of Centcom. We don't know whether what the ambassador did was authorized or not. So there are further questions that we need to raise, but it's a serious matter and we'll be talking to the Russians about it.

BORGER: Well, let me ask you the question that Senator Kennedy asked a moment ago, which is why don't we know today what happened? Why are you still getting answers to these questions?

HADLEY: Because part of it is information we don't control. Was the Russian ambassador authorized to convey this information to the Iraqis or was it something that he was doing on his own? These are relevant questions in order for us to judge the seriousness of this. These are questions that in many instances, the Russians need to answer and need to answer for us. And we'll be raising it with them.

BORGER: Senator Kennedy also raised the issue that if this is indeed true, that perhaps the United States should boycott the economic summit that's going to be held in St. Petersburg this summer. Is that something you would consider doing as a protest?

HADLEY: Well, the G-8 meeting which he was referring to in July is an important forum. It's where countries get together and deal with economic and other issues.

It's going to be interesting this year, because the attention of the international community is going to be focused on St. Petersburg this summer, and one of the questions they're going to raise is what about democracy in Russia? And we think this is actually a good thing. It's going to challenge Russia. It's going to challenge President Putin to make clear and answer some of the concerns that the international has raised.

You know, Gloria, this is not the Soviet Union. And one of the things you have to think about is, if you want to encourage democracy in Russia, do you want to kick Russia out of all these institutions that are trying to enshrine these values that we would like to...

BORGER: Is that a no then?

HADLEY: We'll take a look at this issue. Obviously, we have not raised it with the Russians, but I think at this point we think there's a lot of value in going forward with the G-8, partly because it's going to require the Russians to answer some tough questions not from us, but from the international community.

BORGER: But even if you discovered that they were endangering the lives of American soldiers?

HADLEY: We will have to take a look at it. That's why, as I said, there are some serious questions. We take the matter seriously. We're going to raise it with the Russians, and we will have some tough questions we will ask them to answer.

BORGER: Let's turn to Iraq for a moment. The president was very clear this week that he thinks it's time that Iraq form a unity government. And senators went over there last week, were talking about a unity government.

How long can we wait? Should there be a deadline?

HADLEY: The president has made very clear in his view it needs to be as soon as possible. The Iraqis last week made an announcement that their deadline was the end of March. We think the sooner the better. It is an important that the Iraqi people see all these sectarian communities joining in a unity government. But you have got to get it, but you've got to get it right. And we think they're making progress.

What they're trying to do is to develop both a program for the new government, a structure in which they'll operate, and then the identities of the ministers. We talk to our ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, almost every day on this subject. The leaders now of all the various groups are meeting every day to try and resolve these issues. We think they're making progress.

BORGER: When?

HADLEY: We think -- we would like them, obviously, as soon as possible. They've set the goal at the end of March. That's about a week or so from now. They ought to meet it.

BORGER: So do you think they will? Yes?

HADLEY: They're making progress.

BORGER: OK. And in the meantime, though, as they seem, as you say, to be looking towards some kind of a unity government, what we seem to be seeing in Iraq is a civil war. Do you define it that way?

HADLEY: I think what's important is rather than talking about semantics, talk about what's happened. It's clear that the bombing and destruction of the Golden Mosque in Samarra was an enormous shock to the Iraqis. And I think they looked into the abyss of a degeneration into sectarian violence.

And the interesting thing it to watch what was the response of the Iraqis to that. After about 24, 48 hours, all the principal ministers of the government and of the various religious communities came out and basically said, we don't want to go to civil war. We do want to stay together. We want to solve our problems.

Secondly, the Iraqi security forces, the army and the police, did a pretty good job. They were out front trying to contain the violence. They did not break up along sectarian lines. They held together.

The army did a pretty good job. The police did a pretty good job. There are some problems that emerged. And that's one of the things we're going to address.

So, I think the point is the Iraqi leadership clearly does not want to descend into further violence. The institutions have held together. And, if you look at the Iraqi people, every time they've had a chance on vote, they have voted for unity and they have voted for peace.

BORGER: Now, Secretary Rice said this morning that she expects what she called a significant drawdown of troops in Iraq this year.

What does that mean? What is significant?

HADLEY: General Casey was asked that question last week. And he pointed out the fact that two brigades that were supposed to go to Iraq were not sent to Iraq and are staying home. That's about 7,000 or 8,000 troops.

As you know, during the election period, we had about 160,000 or more troops there. We're now at about 130,000 or more.

The point that Secretary Rice was making and the point that the president has made is that we anticipate we will be able to draw down, but this is a decision that's going to be made on the basis of the recommendation of the commanders in the field, based on the abilities of the Iraqis to take responsibility for security and for the political process to move forward.

BORGER: And how much do you believe Iran is contributing to this insurgency in Iraq?

HADLEY: We're concerned about what Iran is doing. Clearly, there are contacts between Iran and elements in Iran and groups in Iraq that are promoting violence. We also have evidence of equipment that clearly was of Iranian origin showing up in improvised explosive devices that are killing Iraqis and killing the coalition.

BORGER: What kind of equipment? HADLEY: This is basically equipment that goes into improvised explosive devices, particularly some of those called shaped charges which can do particular damage to vehicles.

And this is something that has concern. It's an issue that we have raised with the Iranians publicly. It's an issue we will be pursuing with them privately.

BORGER: And let me just switch countries for a moment, to Afghanistan, because we've all been talking about a case that this morning we've learned has apparently been dismissed against a man whose life was threatened in Afghanistan because he converted from Islam to Christianity.

Can you confirm that he's going to be OK? And are you worried this might happen again?

HADLEY: We've seen the report that the charges have been dropped. We've seen the report that he will be released.

Obviously these are press reports. We do not yet have confirmation from the Afghan government. They are, of course, the ones who will make this decision.

We've made it very clear that if that happens, those two things happen, it will be a very good thing.

We would hope this would not come up again but, obviously, Afghanistan is a new democracy. They are trying to reconcile a religious background of their country with a commitment they made in their own constitution to the universal declaration of human rights.

This is something that we will obviously be working with them going forward.

BORGER: OK. Thank so much, Mr. Hadley. Thanks for being with us this morning.

And we'll be back in a moment.

BORGER: And that's our broadcast. Thanks for watching. Bob Schieffer will be back here next week on Face the Nation.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: It's 11 a.m. in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 4 p.m. in London and 7 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition." We'll get to my interview with Secretary Rice in just a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: With a backdrop of insurgency and sectarian violence that shows no signs of dying down, and anxiety about Iraq very high here in the United States, President Bush is calling for patience and confidence about Iraq's future, and the U.S. mission there. Just a short while ago here in Washington, I spoke with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice about Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan and lots more.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Madam Secretary, welcome back to Late Edition.

CONDOLEEZZA RICE, SECRETARY OF STATE: Great to be with you.

BLITZER: Let's talk about Afghanistan for a moment. Abdul Rahman, this Muslim man, he converted years ago to Christianity. He's now potentially facing the death sentence in Afghanistan because of that. Is that why the U.S. went to war in Afghanistan, so this kind of situation could develop?

RICE: Well, we've been very clear with the Afghan government that it has to understand the vital importance of religious freedom to democracy. We have religious freedom as a cornerstone in the United States of our democracy, and it is a cornerstone anyplace, religious conscience. In fact, the Afghans themselves in their own constitution have enshrined, through the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a right to individual conscience and freedom, religious freedom.

And so, we're working with the Afghan government. We've made clear that we expect to see a favorable resolution of this. I've talked myself to President Karzai, and I think the Afghan government is working on this problem.

BLITZER: Even as we speak right now, there are reports he might be released. He might be declared insane, not capable of withstanding a trial. What's the latest information you have from the government of Afghanistan? RICE: Well, I've seen reports, Wolf, but I'm really working from largely press reports, too, that they may dismiss the case for reasons having to do with the judicial nature of the case. We have to understand -- and we do want a favorable resolution of this. Mr. Rahman should not face these charges. There should be a resolution of this case. But this is also a young democracy, and we have to recognize that, unlike the Taliban, it actually has a constitution to which one can appeal about the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

We as Americans know that in democracy, as it evolves, there are difficult issues about state and church, or in this case, state and mosque. But there are difficult issues about the rights of the individual.

And so we expect that, given our own history, that we would know that Afghans are going to have to go through this evolution. But we're going to stand firm for the principle that religious freedom and freedom of religious conscience need to be upheld, and we are hoping for a favorable resolution in this case very soon.

BLITZER: You've referred now to the Afghan constitution. Let me read what Article Three of the Afghan constitution says: "In Afghanistan, no law can be contrary to the beliefs and provisions of the sacred religion of Islam." That would be Sharia, the Islamic law. That raises the question whether or not Sharia trumps the, all the other provisions of that constitution.

RICE: Well, the constitution also says that people should have certain individual rights, including freedom of conscience on issues of this kind. There are undoubtedly, as Afghan democracy evolves, there are going to be cases, there are going to be debates. They are going to have to go through a period of coming to terms with one of the most difficult and emotional issues that any society deals with. And that's the relationship between religion and politics.

We've been through the debate. We go through it still today. Other countries went through it in a much more violent way, democratic countries, earlier in their histories. But we need to stay focused on how much progress Afghanistan has made in four years that you don't have a Taliban, where it isn't even permitted to talk about these issues.

BLITZER: It's probably no coincidence that the same provision that's in the Afghan constitution is in the Iraqi constitution, probably because Zalmay Khalilzad helped draft the Afghan constitution, and he also worked with the Iraqis on the Iraqi constitution, which Article Two states, "No law that contradicts the established provisions of Islam may be established."

Here's the question: Could you envisage the same kind of situation developing in Iraq, whereby a Muslim man converts to Christianity and faces the death sentence in Iraq because of Sharia law?

RICE: Well, first of all, this clause or a clause like this is not unique to the Iraq and Afghan constitutions. And so I wouldn't say that just because Zal Khalilzad was involved in both. All of these countries are trying to come to terms with the laws of Islam and the laws of modern democracy, if you will, having to do with individual liberty and individual conscience.

It's happening, and it's going to happen, across the Middle East. We should be fortunate and be pleased that these debates are taking place, and that they're taking place in a constitutional context.

Iraq is a very different place. Iraq, in fact, has practicing Christian populations, and has had those practicing Christian populations for a long time. It's a much different mix of people and traditions.

But I want to go back to what the United States will continue to stand for, and that is that religious freedom is the bedrock of democracy. We will, as we do around the world, continue to press that case with our allies like Afghanistan and like Iraq. We need to understand that...

BLITZER: Let me -- excuse me for interrupting.

RICE: Yes.

BLITZER: In Saudi Arabia, you can't be a Christian, either.

RICE: We are going to continue to press what we believe needs to be a principle that is universal, that people have the right to religious conscience.

But again, Wolf, these are evolutionary democracies. They're democracies in transition. Let me just remind everyone that, in my lifetime, we were still trying to get to the place where the vote was assured, even though it was enshrined in the Constitution, that the vote was really assured for American blacks in the South. And so we should be humbled about what it takes to evolve to a completely functioning democracy.

BLITZER: Let's talk about Iraq, specifically the formation of a government of national unity. Is that happening?

RICE: The Iraqis are working on a government of national unity. They're doing it, to be totally -- more slowly than we would hope. And we've pressed that they need to expedite because of the potential for a political vacuum.

But if you look at what they're doing, they are not, as I've sometimes read, dividing the spoils of who's going to get what job. They are very involved in trying to deal with some of the most sensitive and existential issues for the new Iraq as they begin to put together a program by which the national government, the government of national unity, would actually govern.

They're putting together the rules of how they will govern, how they'll relate to each other and to different institutions. And they are going to be selecting people for particular slots. But this is the first time that Shia, Sunnis and Kurds have really had a chance to sit down and talk to each other about these very difficult issues. BLITZER: Do you want someone other than Ibrahim al-Jaafari to be the prime minister?

RICE: This is something that the Iraqis have got to determine. They have got to determine whether or not it is possible to achieve a government of national unity with that particular candidate.

The Shia do not have enough votes to govern on their own. And so they have to bring into coalition others from -- who won in the electoral process. That is what they're doing, and I think they're doing a remarkable job.

Were it not for the overhang of violence, it would not be in the least bit surprising that it is taking them some time to do it. The only reason that people are pressing them to get it done more quickly is that there is a violent insurgency that might try to take advantage of the period of time in which there isn't a government.

BLITZER: Here's what Republican Senator Chuck Hagel said a week ago today, Republican senator from Nebraska: "Are we better off today than we were three years ago? Is the Middle East more stable than it was three years ago? Absolutely not. It's more unstable."

RICE: Well, the question is not just is it unstable but is it moving in a better direction than it was when it was supposedly stable?

We thought it was stable for 60 years. And those authoritarian governments on which we counted for stability ended up producing an ideology of hatred or allowing an ideology of hatred so great to form and form terrorist groups that people flew planes into our buildings on September 11.

BLITZER: Are you referring to Saudi Arabia?

RICE: I'm talking about the entire Middle East. If you look at Al Qaida, you will find names from many of the governments in...

BLITZER: Well, 15 of the 19 hijackers were from Saudi Arabia.

RICE: Well, you'll also find that there are names from many other countries in the region.

So the authoritarianism that we associated with stability was, indeed, a false stability. Sixty years of that policy produced not just September 11 but the Cole and the bombings of our embassies, going all the way, really, frankly, back to the bombings of the '80s, the terrorist attacks of the '80s. So when people say, is it more stable today, I think the question is not "stable." The question is, are we moving in a direction in which Kuwaiti women now have the right to vote, in which Syrian forces are out of Lebanon and they are going to be able to work democratically, in which Yasser Arafat's corrupt regime is, indeed, gone? And yes, that's produced a difficult circumstance with Hamas, but Palestinians have had the chance, the right to speak their minds about who will govern them.

The point, Wolf, is that we had a false stability. It is not as if we disturbed a placid and functioning Middle East...

BLITZER: I just want to press you on this point.

RICE: ... in which our security interests were not at risk.

BLITZER: Did Saddam Hussein and his regime have anything to do with 9/11?

RICE: Saddam Hussein, and we have said this many times, as far as we know, did not order September 11, may not have even known of September 11. But that's a very narrow definition of what caused September 11.

If you think that what caused September 11 was that the people who flew airplanes in caused September 11, then no, Iraq has no relationship.

But if you think that this was a broader problem of an ideology of hatred, of terrorism becoming an acceptable means in places where there was a freedom deficit and where there was no possibility for legitimate political discourse, then you realize that you have to have a different kind of Middle East.

And a different kind of Middle East with Saddam Hussein at the middle of it is unthinkable.

BLITZER: Our recent CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll asks this question: "Was the situation in Iraq worth going to war over?"

Only 37 percent of the American public said yes. That's way down from the 60s, 70s, 80 percent three years ago.

RICE: I understand that the American people see on their screens violence. I understand that the American people are concerned, as are we, by the loss of life of Americans, coalition and Iraqis.

But I would not count on a poll to try and determine how the future of the Middle East is going to turn out when there is an Iraq with a national unity government and an Iraq that can form a different core for a different kind of Middle East. You can't measure that in a poll.

I think it's fair to say, Wolf, that if you look at any big historical change in the world, it has been turbulent and it's been difficult. And there have been times when it looked as if it was not going well or as planned.

But you have to step back and ask what was the alternative? Was the alternative really to leave a Middle East with authoritarian, repressive governments, with a Saddam Hussein who threatened his neighbors and threatened our interests or did you have to act? And this president believed it was time to act.

BLITZER: I'll have more of my interview with the secretary of state. I'll ask her about life after the Bush administration. Is a run for political office in her future plans?

Then, assessing the battle blueprint for U.S. and Iraqi forces: We'll get insight from two former top U.S. military commanders.

And is this the year to set a deadline for the start of the U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq? We'll hear from two key members of the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee, Republican Pat Roberts and Democrat Jack Reed.

"Late Edition" continues after this.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I spoke with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice just a short while ago. Here's part two of that interview.

BLITZER: Is there evidence that the Iranian government is supporting the largely Sunni-led insurgency in Iraq?

RICE: We are concerned about reports and activities that we see of Iranians, particularly in the South, with militias.

And one of the subjects that we would, of course, talk with the Iranians about if Zal Khalilzad meets with his counterpart would be, about this kind of security problem. Zal has had these authorities for a long time.

BLITZER: To talk to Iranians?

RICE: On these very specific issues concerning Iraq. He had the authorities in Afghanistan to talk with the Iranians about security issues in Afghanistan.

And Ron Newman, by the way, our new ambassador to Afghanistan, continues to have those authorities. So that is the, kind of, nature of the issue that would be addressed.

BLITZER: Has either one of those ambassadors met with Iranians?

RICE: Well, there has -- Ron Newman has met with his counterpart. Zal's met with his counterpart.

BLITZER: When did these -- when did that happen?

RICE: It was several months ago, but we will see when it is desirable to do so again.

BLITZER: Because I think you're making some news. There have been direct contacts ...

RICE: There were... BLITZER: ... between United States officials and Iranian officials...

RICE: No, let's not say officials. I want to be very clear. No, I want to be very clear.

BLITZER: Is the Iranian ambassador in Afghanistan an official?

RICE: You're using an "s," a plural.

BLITZER: All right.

RICE: The ambassador in Afghanistan has the authority to meet with the ambassador from Iran in Afghanistan. And I believe he has done that on one occasion. The ambassador in Iraq, Zal Khalilzad, has the authority, and has had for some time, to meet with his counterpart in Iraq. When we are that close to...

BLITZER: He has met?

RICE: They have not...

BLITZER: Khalilzad?

RICE: They have not had that meeting. When it is that -- when we are that close to the Iranian border and when we have concerns, we have found it useful to have these narrow and limited discussions about Iraq or about Afghanistan. In Afghanistan, they also take place under the auspices of the U.N., which was the case when Ron Newman met with his counterpart.

BLITZER: Is there evidence that the government of Iran is supporting or harboring al Qaida operatives in Iran? RICE: Well, again, we've had concerns, and we've made them known to the Iranians through various channels, that there are, in fact, or may be Afghan -- or may be al Qaida in Iran. And we've made clear to them that we would expect to have those people handed over. We don't know the extent of it, but yes, there are reasons for concern on that score.

BLITZER: What about the Russian role right now in getting a U.N. Security Council resolution that would threaten Iran and its nuclear program? Right now, there seems to be a disconnect between the U.S. position on the one hand and the Russian position on the other.

RICE: The United States and Russia -- and the Europeans, by the way -- and let me remind everyone that it's the United States and the Europeans who are doing this together. So it's not correct to say the United States and the Russians.

The United States and Europe are with Russia in agreement that Iran needs to do what was required of it in the IAEA -- the International Atomic Energy Agency's -- resolution of February 4. That resolution said that Iran needed to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities and return to negotiations, and cooperate fully with the IAEA. We have complete agreement on that. In fact, the Russians voted for that resolution. Now, the question is, what tactics do we use, now that we're in the Security Council, to get the Iranians to come to terms with what they must do. On that, we have had some differences, and Sergey Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, and I spoke on Friday. We agreed that our people would get together this weekend, and continue those efforts to bridge that difference.

But we shouldn't delay. We do need a presidential statement that makes clear to the Iranians what is clear to everyone. Everyone is in agreement on what they need to do, but we do have some tactical disagreements about language.

BLITZER: Did Russians have a mole inside the U.S. military Central Command on the eve of the war three years ago providing information about U.S. military troop movements in Iraq directly to Saddam Hussein's government?

RICE: Well, I have obviously seen the reports as well, and I -- we're going to take a good, hard look at the documentation. We certainly will raise it with the Russian government, and any implication that the -- that there were those from a foreign government who may have been passing information to the Iraqis prior to the invasion would be, of course, very worrying. And we will talk to the Russians. I would think the Russians would want to take that very seriously as well.

BLITZER: But you haven't raised that with the Russians yet?

RICE: We're going to take a good, hard look at the documentation and understand a little bit better what's there, and then we'll raise it. BLITZER: We're almost out of time, but a few other issues I just want to go through very quickly. The Israeli elections happening this coming Tuesday. Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, widely expected to be elected the next prime minister of Israel, says that he's going to seek U.S. approval for future Israeli unilateral steps, withdrawal steps, disengagement steps from the West Bank, removing some of the settlements in the isolated parts of the West Bank. Is that something that the U.S. would support?

RICE: Well, first of all, the Israelis will have their elections, and that's a matter for the Israelis. Once that is done, we will of course engage with the Israeli government in discussions about how we move forward. I would note that the unilateral withdrawal, disengagement from Gaza ended up turning over to the Palestinians territories for the first time in the 30-some years of this conflict, and that was a good thing.

We will see what the Israeli government has in mind, but I think it's premature to make any judgment about what that might be.

BLITZER: The president meets this week with the leaders of Canada and Mexico. Immigration, illegal immigration in the United States, a big issue. The House passed legislation which would make it a felony for an illegal immigrant in the United States simply to be here. Is that something the Bush administration supports? RICE: The president has very clearly stated the principles on which we would work to try and get a more humane and effective immigration law, and those principles include that we really must, of course, defend our border, and we've put a lot of money into border security. The State Department has enhanced its request for border security. We are obviously determined that U.S. laws should be enforced.

It's also the case that we have a population here that needs to be treated humanely. No matter how they came here, I think Americans want to think that people would be treated humanely, and the president has talked about a temporary worker program that would allow people to -- who have work that Americans will not do, to find a way to be legally in the country.

But the president is always going to stand against amnesty, and the reason that he stands against amnesty is because our laws do need to be respected, our borders do need to be respected.

And one of the points that I made, Wolf, to the Mexican government when they were here -- I'd met with my counterpart, Foreign Minister Derbez, and Mike Chertoff met with his counterpart -- is that we need the Mexican government and expect the Mexican government also to recognize the importance of defense of the borders and of American laws, and we were assured by our counterparts that Mexico understands its responsibilities, our shared responsibility for safety and security at the border, and also for humane treatment of people, whoever they are.

BLITZER: We are all out of time, but I have to ask you about the NFL, your passion. This is what you told Ebony magazine, July 26th, 2005. "If that job comes open, I'm gone."

RICE: Oh, well...

BLITZER: That job has come open.

RICE: A little too soon, I'm afraid. As I was saying earlier, you know, I'm going to have to let this ship pass, if they'd have me. But the fact is, I'm secretary of state. I love being secretary of state, and there's always a next time on other jobs.

BLITZER: Well, speaking of other jobs, the first lady told our Larry King Friday she would love you to run for president of the United States in 2008. Listen to this little clip from Laura Bush.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LAURA BUSH, FIRST LADY: She'd make an excellent president, but I don't think we can talk her into running.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Can she talk you into running?

RICE: The second part of that's right. BLITZER: Why not?

RICE: Well, Wolf, I know what I want to do with my life, and I know what my strengths are. And I have enormous respect for people who run for office, but I love being secretary of state. I think I'm fortunate to be here at a time that is consequential, and hopefully we will make some progress on some of these very important issues while I'm here. But I know what I want to do, and I'm going to be back at Stanford, and who knows, maybe there will be other great jobs, like the NFL job.

BLITZER: You're still a very young woman.

RICE: Still young, but I know what I -- well, thanks, I appreciate that.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Thank you very much for joining us, Madam Secretary, and good luck to you.

RICE: Thank you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Ahead, Iraqi troops. How prepared are they to protect their country? We're going to get assessments from the former NATO Supreme Allied Commander, General George Joulwan and retired U.S. Marine Corps Lieutenant General Bernard Trainor. He's the co-author of an important new book, "Cobra II." But up next, we'll have a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the latest in the case against Abdul Rahman, the Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity. Stay with "Late Edition."

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: If I didn't believe we could succeed, I wouldn't be there. I wouldn't put those kids there. It's -- I meet with too many families who's lost a loved one to not be able to look them in the eye and say we're doing the right thing. And we are doing the right thing.

BLITZER; President Bush, this week, defending his Iraq war policy. Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington.

The rise of sectarian violence, in addition to the insurgency, posing an even more dangerous mix for U.S. and Iraqi troops right now.

And joining us now with some special insight, two guests, the former NATO supreme allied commander, retired General George Joulwan and the retired U.S. Marine Corps Lieutenant General Bernard Trainor. He's also the co-author, with Michael Gordon, of a new and important book, "Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq."

Gentlemen, welcome back to "Late Edition." Thanks to both of you for joining us. Listen to what Lieutenant General Martin Dempsey, who's training Iraqi forces in Iraq right now, said on Friday. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LT. GEN. MARTIN DEMPSEY, U.S. COMMANDER, IRAQI FORCES: We're really equipping them at a very aggressive rate in order to put them in position to restore civil security by the end of the year.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: I don't know if you know General Dempsey, but that seems to be pretty ambitious, by the end of this year, to have civil security under the control of Iraqi forces.

JOULWAN: Well, first of all, I do know Marty Dempsey. He used to work for me. He's a very good officer. I think what we're going to see here is that this training of Iraqis, both their police and military, is progressing. Is it progressing at the pace needed? I'm not sure.

I'm not sure that by the end of the year you'll have sufficient forces in order to provide the secure environment that's going to be required.

BLITZER: Is that an overly ambitious agenda he has for himself, General Dempsey?

GEN. BERNARD TRAINOR (RET.), CO-AUTHOR, "COBRA II": Well, you try to set the goal pretty high and strive for it. You know, you have to consider what's the alternative. If the Iraqi military forces don't step up to the requirement, then we're in terrible trouble.

BLITZER: The alternative is the U.S. has to do it.

TRAINOR: Well, if the U.S. has to do it, then that's just going to exacerbate the situation.

This is an Iraqi problem that has to be solved by the Iraqis, both politically in terms of the security and by the Iraqi politicians in coming together with some sort of a national unity government.

But in terms of training the security forces, we've got to push that as hard as we possibly can. We've learned a lot of lessons. We've wasted a lot of time. But I think we're on the correct track now. Time-wise I can't put a level on that.

BLITZER: What I hear, General Trainor say, General Joulwan, is that there's really only a political solution to this. Militarily, there's not necessarily a solution. GEN. GEORGE JOULWAN, FORMER NATO ALLIED SUPREME COMMANDER: Exactly. And I think it's the political solution that we need to concentrate on now. And part of that political is training of military and police forces.

That is, to me, the requirement that needs to take place -- and providing a secure environment for all of those other agencies that make democracy work.

Without that secure environment, it makes it very, very difficult for these aid agencies and international agencies to operate. And right now, it's very difficult to get that secure environment in Iraq.

BLITZER: General Trainor, listen to what General George Casey, who is the overall U.S. coalition commander in Iraq, told me here on "Late Edition" last Sunday. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEN. GEORGE CASEY, U.S. COMMANDER IN IRAQ: With an assumption that the political process continues on the track that it's on and we continue to have the success that we're having with the development of the Iraqi security forces, I would expect that process of gradual coalition reductions to continue through 2006 and 2007.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Is that overly ambitious, too, a continued reduction in the face of the insurgency, the sectarian violence -- some say, already, civil war -- for the U.S. to start significantly withdrawing forces?

TRAINOR: Well, that certainly the hope because nobody likes their country to be occupied by foreigners.

The big danger with the military forces and the police is that they'll break apart in, kind of, a sectarian mode. And if that happens -- and there's pressure from the fringes of both the Sunni side and the Shia side to do that sort of thing -- then that is the danger of an evolving civil war, that then they would clash.

But if you can hold the center and the security forces, both the military and the police, give their allegiance to some form of central government, then the dangers of civil war, I think, are diminished and the ability for us to withdraw into the background and lower our force levels, I think is very realistic.

BLITZER: Because you raised this issue, which some say is already a serious issue. Let me bring Gen. Joulwan in. These militias that are not necessarily part of the regular Iraqi national army. The Shiite militias, the Kurdish militias, that they are very powerful, and their loyalty is to their own ethnic group as opposed to a bigger loyalty to Iraq.

JOULWAN: Exactly. And that should have been one of our first missions after the fall of Baghdad was to disarm and demobilize these militias. We didn't do it. And now they pose, I think, one of the greater risks that we have in Iraq.

But if you back to Beirut in 1983, where we had these confessional brigades. What happened in those brigades, that they split on religious boundaries, and that's what really caused a great problem. You can learn from what occurred there in what we're trying to do now in Iraq.

BLITZER: Well, are you suggesting, because you know the subject well, that Iraq could fall into the kind of sectarian civil war that we saw in Lebanon?

JOULWAN: Absolutely.

BLITZER: If that happens, then all bets are off?

TRAINOR: Oh, I agree. That is the danger. I think what they're trying very hard to do is to get these militias to meld into a central military force and not split into confessional lines, because if they do, and then you are going to face civil war.

One of the encouraging things, after the Golden Dome massacres in Samarra, was that the politicians and the clerics, most importantly, the clerics, cautioned forbearance and patience. And that, I think, is a good sign that what happened there...

BLITZER: General, do you see any signs at all that anyone is trying to disband these militias?

TRAINOR: I'm not privy to the sort of intelligence which would give an indication of that, but I think everybody is aware that, you know, you can't ignore the in militias. What you have to do is try to, if I can use the term, to co-opt them.

JOULWAN: I think one of the challenges, Wolf, is that what we need to do is take a little broader, five- to ten-year look. I know we all want to talk to an '06 or an '08. But I think you need to have a five- or ten-year plan with clear milestones for the Iraqis here.

And you need to be up front and direct with them of what needs to be accomplished, because if you don't have some sort of milestones or some sort of objectives, then the idea is they think we're going to be there for a long time.

BLITZER: Well, the first milestone is to get a government of national unity in place, which they, so far, since December, have been unable to do.

JOULWAN: But I think that we need to get the timetable here, capture the timetable, and start moving on that timetable, in my opinion.

BLITZER: All right, Generals, I'm going to have both of you stand by because we have much more to discuss. We'll take a quick break. More with our guests, generals Joulwan and Trainor, about the overall U.S. military mission in Iraq. And Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, his future, all that coming up. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're talking about the challenges facing U.S. and Iraqi troops in Iraq with the former NATO Supreme Allied Commander, retired General George Joulwan, and retired U.S. Marine Corps Lieutenant General Bernard Trainor, the co- author of "Cobra II," a hot new bestseller on the war in Iraq.

Here's what I don't understand, and maybe you guys can explain it to me. General Joulwan, I'll start with you. In terms of Iraqi forces, the more they get up to par, the more the U.S. can think about withdrawing.

A few months ago, they had what they said three Iraqi battalions at this level one, which is ready to operate without any U.S. support. That has now gone down to zero Iraqi battalions at level one.

They've got 53 at level two and 45 at level three which clearly need U.S. support. It seems to be moving in the wrong direction, at least as far as combat battalions ready to operate on their own.

JOULWAN: That also says there's some honesty in the reporting. I think you have to be brutally honest here. When you're going to put the Iraqi units alone in the field, I think it's going to take time. That's why I talk about a five or ten-year plan. You just can't say we've stood a unit up and then therefore it's ready to fight.

It's a different culture, it's a different discipline than we're used to. It's going to take time. And I think you have to integrate them in with U.S. and coalition forces first, and then slowly, slowly wean them away from that.

BLITZER: So you were not surprised when the president sort of inadvertently acknowledged in his news conference this week that U.S. forces are going to be in Iraq for some time to come, and future presidents, in his words, would have to make a decision when to withdraw.

TRAINOR: Oh, I don't think there's any question of that. We may reduce the combat forces considerably as the Iraqis come up on the step. But in terms of support, intelligence, logistics, strategic lift and that sort of thing, we're going to be there a very, very long time.

But in terms of their ability, I don't think we should do much on the business of the metrics, you know, whether you raise the bridge or lower the river. The fact is, your metrics and your standards are going to constantly change because it's a dynamic situation. And the rules and the yardstick that you apply today may not apply in the same way tomorrow because new characteristics come in. So it's a flexible sort of situation. But we're making progress.

BLITZER: Rumsfeld caused some stir last week when he wrote in The Washington Post these words: "If we retreat now, there's every reason to believe Saddamists and terrorist also fill the vacuum, and the free world might not have the will to face them again. Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

He was criticized for making that analogy. Do you understand what he was trying to say?

JOULWAN: I don't think I -- I understand fully what he was trying to say, but I think it's very important here that what has to happen is integration in this society of all the different ethnic groups, and I think that we made a mistake in not integrating the Iraqi army early into this, into the government, and into the armed forces, in my opinion. And I think the Sunnis and the Shias and the Kurds really need to come together now, and we ought to be trying to build internal unity, not disunity.

BLITZER: Major General Paul Eaton, retired, wrote in The New York Times, he said: "In sum, he has shown himself incompetent," referring to Rumsfeld, "strategically, operationally and tactically and is far more than anyone else responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down."

In your book, "Cobra II," you write this, together with Michael Gordon, your co-author: "In their own way, Rumsfeld and the U.S. administrator, Paul Bremer, each contributed to the security problem. Rumsfeld limited the number of American troops in Iraq, and Bremer limited the number of Iraqi forces that were immediately available. The two decisions combined to produce a much larger security vacuum."

Question. Based on all of the research you did with Michael Gordon in writing this book, how much responsibility does Rumsfeld have for the mistakes that were made?

TRAINOR: Well, I don't know that you could put a figure on something like that. What we did was relate the information that came through when we did our research, which was exhaustive.

TRAINOR: And there were a lot of poor assumptions made. There were a lot of poor judgments made. And there was very little flexibility in correcting them when they did happen.

So in that sense, the consequences have to be borne by the people that made those decisions.

BLITZER: Do you know retired Major General Eaton?

TRAINOR: No, I don't.

BLITZER: Do you know him?

JOULWAN: No.

BLITZER: Because he was on this program about a month ago. He feels passionately that Rumsfeld should resign, given the blunders that were made.

And I'll ask both of you to just comment on that. General?

JOULWAN: Well, I think there has to be accountability here. You not only have political control of the military, you have political responsibility for the military. And that includes accountability by both military and civilian leaders.

And I think accountability is very important here. And I'm not going to get into whether a secretary of defense should resign or not. But accepting accountability for what occurs is important in our chain of command.

BLITZER: General Trainor?

TRAINOR: Well, the record is out there. But it's really up to the president to select his cabinet members. And he has selected Rumsfeld as his secretary of defense and stands by him.

And I think that's really, in a sense, the end of the decision- making process. He has made the decision.

BLITZER: Here's another quote from the book, "Cobra II." "The American war plan was never adjusted on high. General Tommy Franks, who was the overall commander, never acknowledged the enemy he faced nor did he comprehend the nature of the war he was directing.

He denigrated the Fedayeen as little more than a speed bump on the way to Baghdad and never appreciated their resilience and determination."

I read carefully your book. So many of the problems the U.S. military is currently facing in Iraq were clear, were evident, were foreseen, but people decided not to pay attention to them.

TRAINOR: There was a grand canyon between the field commanders and the central command and the administration, particularly the secretary of defense.

BLITZER: It seems as if there was wishful thinking more than there was, you know, listening to the commanders on the ground. But General, you've been in that situation.

JOULWAN: One of the key feedbacks was from Scott Wallace, the 5th Corps commander of my old corps. And he was one that made the run-up to Baghdad and said we ran into more and different opposition than we'd planned for. He got criticized.

BLITZER: He almost got fired. You write about that in the book.

JOULWAN: And that is the sort of feedback you want from your field commanders.

And so, I think, if we would have adjusted that -- in a war fight, the assumptions you make going into the fight -- if you get into that and the assumptions are wrong -- we weren't treated with rose petals and flowers.

There were no weapons of mass destruction. If those assumptions are wrong, you have to quickly adjust. And stabilization -- after taking Baghdad, stabilization is a very important part of the mission. BLITZER: We've got to leave it there. General Joulwan, thanks very much for joining us.

General Trainor, congratulations to you on this excellent book, must reading for anyone interested in this war in Iraq. Thanks to you and Michael Gordon.

TRAINOR: Thank you, Wolf.

JOULWAN: Thank you.

BLITZER: And don't forget our Web question, "How big of a threat is Iran to the United States?" An immediate threat, a long-term threat or not a threat? Cast your vote. Go to CNN.com/lateedition.

We'll be right back.

BLITZER: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I believe we'll succeed. If I didn't think we'd succeed, I would pull our troops out.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On the brink of civil war? Can the Iraqi government control the violent insurgency? We'll ask two key members of the Senate armed services committee, Republican Pat Roberts and Democrat Jack Reed. Plus, perspective from the representative of the Iraqi Kurdish region, Qubad Talabany.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SHEIKHA LUBNA AL QASIMI, UAE ECONOMICS MINISTER: We need each other. And therefore, you can't jeopardize a relationship over decades because of an incident.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Mending fences after the Dubai Ports World debacle. Is it business as usual or has the U.S. snubbed a key ally? We'll ask the United Arab Emirates economy minister, Sheikha Lubna al Qasimi.

Welcome back. We'll speak with Senators Pat Roberts and Jack Reed in a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's making news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: With sectarian violence spreading across Iraq, one of the country's most powerful Shia politicians is now speaking out about the possibility of civil war. Abdul Aziz al Hakim sat down exclusively with our senior international correspondent Nic Robertson, who's joining us now live from Baghdad. Nic, what did he say?

NIC ROBERTSON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, we talked about a range of issues. I asked him about Iran's involvement in Iraq. He said that's not happening. He said he's encouraging the United States to talk to Iran about the issue of Iraq. He says that he believes Iran can play a much stronger security and economic role in Iraq at the moment.

He told me that the attack on a holy shrine north of Baghdad a month ago in Samarra was what he described as Iraq's 9/11. He talked about sectarian genocide in the country. He believes that at the moment there are thousands of people now on the move.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ROBERTSON: Sectarian shift in Baghdad, people moving from neighborhoods, do you see these divisions here beginning to establish themselves in the communities?

ABDUL AZIZ AL-HAKIM, IRAQI SHIA LEADER (THROUGH TRANSLATOR): This is true and clear in some regions. There are thousands of Shiite families and some Sunni families as well moving from one region to another. This is also part of the agenda of the next government, to return those displaced families to their region and to protect them.

We should stand and face some actions because these are presenting the goals of al Zarqawi and other religious extremist groups, and their aim is to take the community to sectarian strife and to lead them to a civil war.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

ROBERTSON: And he told me as well that if there is another big sectarian single big attack, that he thinks it will be very difficult for the community's leaders to hold people back. I asked him, why wasn't a new government formed yet? He said they hadn't even got beyond discussing procedural issues before they get to talk about who's going to get which job, Wolf.

BLITZER: Lots more of that interview coming up here on CNN. Nic, good work. Thanks very much.

Joining us now to assess where things stand in Iraq and more, two guests, Republican Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas. He's the chairman of the Senate select intelligence committee, also serves on the armed services committee. And Democratic Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island. He, too, is a member of the Senate armed services committee.

Senators, welcome to "Late Edition." And your name is Pat Roberts, not Pat Robertson as I mistakenly pointed out, but I guess that's a common mistake.

SEN. PAT ROBERTS (R), KANSAS: Well, I pray for you every day, Wolf.

BLITZER: Thank you very much, Senator Roberts, for that. I want to get to Iraq and all of these latest developments in a moment. But I want both of you to weigh in first of all on what's happening in Afghanistan, specifically this Muslim man, Abdul Rahman, who converted to Christianity and now faces potentially the death sentence because of that conversion.

Are you as outraged as a lot of Americans are? The U.S. sent troops into Afghanistan, liberated that country from the Taliban, and to see this kind of situation develop?

ROBERTS: I'm not surprised by it, but I think it's a crossroads for their judicial system. And I think Secretary Rice, you know, put it very well. We'll have to see the course of it. But it is a true test in regards to how far we have come in regards to some kind of pluralistic society, not only to achieve stability but democracy. So it would be a terrible, terrible signal if that would take place.

BLITZER: It is sort of outrageous, don't you think, Senator?

SEN. JACK REED (D), RHODE ISLAND: It's shocking and unacceptable. We cannot allow a situation where we've spent our precious resources, including our soldiers and marines, to help a country liberate themselves from tyranny and then see this type of practice go on. It shocks the conscience of the world. I would hope that the Afghani leadership would recognize how serious it is and take steps to stop this process immediately.

BLITZER: I can't imagine, because I know President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan. He's a moderate, reasonable man, Western-oriented. Even if he's under pressure from Muslim clerics in Afghanistan, I can't imagine that he would allow this to go forward, the actual execution.

ROBERTS: Well, I would hope not. And I agree with jack, it is shocking, but let's, you know, remember that achieving democracy in a place where it has not been and perhaps is not wanted in many sections of the country,, is very difficult.

It's not like AstroTurf that you lay over stony soil and then you hope to see something come out of that. These are first steps. This is a big test of their judicial system. Let's hope they make the right decision. If they don't, I think there's going to be a great many problems.

BLITZER: All right. We'll leave it there, and we'll move on to talk a little bit about Iraq right now. You saw this report, Senator Reed -- you're a graduate of West Point -- that the Russians supposedly had a mole at the U.S. military Central Command in Doha, Qatar, on the eve of the war, providing sensitive troop deployment, military operations information to the government of Saddam Hussein. You saw that Pentagon report this week.

REED: I did.

BLITZER: Have you had a chance to look into that?

REED: Well, we haven't had a chance since we've been on recess, but that's an issue I think we will confront when we return this week. It is, again, of great concern that any of our operational security would be penetrated by any country, and it's also, I think, of great concern that the Russians would be acting this way in a situation where, obviously, the world community should have been, if not supportive of us directly, at least not trying to interfere with our operations.

BLITZER: Are you outraged by that report? I don't know if you've had a chance to investigate.

ROBERTS: Outrage seems to be the call of the day, the watch word of the day. I'm not surprised by this. You know, we're going to have a briefing on the intelligence committee, so we'll get to the bottom of it. The Russians have already answered and said, absolutely not, this was not directed by, you know, President Putin or by Moscow.

The supposition is that this was a local individual working with Iraq at that particular time. I think the bottom line is that the advice that they gave him he ignored. Saddam Hussein just didn't get it in regards to the invasion whether we would be successful or not. He's an egomaniac. If this is the case, which is a very serious matter, I think it's more one turned on the economics of it as opposed to the military situation.

We had the oil for food situation, and then Russia depending on the oil from Iraq, so I'm not too terribly surprised. I would be surprised if that connection went all the way to Moscow, and that was some direct planning by Putin.

BLITZER: But the bottom line is not necessarily whether Saddam Hussein listened to this information, because he apparently didn't listen to anybody except whatever he wanted to believe.

ROBERTS: Exactly.

BLITZER: The bottom line is, was there a mole, a spy inside the U.S. military Central Command headquarters providing this information to the Russian ambassador in Baghdad, who was then giving it to Saddam Hussein or his military or political leaders. If there was a spy inside, that would be a serious issue.

ROBERTS: It would be a very serious issue. It is a serious issue. We will have a briefing on the intelligence committee. I know that Jack and I serve on the armed services committee. I know that Chairman Warner and Senator Levin will be looking into that. I am not surprised, however, by Russian spying. I don't want to cause a major flap here, but that's what they do.

REED: Well, we have to assume that intelligence services around the world are trying to penetrate our military headquarters, our (inaudible).

ROBERTS: Exactly.

REED: We have to assume that.

BLITZER: We have to assume that. But if they do, that's a different level.

REED: But the question then is, one, how did it happen, and more importantly, we have to prevent it from happening in the future. But this notion that we'd be shocked that someone was actually trying to learn our battle plan, no. I think people around the globe, countries around the globe are trying to learn those plans.

REED: But it's our responsibility to prevent that. And that's the real issue, I think, is going forward, can we ensure that we've eliminated any possible compromise of military information?

BLITZER: Does it affect the overall U.S./Russian relationship, though, the relationship that President Bush has with Vladimir Putin, the Russian president?

ROBERTS: Oh, I think it does. I think we've been on sort of a downhill path for some time. He is moving more and more toward a totalitarian kind of government -- I mean, the situation in regard to the Ukraine and also Belarus and other countries.

I think there's some concern there. That doesn't mean everything has completely evaporated in terms of our close contacts with that government, but I think we have to be very wary.

BLITZER: Do you agree?

REED: Absolutely. I think we have to be skeptical of many of the Russian proposals and their policies. They operate on their own self-interests. And many times that does not reconcile or coincide with our self-interests.

BLITZER: Were you surprised, Senator Roberts, to hear the president say this week that U.S. troops, the deployment in Iraq, that future presidents were going to have to determine how long they would stay?

Did that come as a surprise to you, that, looking into 2009, there would be U.S. troops in Iraq?

ROBERTS: I think they asked him, would there be a deadline and would there be a troop withdrawal schedule and he said that would be for the next president to decide.

I'm not sure he said it was going to be lasting that long. I know the hope is that we can withdraw our troops as soon as we can, stand up the Iraqi security forces.

I think the generals were right. They also sent a very clear message to the Iraqi government, going through some very difficult times. We do have the resolve. And you can depend on the United States.

And with all of the rhetoric that we hear in the United States, we talk about the problem in Iraq toward a national unity government. I worry more about the national unity of the United States and the resolve in regard to this war, perhaps more so than what's happening in Iraq.

BLITZER: What do you think?

REED: Well, I think, whatever the president was trying to say, it came out in a very surprising fashion.

He seemed to suggest that he was abdicating his responsibility to do all he can to get our forces out before 2009. And I think that's the impression that was left with many people around the United States.

I agree, you know, we have to show resolve. But the president has to be able to demonstrate to the American public that he has a plan to reduce our forces rapidly and not wait on another administration.

It's almost as if he said, I got them in, but somebody else will have to get them out. That, I think, shocked a lot of Americans.

BLITZER: But he says that he's depending on his military commanders for that kind of troop deadline or withdrawal or redeployment.

REED: Well, he is the president. And I think he has to set the grand strategy and also listen to his military commanders.

My sense is that the military commanders in the field recognize that they have reached the limit of just what military power alone can do. Now it's a political, economic transformation that has to take place.

And, frankly, I don't think we're applying enough of that nonmilitary power, in terms of diplomacy, economic assistance, political mentoring, that we need.

And so the president seems to be stuck in a situation where the only option is a military one. And that has a limited utility.

BLITZER: All right, Senators, hold on because we're going to take a quick break. We have a lot more to discuss.

We're going to continue our conversation with Senators Roberts and Reed. We'll get their take on the president's plans going into the next -- this election year and beyond. The American public's confidence in the U.S. mission in Iraq -- how weak is it?

Then, fears that Iraq may be on the brink of civil war. We'll hear from the country's Kurdish representative to the U.S., Qubad Talabany.

And later: after the Dubai ports deal collapsed, is it back to business as usual between the United States and the United Arab Emirates? We'll hear from the UAE's economic minister, Sheikha Lubna al-Qasimi.

"Late Edition" continues after this.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're talking with the Republican chairman of the Intelligence Committee, Pat Roberts of Kansas and Democratic Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, a key member of the Armed Services Committee.

Senator Reed, listen to what the president said earlier in the week on Donald Rumsfeld, whether he should resign. And listen to Rumsfeld's response to a similar question a couple days later. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: No, I don't believe he should resign. I think he's done a fine job of not only conducting two battles, Afghanistan and Iraq, but also transforming our military.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DONALD RUMSFELD, DEFENSE SECRETARY: Those kinds of calls have been going on for five-plus years. And the president has asked me not to get involved in politics. And that's politics.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Should Donald Rumsfeld resign?

REED: Yes, he should. I've said that for several months now, when asked.

I think, first, it's becoming increasingly clear that his influence on the planning for the operations, particularly the occupation of Iraq, inhibited our ability to really stabilize the country.

And (inaudible) in position today is that we have significant challenges there.

And more importantly, my view, I think he's created a very acrimonious atmosphere within the military, in some respects, devaluing the opinion of military officers.

I remember when General Shinseki stood up and was asked about the size of the forces and he said upwards of 200,000 and he was disparaged.

I don't think that's the kind of atmosphere you need. I think a secretary of defense has to be able to get unbridled advice from military leaders. And again, I was listening to General Joulwan and General Trainor about General Wallace's comments about the difficulty of fighting the Fedayeen. And he was essentially threatened with dismissal. That's not the kind of atmosphere -- my sense is, you know, a good captain goes down with the ship, but a good president gets a new captain. I think this is the president's call. I think he has to step up and make a change.

BLITZER: Senator Roberts?

ROBERTS: I'm not sure changing the secretary of defense in the middle of a war against terrorism, right up against a U.S. election and the time that the Iraqis are now trying to form a unity government is a good idea.

I can look back on many other battles that we have fought in, you know, in previous wars where we've had tough times -- can name some pretty glorious names in the past, Eisenhower, Patton and so on and so forth -- there were a lot of calls for people to resign at that particular time.

I think secretary of defense has been there five years; it's been very tough. We've had Iraq. We've had transformation. We've had a very difficult war -- both in Afghanistan and Iraq. To change at this particular time, I think, could be more harmful.

BLITZER: If it were not an election year, would you want him out?

ROBERTS: No, I didn't say that. It's like Jack said. It's the president's call. And he has his detractors. And I would agree in terms of listening to the troops.

But all of this talk about, especially General Shinseki and a lot of people in the Congress who said, well, all we needed was more troops. Or if we could have just signed up the Iraqi army.

A, there wasn't any Iraqi army to be found. They were gone. I mean, they weren't in the barracks saying, here, I'm going to sign up.

B, it isn't the number of troops. It's the number of troops who are trained to do the specific job that they have to do. If anything, at the first part of this war, we ran into some real problems that we had anticipated on the Intelligence Committee, where we didn't have the right kind of troops and they were not trained to do that job.

BLITZER: Let's talk about domestic surveillance without warrants. Listen to what the vice president said this week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Instead of acknowledging the urgent need to track enemy communications in a time of war, some Democrats in Congress have decided that the president is the enemy and that the terrorist surveillance program is grounds for censuring the president.

(END VIDEO CLIP) BLITZER: That would be Russ Feingold, who's calling for a censure resolution. I'm not sure Democrats are necessarily saying the president is the enemy along those lines. But go ahead. You're a good Democrat. What do you say?

REED: Well, first, our obligation is to protect the American people. And no one is objecting to trying to interfere with the communications of al Qaida or anyone else. The real issue is, it should be done according to the law. FISA, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act has been on the books. I think it can be made to work.

And if it can't be made to work, then I think it's incumbent upon the president to come to Congress and say, we need changes. His obligation is to protect America and to defend the Constitution, support the Constitution. I don't think there was a diametrically opposed. I think they can be harmonized, and that, I think, is at the crux of this debate about wiretapping.

BLITZER: Do you support a censure resolution?

REED: I think we have do look at, determine what has happened. We're still trying to struggle to determine what this NSA program -- the boundaries, who it's intercepted, how many people it's intercepted? I think before we leap, we have to take a very hard look. And I know there's some stirrings in both the intelligence committee -- and we're here with the chairman -- and also on other committees. Senator Specter also is trying to look at what actually happened. I think we owe it to the people to determine what went on before we decide what we will do.

BLITZER: As the chairman of the intelligence committee, you've been severely been criticized, as you know, by other Democratic members of your own committee, Democrats in general, for refusing to hold those kinds of hearings that they want, the kind of hearings that Senator Specter, for example, had in the judiciary committee. What do you say to the critics who say you're not going far enough to investigate this whole surveillance without warrants?

ROBERTS: Basically, let's start off, this is the highest classified program we have. And I am literally amazed, I think it's remarkable, where some of the major media, i.e, The New York Times, decides to release this story, which is wrong on its face. A lot of wrong information and a cascade of misinformation that this is domestic spying, and we're spying on Aunt Harriet, so on and so forth.

We have a capability. It is a unique capability. It is very difficult to fit this capability into the FISA court system. It almost can't be done. And then we have a new threat or a different kind of threat in regards to terrorism. It is within the constitutional authority of the president of the United States to protect us from possible terrorist attacks.

Now, we do have al Qaida in the country. We do have sleeper cells. We do have plots. The reason I know is because I've been briefed on the program. But my -- you know, my real dilemma is, I can't tell you what the operational details are. That was limited to the four members of the leadership and the four members of the intelligence committee.

Now, I have fought very hard to have the full committee briefed on the intelligence side. We have increased it from two from five to seven. Staff's in the room. Staff has been briefed. They've been briefed. They've gone out to the NSA. I've gone out to the NSA. I think the program is lawful. I think it's essential.

And the biggest thing is that it works. And if we don't get this off the headlines and quit talking about it, we will lose the capability and America will be less safe. And this isn't a Bush issue. This is an issue for the next commander in chief to have the authority, and the one after that, to have the authority to protect the country. I know people worry about our civil liberties. I'm an old newspaper guy. I worry about them. But you don't have any civil liberties if you're dead.

BLITZER: I'm going to -- we're almost out of time, but I'll let you respond, Senator.

REED: Well, I think the issue here is, I think it's incumbent upon the president to try to fit it within the context of the constitution. I mean, that's his sworn obligation. And there was no attempt to do that. There's been limited briefings, but most of my colleagues, again, they can't talk a lot about it, suggest that those briefings weren't expansive.

And the idea that the president decides what's lawful, individual senators decide what's lawful, I think, goes against the grain. I think we can do both. We must strive to do both. I don't think they've tried to reconcile this program, this new technology with the laws and the constitution.
BLITZER: Very briefly.

ROBERTS: They were briefed. They raised questions. They supported the program. New York Times story came out. I think we have to give them again -- I said this on a previous program, some memory pills what they said in private in support of the program, which is absolutely essential for our national security and what they said public after The New York Times came out, two different things. That's not right.

REED: I think I recall a letter from Senator Rockefeller at least raising some questions about the propriety.

BLITZER: That he never made public until the time.

ROBERTS: Until the time...

BLITZER: A letter he wrote to Vice President Cheney.

ROBERTS: And one week before he declared his full support.

REED: Well, again, I think there was some concerns raised. And the problem, of course, and this is the problem with the administration overall. Everything seems to be done in secret, even things that don't appear to have the same kind of ramifications...

ROBERTS: Jack, this is the highest classified program we've got.

REED: I'm talking about other programs that aren't as classified. It's this culture of secrecy. And that I think is hurting the president.

BLITZER: We're going to continue this discussion...

ROBERTS: Well, nothing is secret anymore.

BLITZER: Well, there's plenty of secrets out there, but...

ROBERTS: Nothing is protected that somebody doesn't leak, there's some special-interest group doesn't go to the major media. It's absolutely remarkable that we have nothing classified.

BLITZER: Senators...

REED: Well, I think you're being a little bit -- overstating the point. There are some classified information. In fact, this administration classifies materials, keeps it from the Congress, that we should have. Senator Levin and others have been asking for material with respect to many different programs, and we've been told point-blank...

ROBERTS: Senator Levin has that material on the intelligence committee.

REED: Well, I'm talking about issues with respect to armed services, memoranda with respect to policies towards detention of al Qaida elements and other elements in Iraq.

ROBERTS: I'm very familiar with those. We got briefed on it in the intel committee, where it should be, not on the front pages.

REED: It shouldn't be on the front page. But we should have access within classified systems of information. And that access has been constrained mightily by this administration.

BLITZER: Good discussion. Senators, thanks to both of you for joining us. Senator Roberts, Senator Reed.

ROBERTS: Thanks, Wolf.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Coming up, Iraq at a critical crossroads. What will it take to bring the country's political factions together? My conversation with Iraq's Kurdish representative to the U.S.,

Qubad Talabany. That's coming up. Up next, though, a quick check of what's in the news right now. Stay with "Late Edition."

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington.

He is the country's Kurdish representative to the United States -- Iraq's Kurdish representative to the United States is Qubad Talabany.

His father is Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani. He's joining us here on "Late Edition."

Qubad, thanks very much for joining us.

I want to talk about a lot of issues. But Reuters is moving a very disturbing story right now from Iraq, from Erbil.

A Kurdish writer was sentenced to one and a half years on prison on Sunday for defaming the Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani.

We've heard a lot about an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity and has now been sentenced to death. But is it true that, in your part of Kurdistan, in northern Iraq, someone is being sentenced to jail for defaming the Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani?

QUBAD TALABANY, IRAQI KURDISTAN'S REPRESENTATIVE TO THE UNITED STATES: The event happened. Mr. Kamal Sayid Qadir was initially sentenced to 30 years, but after an appeals court today, that sentence was reduced to one and a half years. And we're being told that after the legalities are over and done with, that the president of the Kurdistan region, Massoud Barzani will issue a pardon and have Mr. Sayid Qadir released from detention.

BLITZER: So he won't serve any time in jail?

TALABANY: He won't serve any time.

BLITZER: He's in jail right now?

TALABANY: He's in jail right now. He served a few months while his appeals process was going through. But, really, what happened was that it went through a legal process. It went through certain laws that -- maybe it's time to revise certain laws within the Kurdistan region.

BLITZER: Because to Western audiences, this sounds outrageous that, in an emerging democracy, someone goes to jail for criticizing a politician.

TALABANY: Right. Well, we are an emerging democracy. And we still need to revise some of our laws. We need to improve on our institutions. And this is an area that I think we will certainly need to focus more on, the issues of civil liberties and freedom of speech.

But the whole process has been a legal process. It's been a judicial process. And the president of the Kurdistan region will likely issue a pardon.

BLITZER: So you're free to announce that now that he's going to be released from jail?
TALABANY: Yes.

BLITZER: All right, let's move on and talk about the government in Iraq. Your father's the president of Iraq, Jalal Talabani.

Ibrahim al-Jaafari -- is he someone that should be the next prime minister? He's the acting prime minister right now. Do the Kurdish factions in the parliament support Ibrahim Al-Jaafari?

TALABANY: The Kurdistan regional national assembly does not support Mr. Jaafari's nomination. And we don't want to personalize the issue. Dr. Jaafari is a smart man; he's a brave Iraqi patriot who's been in the opposition for many, many years.

But we're feeling that, given the state that the country is in right now, given the polarization of Iraqi society, the country requires a leader that can bring about national unity and can truly lead a national unity government.

BLITZER: Who's that?

TALABANY: We're not quite sure yet, but this is the discussions that are ongoing.

BLITZER: Who's someone that would be acceptable to the Kurdish factions?

TALABANY: It's -- you know, it's not about personalities here. We need to sit down, look at the various lists of candidates. We need to find out what their policies are.

We need to find out their track history and their records. And this is something that is required, a consultative process with all of the different communities because, ultimately, we need to find a candidate that has consensus among the different communities. It's not just what we say.

BLITZER: Do you want to give us some names?

TALABANY: I would rather not give names. I think this is a process that's going on behind closed doors. And putting people's names out in the forefront could jeopardize their chances.

BLITZER: Listen to what the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said on March 17. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ZALMAY KHALILZAD, U.S. AMBASSADOR TO IRAQ: An important point from our point of view is that the prime minister should be someone who can unify Iraq, the various ethnic and sectarian groups, because the problem is the polarization.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: He seems to be suggesting that Ibrahim al-Jaafari is not the right guy either. But at this point, it doesn't look like there's going to be a national unity government any time soon.

TALABANY: Progress has been made, Wolf. There's been intense discussions going on over the last few weeks. We've made some good progress on the kinds of processes that we need to set in place where decisions can be made with all of the different communities being part of those decisions.

An important step was approved recently in the formation of this national security council in Iraq where different community leaders, as well as the presidency council and the prime minister and the deputy prime ministers, will decide on issues of national security together.

So we are making progress. The discussions are heated. But we're confident that soon we'll have a national unity government.

BLITZER: Let me read to you from a New York Times piece on Thursday: "Kurdistan may be part of Iraq in the legal sense, but most Kurds view the Arabs, whether Sunni or Shiite, as foreign oppressors. The fact that the Arabs are now fighting among themselves evokes little sympathy... the prospect of a civil war makes many Kurds yearn all the more fiercely for separate national status. Some even say such a war might help them make their case."

Do you want to respond to that?

TALABANY: It's no surprise that the people of Kurdistan yearn for independence. And it's no surprise, given the history of the Kurds of Iraq that they feel somewhat suspicious and scared about the developments that are going on in Iraq.

We have to be, in my opinion, prepared for every eventuality in Iraq. The Kurdish leadership has committed itself to ensuring that Iraq remains a viable federal state.

But at the same time, if the situation worsens and the state fails, which, heaven forbid, we hope that it doesn't fail, but if it does fail, then the Kurdistan region has to be able to adapt to every eventuality.

BLITZER: Qubad Talabany, you've got a tough mission ahead of you. Thanks very much for joining us.

TALABANY: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: And coming up, I visited Dubai at the height of the ports controversy, but with the deal now dead in the water, where do things stand between the United States and the United Arab Emirates? We'll hear from the UAE's economic adviser, Sheikha Lubna al-Qasimi.

But first this.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER (voice over): Tammy Duckworth: What's her story? The Iraq war veteran narrowly won her primary bid to run for the U.S. House of Representatives this week.

Duckworth, a Democrat, is vying for retiring House member Henry Hyde's seat in an historically Republican district near Chicago. Duckworth lost both her legs in combat when the Blackhawk helicopter she was piloting was hit by a grenade fired by insurgents.

Duckworth has been critical of the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq, advocating for better care of wounded veterans.

She's one of nine Iraq war vets running for Congress this year.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Welcome back. The initial smoke may be clearing from the Dubai Ports deal collapse, but did the controversy cause some irreparable damage to U.S. interests in the Middle East, as well as relations with a key U.S. ally in the war on terror?

I spoke with the United Arab Emirates economic minister, Sheikha Lubna al-Qasimi, during her visit to Washington this week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Sheikha, thanks very much for joining us. We met in Dubai. Good to have you here in Washington. Honestly with our viewers, how much damage, if any, do you believe has resulted from the collapse of the Dubai Ports deal in terms of the overall U.S. relationship with the United Arab Emirates?

AL-QASIMI: Well, first of all, I want to confirm to the audience that it's absolutely a very solid relationship. UAE has always been a great ally to the U.S. on different levels, and assure everybody that for us this was a business case that got politicized, but it doesn't have an impact on the relationship between the two governments.

BLITZER: So there's been no negative impact.

AL-QASIMI: Not at all.

BLITZER: What about the free trade area agreements that have been postponed?

AL-QASIMI: Yeah. Well, it's important to understand what postponement means. Because I think sometimes people think this has an implication, a consequence from the DPW case, but it's not. Usually between two rounds there are dialogue, video conferencing or meetings between the different teams.

What happened this time that a lot of us did not finish on time for the round. So on my visit here, I actually met with Ambassador Portman and John Donnelly (ph), and we pretty much set the new dates that are upcoming, and we discussed any issues between the two sides on the free trade agreement. BLITZER: The president of the National U.S. Arab Chamber of Commerce said this earlier in the month: Capital is a coward. If foreign investors see that they can play by the rules, win fair and square and then have to go to Congress to deal with domestic political considerations, most international investors will take their money elsewhere."

Will Dubai, the United Arab Emirates, which has a lot of money, take their investments and potential jobs here in the United States outside of the United States and stop investing, basically, in the United States where a lot of jobs are at stake?

AL-QASIMI: No. Because let's first pretty much explain the trade position of the UAE. UAE's the third largest trade partner of the U.S. in the Middle East after Saudi Arabia and Israel. And this has evolved and developed over the years, so it's not something new. Many of the contracts that actually have taken place, Boeing is a great example of that, $20 billion worth of...

BLITZER: You're buying Boeing 777s.

AL-QASIMI: Yes.

BLITZER: A huge contract.

AL-QASIMI: Yes.

BLITZER: Let me press on you this point because there's some suspicious now the next phase, you're not going to buy any more Boeings, you're going to Airbus because you're angry at the United States.

AL-QASIMI: No. I think every contract is actually being evaluated on merits of its own. I want to remind everyone that post- September 11, the largest purchase of Boeing was actually done by Emirate Airlines, the United Arab Emirates. So, that to me is a good example that for us business is business, and it will continue to be that way.

BLITZER: The issue for Americans, of course, is a lot of aerospace jobs in Washington State and elsewhere are at stake, assuming that the United Arab Emirates and Dubai are going to go ahead and buy a lot more U.S.-made planes.

AL-QASIMI: Well, I think it's very important to understand that foreign investments, a lot of foreign companies who establish businesses here, in many ways continue and contribute in the economy within a country. For every billion dollars you actually generate 10,000 employments here in the U.S., and this actually comes across many contracts, not just Boeing.

BLITZER: Will the U.S./UAE military strategic relationship be damaged at all? As you know, the U.S. Navy uses the ports in Dubai more than any other ports outside the United States. There are U.S. air bases that are in the United Arab Emirates. Is there going to be any impact on this military to military relationship? AL-QASIMI: No. Not at all. I think it's very important to understand, on both sides, we need each other. Therefore, you can't jeopardize a relationship over decades because of an incident. The environment in the Middle East is a challenging one and a trying one, and there is need on both sides, on the U.S. and UAE, to continue this relationship on the military aspect.

BLITZER: Let's...

AL-QASIMI: There are 600 calls per year on the U.S. Navy of the Emirates. And this is the most frequent foreign port of call outside the USA.

BLITZER: You just saw the aircraft carrier the Ronald Reagan in Dubai.

AL-QASIMI: Yes, Ronald Reagan.

BLITZER: Here's what the 9-11 Commission report said, and I want to clarify where you stand today on this matter: "The United Arab Emirates, the financial center for the Gulf area, also had a reputation for being wide open with few regulations on the control of money and a woefully inadequate anti-money laundering program. The vast majority of the money funding the September 11 attacks flowed through the UAE."

That's what the 9-11 Commission report said.

AL-QASIMI: Yeah. I'm hopeful also they mentioned that money laundering had gone through 96 countries, because we are...

BLITZER: But they said the vast majority went through your country.

AL-QASIMI: This is because of the structure of hawala (ph), the personal transfers. And as we stand today, UAE stands as a good benchmark, actually, in the acts against money laundering, with a lot of work and development between the constituencies, the organization within the U.S. and the UAE.

BLITZER: Are you funneling charitable contributions to Hamas, Hezbollah, groups the State Department deems to be terrorist organizations?

AL-QASIMI: First, let's clarify one thing. There is no cash handover in any form or shape within the Emirates going anywhere else. Usually in support of people. For example, the Palestinians, and this is in tune of the policy of the U.S. government itself. We have projects, usually we develop hospitals, roads, accommodations for people, but any money that goes through for any particular reason, actually, for example, in Palestine, gets scrutinized through the Israeli authorities because that's part of the system.

BLITZER: Because the argument is, just as Saddam Hussein gave $25,000 to families of so-called Palestinian martyrs, suicide bombers, the argument is the UAE may be doing the same thing, in effect giving money to families of what they call martyrs.

AL-QASIMI: UAE actually frowns and stands against suicide bombers and doesn't give a single dollar to, or a penny to any of these families because it's against the policy -- not only the policy, but the philosophy of the UAE itself. So there's no money that goes through. We work through NGOs like the Red Crescent.

And in this process, we only work through projects. There's no money at all. And iff there's any money of some form or shape, it actually goes through the process of Israeli clarification and approval before it gets to the -- you know, there's a joint effort between the Palestinian entities and the Israelis for any of this process.

BLITZER: Sheikha Lubna al-Qasimi, welcome to Washington. Good to have you here in "The Situation Room."

AL-QASIMI: Thank you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And up next, the results of our Web question of the week, "How big of a threat is Iran to the United States?"

Plus, in case you missed it, we'll have the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States.

Also ahead, for our north American viewers, CNN reporters are "On the Story," including our senior international correspondent, Nic Robertson, looking at how Iraqis are struggling to get on with their lives despite the insurgency and the sectarian violence.

All that coming up on "On the Story" at the top of the hour. Don't miss it. Stay with us.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States.

On ABC's "This Week," Republican Senator Arlen Specter and Republican Congressman Tom Tancredo debated immigration reform.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R-PA) CHMN., JUDICIARY COMMITTEE: If we do not have some realistic proposal to give them an opportunity to work lawfully and ultimately to obtain citizenship, then they're going to be fugitives.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. TOM TANCREDO (R) COLORADO: When you reward millions and millions of people, which Senator Specter's bill does do, for coming across the border the wrong way, doing it illegally, then you -- it's a slap in the face to every single person who has done it the right way.
(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On "Fox News Sunday," the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin, offered a tough assessment of the political situation for Iraq.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. CARL LEVIN (D-MI) ARMED SERVICES CMTE.: I asked the president to make it clear to the Iraqis that our continued presence in Iraq is dependent upon the Iraqis working out a broad-based political agreement.

Otherwise, they're going to continue to get the message, which this administration has given too often, that we're there as long as they need us.

CHRIS WALLACE, HOST, "FOX NEWS SUNDAY": Would you set a specific deadline?

LEVIN: I would not. I would put the word "prompt" in there.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On CBS's "Face the Nation," Democratic Senator Ted Kennedy said the U.S.-led invasion of Iraqi derailed the war on terror.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. EDWARD KENNEDY (D) MASSACHUSETTS: I don't believe the world is safer today as a result of our going into Iraq. I think Iraq is a rallying cry for Al Qaida.

I think we should have given the focus and attention onto Afghanistan. And I think that that's where we should have given our focus.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On NBC's "Meet the Press," the noted political analyst Charlie Cook challenged the notion that Democrats should be offering alternative proposals to President Bush and the Republicans.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CHARLIE COOK, COOK POLITICAL REPORT: Minority parties don't have to be responsible. That's the one good thing going for them.

And when they try to be responsible, they're just going to dig themselves into a hole. I mean, your job is to throw rocks. Once you start offering alternatives, then suddenly you're playing defense as well. (END VIDEO CLIP) BLITZER: Highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States on "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

Our "Late Edition" Web question asked this: "How big of a threat is Iran to the United States?"

Take a look at this. Here's how you voted. Fourteen percent said an immediate threat; 34 percent said a long-term threat; 52 percent said not a threat. Remember, though, this is not, repeat not, a scientific poll.

Let's check what's on the cover of this week's major newsmagazines in the United States.

Time Magazine warns, "Be Worried, Very Worried" about global warming.

U.S. News & World Report explores the world's first cancer vaccines.

That's your "Late Edition" for this Sunday, March 26. Please be sure to join us again next Sunday and every Sunday at 11:00 a.m. Eastern for the last word in Sunday talk.

I'm in "The Situation Room" here on CNN, Monday through Friday, from 4:00 p.m. to 6:00 p.m. Eastern; back at 7:00 p.m. Eastern.

Medical Marijuana Battle Back In The Courtroom

SAN FRANCISCO -- Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed.

This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue.

The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right to life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain.

It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 mostly Western states authorizing medical marijuana.

"A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering," said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case.

The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite.

"She'd probably be dead without marijuana," said her doctor, Frank Lucido, who has recommended marijuana for some 3,000 patients. "Nothing else works."

The Bush administration says the lawsuit is without merit.

"There is no fundamental right to distribute, cultivate or possess marijuana," Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan, the government's lead medical marijuana attorney, wrote to the appeals court.

Voters in 1996 made California the first state to authorize patients to use marijuana with a doctor's recommendation. Ten other states have since followed suit, but the federal government says there is no medical value to the drug.

In 2001, the Supreme Court ruled that Raich's supplier, the Oakland Cannabis Buyer's Cooperative, could not lawfully dispense marijuana despite California voters approving its medical use.

Two years later, in a small victory for medical marijuana backers, the high court let stand a 9th Circuit decision saying doctors have a First Amendment right to discuss or recommend the drug to patients without the threat of federal sanctions.

But last June, the Supreme Court ruled the federal government could prosecute medical marijuana users and their suppliers.

In some states, federal agents have been sporadically arresting users and raiding so-called pot clubs that dole out the drug to patients.

Still, a footnote by Justice Clarence Thomas in his 2001 ruling left the legal questions surrounding medical marijuana unsettled and helped open the door to Monday's 9th Circuit hearing.

Thomas wrote that important underlying constitutional questions remain unresolved, such as Congress' ability to interfere with states experimenting with their own laws and whether Americans have a fundamental right to marijuana as a vehicle to stay alive and ease pain.

The justices answered the first part of that footnote in June, ruling in another case brought by Raich that patients living in states with medical marijuana laws could be prosecuted because Congress has classified marijuana as an illegal controlled substance.

That prompted Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., and Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., to propose legislation that would have blocked the Justice Department from prosecuting medical marijuana users in states where it is legal. The House balked at the measure 264-161. A Hinchey spokesman said the congressman will resurrect the proposal this summer.

Raich is back before the 9th Circuit, one step short of the Supreme Court, in a bid to settle the second part of Thomas' footnote.

Her lawyer, Barnett, is arguing the Constitution guarantees the gravely ill a right to available medication to keep them alive and relieve torturous pain.

Even if it is successful, the case would be unlikely to stop the raids on pot clubs or protect most users and suppliers. Raich herself was arrested last week for disorderly conduct after she demonstrated outside the Oakland federal courthouse over a recent raid on a medical marijuana dispensary.

Regardless of the outcome of her case, she said she will continue using marijuana to treat her symptoms, and will keep fighting to do so without the threat or fear of federal prosecution. She expects her case to go to the Supreme Court no matter the outcome.

"I am going to keep doing this until they stop me because this is not a medical cannabis case but a right to life case," she said. "The federal government can say who can live and who can die if I lose in the Supreme Court."

Top court won't review anthrax libel ruling Staff and agencies

By James Vicini

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court on Monday allowed former U.S. Army scientist Steven Hatfill to proceed with his libel lawsuit against The New York Times Co. over columns he said implicated him in the 2001 anthrax killings.

The justices refused to review a U.S. appeals court ruling that reinstated the lawsuit, which claimed that columns by Nicholas Kristof published by the newspaper in 2002 defamed Hatfill and caused him emotional distress.

Hatfill, a bioterrorism expert who formerly worked at the Army Medical Institute of Infectious Disease at Fort Detrick in Maryland, has denied any involvement in the mailing of anthrax-laced letters that killed five people in the weeks after the September 11 hijackings and heightened concerns that America was under attack.

In 2002, federal law enforcement officials, including Attorney General John Ashcroft , called Hatfill a "person of interest" in the investigation into who sent the letters to members of Congress and the news media.

Hatfill, whose home in Maryland was searched by the FBI , never was charged with any crime in the anthrax attacks, which remain unsolved.

Attorneys for the Times argued the appeals court‘s ruling imposed substantial burdens on freedom of speech and of the press and would inhibit criticism of the government about matters of public concern.

The columns criticized the FBI‘s "inept" and "lackadaisical" handling of the investigation and expressed the view that the missteps had made the nation significantly more vulnerable to a potential bioterrorism attack.

The Times‘ attorneys also told the Supreme Court that the decision would invite additional litigation and require news organizations to defend claims that previously would not have been filed or would have been dismissed at the outset.

More than 30 news media companies and groups supported the appeal and said the Supreme Court should adopt a general rule protecting the press from liability for accurately reporting on government investigations.

Attorneys for Hatfill opposed the appeal and said the case did not warrant Supreme Court review. They said the appeals court applied settled law to the specific facts of the case.

The Supreme Court rejected the appeal without any comment or recorded dissent.

Hatfill sued the Times in federal court in Alexandria, Virginia, where a federal judge initially dismissed the lawsuit. The high court‘s rejection of the Times‘ appeal cleared the way for the case to go back to the judge for more proceedings.

Detainee Case Will Pose Delicate Question for Court

By LINDA GREENHOUSE

WASHINGTON, March 26 — The Supreme Court's announcement four months ago that it would rule on the validity of the military commission by which the Bush administration wants to try Osama bin Laden's former driver, on charges of conspiracy to commit terrorism, appeared to mark a resumption of a struggle for supremacy between the court and the White House.

That struggle initially played out in three cases on terrorism and civil liberties in June 2004. In accepting the new case, as in the previous ones, the justices rejected the administration's argument that the court should simply stay out and let the president conduct his fight against terrorism unconstrained by judicial oversight.

But no one foresaw back in November that the case of the driver, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, to be argued on Tuesday, would present the Supreme Court with an additional and perhaps even greater challenge.

In the face of a measure that Congress passed and President Bush signed into law in late December to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over cases brought by detainees at the United States naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where Mr. Hamdan has been held since 2002, the court must decide whether it retains the right to proceed with this case at all.

For a court that has been highly protective of its own prerogatives, but at the same time notably attentive to the often arcane limits on federal court jurisdiction, the question is one of great delicacy, infused with historical resonance. Not since the immediate aftermath of the Civil War, in a case that arose from the power struggles of the Reconstruction era, has the Supreme Court permitted Congress to divest it of jurisdiction over a case it has already agreed to decide.

In that case, Ex Parte McCardle, the court had already heard four days of argument in an appeal brought by a rabble-rousing Mississippi newspaper editor who had been taken into custody and charged by the military government with fomenting insurrection.

Fearful that a Supreme Court ruling in favor of the editor, William H. McCardle, could result in invalidating military control of the former Confederate states, Congress enacted a law over President Andrew Johnson's veto to deprive the court of jurisdiction. The court then dismissed the appeal, rejecting the argument by McCardle's lawyer that it was permitting Congress to usurp the judicial function.

In the new case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184, the Bush administration filed a motion with the court in early January, days after the Detainee Treatment Act was signed into law, urging immediate dismissal of Mr. Hamdan's appeal.

"It is well settled that statutes that remove jurisdiction apply to pending cases and ordinarily should be given immediate effect," the administration, citing the McCardle case, said in the brief accompanying its motion.

More than a month later, on Feb. 21, the court declined to act on the motion, announcing instead that it would take up the jurisdictional question as part of the argument on the merits of the case. It added 30 minutes to Tuesday's argument, originally scheduled for one hour, for that purpose.

The McCardle case has been seen by many modern legal scholars as problematic, a regrettable expression of judicial weakness. Mr. Hamdan's lawyers cite it as well, but for a different proposition. While Congress spoke clearly in the court-stripping amendment at issue in the McCardle case, their brief tells the court, the Detainee Treatment Act is ambiguous on its application to pending, as opposed to future, cases. The court should interpret the act as not applying to the Hamdan case to avoid the "grave constitutional questions" that would otherwise arise, they say.

A group of law professors who filed a brief on this point on Mr. Hamdan's behalf warn the court that to give up jurisdiction would be to yield to "an unconstitutional interference with access to courts and an attack on the fundamental structure of the Constitution."

The argument rests in part on the observation that according to the language of the Detainee Treatment Act, Guantánamo detainees who are tried by a military commission will have only a circumscribed right to a subsequent appeal in federal court, in which they could not raise the basic challenge to the commission's operation that Mr. Hamdan is presenting in his Supreme Court case. So if the justices cannot decide his case, or cases brought by some 150 of the other 500 Guantánamo detainees now pending in the lower courts, fundamental questions about this alternative system of justice will go unresolved.

There may be a separate obstacle in the Supreme Court's way. Only eight justices are participating in the case, raising the prospect of a 4-to-4 tie. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is recused because he was a member of the three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that upheld the government's position in the Hamdan case last July, four days before Mr. Bush nominated him to the Supreme Court.

A tie vote in the Supreme Court ordinarily simply affirms the lower court decision, without issuing an opinion or setting a precedent. But in this case, there is no lower court opinion on the jurisdictional question, since there was no Detainee Treatment Act when the appeals court ruled last July.

It would require a majority, five of the eight votes, to grant the government's motion to dismiss the case, but the matter might not be as straightforward as that. Even if the government had not filed its motion, the court would still be obliged to assure itself that it has jurisdiction to proceed, in this as in any other case. Whether a tie favors jurisdiction or dismissal appears to be an open question of Supreme Court procedure.

Military commissions are not new; they were first used by Gen. Winfield Scott during the war with Mexico in the 1840's. But there have been none since the World War II era. If the court addresses the merits of the Hamdan case, it must decide whether Mr. Bush's military order of Nov. 13, 2001, establishing military commissions to try noncitizens for "acts of international terrorism," had proper authorization.

The administration argues that there were "multiple authorizations": from the Congressional resolution known as the Authorization for the Use of Military Force, adopted days after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001; from the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which refers to military commissions and authorizes the president to prescribe rules for their operation; and from the president's inherent powers as commander in chief.

In addition, the administration argues that the Detainee Treatment Act itself ratified the establishment of military commissions when it circumscribed judicial review of their operations.

Mr. Hamdan's military and civilian lawyers, as well as the dozens of organizations and individuals supporting his appeal as "friends of the court," argue to the contrary that no Congressional enactment or inherent power authorized the president to set up what they call a "jerrybuilt tribunal" that falls short of the procedural protections offered by American military law and required by the Geneva Conventions.

In addition, they argue, conspiracy, with which Mr. Hamdan has been charged, is not a war crime and is therefore not subject to trial by military commission.

The administration argues that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to the conflict with Al Qaeda and that their protections cannot, in any event, be invoked by individual detainees. These assertions have provoked a flood of counterarguments from international law specialists, former senior diplomats and federal judges, and human rights organizations.

Analysis: Hamdan and the prospects of tie votes

Posted by Lyle Denniston at 10:37 PM

On Tuesday morning, at 11 o'clock or a few minutes after, Chief Justice John G. Roberts, Jr., is expected to rise from the bench, and depart from the courtroom. He has taken himself out of every preliminary action on the war-on-terrorism case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (05-184), so that is expected to continue Tuesday. But his departure raises at least the possibility that the other eight Justices might cast a 4-4 tie vote.

If such a vote comes on the merits, the result will be clear-cut: the Court will have upheld a decision by the D.C. Circuit Court finding no legal defect in ithe war crimes tribunals called "military commissions." In that event, no precedent would be set, and the Justices will issue no opinion. Still, that would mean that foreign nationals facing war crimes charges would be tried under the system the Pentagon now has in place and ready at the detainee prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. If any were then convicted in such a proceeding, they presumably could attempt to bring some kind of challenge in federal courts, although the scope of that kind of review s in doubt.

But before an eight-Justice Court could rule on the merits in the Hamdan case, it must first satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction to hear and decide that dispute. The Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear appeals is not open-ended, so a threshold issue in any case is whether a given lawsuit can, indeed, be decided there. Suppose, though, that the Justices split 4-4 on this issue in Hamdan. What then? The result is not as clear as it would be if the Court proceeded to the merits, and split 4-4.

The jurisdictional question is a more-than-routine issue in the Hamdan case. Congress late last year passed the Detainee Treatment Act, and the Bush Administration is arguing that the Act stripped all courts -- including the Supreme Court -- of jurisdiction to rule on any pending habeas challenge by any Guantanamo detainee. Salim Ahmed Hamdan's lawyers, and attorneys for other detainees, dispute that interpretation, and argue that there pre-existing habeas cases should go forward.

This issue has arisen only since the Court agreed to hear the Hamdan case, so there is no lower court ruling on that point being reviewed by the Justices. Thus, were the Justices to divide 4-4, the question arises: does that establish jurisdiction, does it deny jurisdiction, or might it lead to some other outcome?

When the Court is asked to review a direct appeal, only four votes are necessary to find "probable jurisdiction." (When a case reaches the Court via a petition for certiorari, four votes are needed to grant review; noting probable jurisdiction thus is rather like granting certiorari.) But when probable jurisdiction is noted on an appeal, that is not a final decision on the question of jurisdiction; the Court is entirely free to reexamine the jurisdictional question when it moves ahead with its review of an appeal In view of that, would the Court find jurisdiction in Hamdan with only four votes in favor of that, if that is disputed by four other Justices? There appears to be no precedent to provide an answer.

On the other hand, deciding a direct challenge to jurisdiction, based on a motion to dismiss under a specific jurisdictional statute, may be thought of as akin to deciding the merits of a case. Thus, it may take a clear majority among eight Justices -- five -- to resolve the issue in favor of jurisdiction. If that is true, a 4-4 vote could mean that the Court has not affirmatively found jurisdiction, and therefore it does not exist. Again, there seems to be no precedent.

The Court in recent years, when it has found it lacks jurisdiction of a pending case, has been in the habit of simply dismissing it without giving any specifics on why it thought jurisdiction did not exist. Would it do that if, in Hamdan, it split 4-4, and the Court then dismissed the case? A lack of an explanation would be a way out of a procedural dilemma, but a frustrating one.

Perhaps there are other options. One for example, would to be return the Hamdan case to the D.C. Circuit Court, with instructions to decide the jurisdictional question as it applies to the war crimes tribunals.. (In fact, the D.C. Circuit is already examining on its own the impact of the Detainee Treatment Act on two packets of pending Guantanamo detainee appeals not pending there, but not involving war crimes defendants.) Should the D.C. Circuit find it had no jurisdiction, the case could then return to the Supreme Court. Would Roberts be able to participate then, at least on the jurisdictional question, since he had not taken part in the Circuit Court ruling on that issue? It would seem a bit awkward.

Maybe another option in the event of a 4-4 tie would be simply to sit on the Hamdan case, without a decision on jurisdiction -- indeed, without any decision at all -- and wait until the D.C. Circuit has ruled on the detainee law's impact on the different cases already there. Then, any appeal to the Supreme Court could be heard by all nine Justices, since Roberts would not have taken part in this process at the Circuit Court. A ruling on the jurisdictional issue could then control jurisdiction on Hamdan's appeal.

America Seeking To Block Appeal Of Two Chinese at Guantanamo

BY JOSH GERSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

The Bush administration is asking the Supreme Court to refuse to hear an unusual petition brought by two Muslims from China who are being held at Guantanamo Bay despite the American military's determination that the pair pose no threat to America.

The men, members of the Uighur community native to western China, have picked up some surprising support in their quest for freedom, most notably from a former FBI director known as a conservative no-nonsense lawman, William Sessions.

According to the government's court filings, Abu Bakker Qassim and Adel Abdu' Al-Hakim received weapons training at a Taliban-supplied camp near Tora Bora, Afghanistan, prior to the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

As military action intensified in the region, the men are said to have fled to Pakistan, where they were captured and taken to an American base in Afghanistan. In 2002, American forces deemed the two men to be "enemy combatants" and flew them to Guantanamo.

A year ago, a military tribunal formally determined that Messrs. Qassim and Al-Hakim were no longer enemy combatants. Lawyers for the men contend the military made that determination in 2003.

However, the pair has remained at Guantanamo, because they object to being returned to China, and American authorities will not admit them to this country. The pair contends they are likely to be tortured if returned to China, which has a history of harsh treatment of Uighur militants.

In a new filing with the Supreme Court, the government argues it is engaged in "substantial ongoing diplomatic efforts to transfer them to an appropriate country."

An attorney for the men, Sabin Willett, said in an interview yesterday that the men are caught in legal limbo, with no country willing to accept them.

"These guys have been there at least three years with our government saying our government is trying to resettle them," Mr. Willett complained. "We've spent a lot of money telling the world that Guantanamo is full of terrorists. Now, the world believes us and nobody wants them."

Aside from the pair involved in the litigation, at least five other Uighurs have been deemed releasable by the military and are still being detained, Mr. Willett said. He estimated 23 Muslims from China are jailed at Guantanamo.

In December, Judge James Robertson issued a ruling that found the continuing detention of Messrs. Qassim and Al-Hakim to be illegal. The judge also blasted as "Kafka-esque" the government's use of the term "no longer enemy combatants" to describe their status.

However, Judge Robertson ultimately found it was impractical to release the men on a military base and that bringing them to America "would have national security and diplomatic implications beyond the competence or the authority of this court."

"I find that a federal court has no relief to offer," the judge wrote.

Lawyers for the two men appealed to a federal appeals court in Washington, which is scheduled to hear arguments in the case in May. Six retired federal judges filed a friend-of-the-court brief last month arguing that the Uighurs are being treated unfairly.

"The injustice petitioners continue to suffer is of the gravest kind," the brief filed by the former judges said. "The district court's failure to provide a remedy for petitioners' unlawful detention is inconsistent with the well settled understanding of the function of habeas corpus and the judicial role in ensuring the separation of powers."

Some of the ex-judges who signed the brief have backed other challenges to the treatment of prisoners at Guantanamo. A Newark-based law firm led by a former 3rd circuit judge on the brief, John Gibbons, has represented the American Civil Liberties Union in a lawsuit seeking documents that expose what the ACLU calls "torture" at Guantanamo and in Iraq.

The presence on the brief of Mr. Sessions, appointed FBI director by President Reagan and fired by President Clinton, comes as something of a surprise. Mr. Sessions, reached at his Washington home yesterday, declined to comment.

While the appeal is pending, the prisoners' legal team has also asked the Supreme Court to take up the case immediately.

In a Supreme Court filing posted Friday on the Justice Department Web site, government lawyers stated their opposition to that extraordinary review, which is rarely granted. The Justice Department noted that after World War II and the Korean War, tens of thousands of prisoners-of-war refused to return to their countries. The contention that detaining such prisoners is illegal is "contrary to both history and logic," government lawyers said.

The government also said the men are being treated well at Guantanamo and have access to an exercise yard, soccer, volleyball, and ping pong equipment, showers, air conditioning "which they control," and a television with a DVD and VCR.

There seems little dispute between the parties that the Uighurs could be in danger if returned to China. The State Department's most recent report on human rights is replete with claims that Muslims in China's western Xinjiang province are subjected to repression.

"The Chinese have already threatened to do them harm," Mr. Willett said, noting that Chinese officials flew to Guantanamo to interrogate Uighur prisoners in 2002. "The Chinese have branded these guys as terrorists. They have a history of putting Uighurs into prison, where they are never heard from again."

The new Justice Department brief said the men will not be sent back to China because of a treaty America has ratified which forbids the return of persons to countries where they are likely to be tortured.

The outcome of the Uighurs' legal challenge could turn in part on another Guantanamo-related case the Supreme Court is to take up tomorrow, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. A key question in that dispute is whether a law passed last year, the Detainee Treatment Act, was intended to toss out all pending litigation brought by Guantanamo prisoners, or just to limit cases filed in the future.

News reports over the weekend raised questions about whether Justice Scalia should recuse himself from the case involving Salim Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden.

A report Saturday on a Supreme Court-related blog,Scotusblog.com, and another yesterday in Newsweek magazine, noted that Justice Scalia delivered a speech in Switzerland earlier this month in which he appeared to argue vigorously against trials for Guantanamo detainees. "I am not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean it's crazy," Justice Scalia said in the speech, which was videotaped and posted on the Web.

There was no indication yesterday that counsel for Mr. Hamdan plan to ask Justice Scalia to recuse himself. Chief Justice Roberts has already done so because he ruled on the case while serving as an appeals court judge.

Librarians Continuing to Battle Even Revised USA Patriot Act

Alison Leigh Cowan The New York Times

The hotel ballroom was packed as a sensibly dressed, well-read crowd from around the country gathered in San Antonio on Jan. 21 to celebrate one of their own.

Yet, as many expected, the guest of honor was a no-show, despite the $500 intellectual freedom prize that awaited.

Attendees at an American Library Association gathering blamed Washington for the empty chair.

Lawmakers may be giving themselves credit for having improved safeguards on civil liberties when they reauthorized the nation's anti-terrorism law, otherwise known as the USA Patriot Act, but many civil liberties lawyers and librarians say the revisions did nothing to enable the guest of honor to take the stage and discuss the Patriot Act without risk of prosecution.

Known as John Doe in court filings, the guest of honor was the Connecticut librarian who was visited by the FBI last year and presented with what is known as a national security letter demanding patron records. The subpoena, issued as part of a counterterrorism investigation, not only barred him from disclosing the subject of the inquiry, but also forbade him and others at his place of work from ever discussing the letter or even acknowledge its receipt.

Though some 30,000 national security letters are issued a year without arousing public protest, the librarian was reluctant to comply because of professional ethics aimed at keeping library records confidential. On the advice of the American Civil Liberties Union, his employer went to court to challenge the constitutionality of the subpoena, the provisions of the Patriot Act that broadened the use of national security letters after Sept. 11, and the order permanently forbidding discussion of the FBI's demand.

As the Bush administration pushed for the act to be reauth-orized, a handful of Democratic and Republican lawmakers persuaded the White House to accept a compromise that placed library records beyond the reach of a national security letter if they were gathered by libraries operating in what many people understand to be their traditional roles.

The final bill also gave recipients of national security letters the explicit right to consult lawyers.

Some opponents of the new version of the Patriot Act are skeptical that the revisions will provide much protection against unwanted invasions of privacy or infringements on free speech.

"The revised law provides almost no protection whatsoever for libraries," said Ann Beeson, the ACLU\l "l" lawyer representing the organization that brought the suit\l "l" in Connecticut. "It's virtually meaningless."

The section of the new law that addresses "privacy protection for library patrons" states that library records are beyond the reach of national security letters so long as the library is not operating as an "electronic communication service." Elsewhere, that term is defined as "any service which provides to users thereof the ability to send or receive wire or electronic communications."

"A national security letter can be used to get any library record that is maintained via an electronic communication service," Beeson said. "That definitely includes Internet access and e-mail records and can also include patron borrowing records."

The new law does establish the recipient's right to challenge the nondisclosure orders that typically accompany national security letters and Section 215 requests. But the recipient would have to wait a year before raising the question anew if the government continued to assert the need for secrecy.

Beeson said a judge would be hard-pressed to rule against a government request to keep the information secret for reasons of national security.

In the Connecticut John Doe's case, she said, "nothing in the new law permits John Doe to disclose his identity."

Though government lawyers demanded that John Doe's identity be shielded in court filings, the government failed to completely conceal the name in court filings, which revealed the plaintiff to be the Library Connection of Windsor, Conn., a nonprofit organization that provides back-office services to some two dozen libraries in the Hartford area.

Eager to testify publicly about the Patriot Act, the group's officers won the right last summer to identify their organization as the recipient of a national security letter after Judge Janet C. Hall of U.S. District Court in Bridgeport found that the government had unjustly imposed a prior restraint on free speech.

But her decision was stayed while the government appealed, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit has yet to rule.

"I am rather appalled that our country's laws silence John Doe and require him to remain anonymous for standing by his professional ethics," Judith F. Krug, the executive director of the Freedom to Read Foundation, told the crowd in San Antonio.

Microsoft, Intel Battle Pfizer in Supreme Court EBay Case

(Bloomberg) -- The legal principle that almost scuttled the BlackBerry e-mail service is at the heart of a U.S. Supreme Court patent battle involving EBay Inc., pitting technology companies against drugmakers, with billions of dollars at stake.

The dispute revolves around whether patent holders are entitled to an almost-automatic court order to stop infringers from using their inventions. San Jose, California-based EBay, the world's largest Internet auctioneer, is appealing such an order that would force it to shut down a sales option accounting for a third of the $12 billion in goods sold on its Web site last year.

Microsoft Corp., the world's largest software maker, and Intel Corp., the world's largest semiconductor maker, are among companies supporting EBay. They say they are under siege from small patent owners who use the threat of those orders to seek high licensing fees. Arrayed against them are drugmakers including Pfizer Inc. and Johnson & Johnson, which counter that any lessening of that threat would reduce the value of their inventions.

The case, which is being argued before the justices March 29, ``potentially impacts every single company in the United States," says Brian Ferguson, a patent lawyer at McDermott, Will & Emery in Washington, who has clients on both sides of the debate. ``Intellectual property is becoming the most valuable asset for a company."

In the pharmaceutical industry alone, worldwide sales of drugs covered by patents reached $518 billion in 2004, with North America holding a 48 percent share of the market, according to Standard & Poor's.

Money Instead

The case centers on whether judges should have more authority to make patent owners accept money as an alternative to an order to shut down or change a product, especially when the patent owner doesn't use the invention itself.

Waterloo, Ontario-based Research In Motion Ltd., after losing a suit over its BlackBerry hand-held e-mail devices, paid NTP Inc. $612 million on March 3 to avoid an order to halt U.S. service and sales. Bermuda-based Tyco International Ltd.'s healthcare unit lost a patent suit and agreed in January to pay $330 million to avoid an order to stop selling machines that measure oxygen in blood.

In the EBay case, a jury found that the San Jose, California-based company's ``Buy It Now" service, which lets customers buy products at a set price instead of bidding in an auction, infringed a software patent owned by MercExchange LLC. A trial judge rejected a bid by MercExchange, based in Great Falls, Virginia, to force EBay to stop using the software.

Public Health

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, in Washington, reversed the judge's ruling, saying a finding of patent infringement should almost always lead to an order barring future violations. Shutdown orders should be denied only in rare cases, such as when an invention is needed to protect public health, the court said.

The case ``could have some meaningful impact" on EBay if it has to pay a large amount of money or change the way it does business, says Safa Rashtchy, a Piper Jaffray & Co. analyst in Palo Alto, California, who has a ``market perform" rating on EBay shares. ``It hasn't been a major overhang for the stock yet, but we'll be watching the outcome."

The Bush administration is backing MercExchange, saying in court papers that patent owners shouldn't be forced to license their inventions when they don't want to.

EBay says it isn't trying to deny patent owners the right to control the use of their inventions.

`Knee-Jerk Reaction'

``We think that if somebody has a valid patent that's infringed, they should in the vast majority of cases" get a shutdown order, says Emery Simon, counsel to the Business Software Alliance, a Washington trade group that filed court papers on EBay's behalf. ``But judges should look at all the relevant factors, including the impact on the company's business, and not do it as an automatic knee-jerk reaction."

The alliance represents companies including Redmond- Washington-based Microsoft, and Santa Clara, California-based Intel, as well as software maker Adobe Systems Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc., the world's biggest maker of computer-networking gear, both based in San Jose. Nokia Oyj, Time Warner Inc., Yahoo! Inc. and trade groups representing the securities and communications industries also filed briefs supporting EBay's stance.

On the other side are drugmakers including New York-based Pfizer, the world's largest, and New Brunswick, New Jersey-based Johnson & Johnson, which also makes Band-Aids and baby shampoo. Joining them are General Electric Co., Procter & Gamble Co., Qualcomm Inc., research universities such as the University of California and trade groups for the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries.

Generic Competition

Drugmakers view patent protection differently than technology companies because blockbuster drugs may be based on single patents held by manufacturers who fear generic competition, lawyers say. Drug and biotech companies, as well as universities, say strong patent protection is needed to encourage costly research to develop new products.

By contrast, devices such as computers may include thousands of patented inventions; a computer maker may prefer to pay a licensing fee to a patent holder rather than risk being forced by a judge to shut down an entire product line over a single component.

``When you have a product that's complex and you're operating in a patent thicket, you tend to have a lot of people who claim you're treading on their ground," says David Simon, Intel's chief intellectual property counsel. Why, he asks, should the holder of a single patent ``be able to shut us down?"

The case, which will be decided by July, is EBay v. MercExchange, 05-130.

Beebe Medical Center, doctors settle $1 million claim

By Henry J. Evans Jr.
Cape Gazette staff

Beebe Medical Center and two physicians who had a relationship with the hospital in the late 1990s have agreed to pay $1 million to settle a Medicare regulation dispute. The government announced the settlement Monday, March 20.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas E. McCann said the dispute was about an arrangement between the hospital and doctors Richard Caruso and Vinod Parasher, who performed procedures at the medical center rather than at a freestanding clinic they owned.

The investigation, which began in 1999, involved the U.S. Department of Health and Social Services, the Office of Inspector General and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Under the terms of the settlement, the hospital paid $800,000 and the doctors $100,000 each. McCann said the settlement represents approximately the amount the hospital and doctors received for services during the working relationship.

Federal investigators said the doctors were paid a fee by the hospital from Medicare reimbursements, in addition to money they received from the government for performing services.

McCann said the payments violated sections of the False Claims Act. The provision had gone into effect a year earlier and prohibited doctors from being paid for referring cases to hospitals where they had a financial relationship.

McCann said there is a substantial quantity of information to know in the rules and regulations controlling Medicare reimbursement. However, he said, the hospital and doctors had access to the necessary information. “They had the cart before the horse for nine months while working with a medical consultant,” McCann said.

Edmund “Dan” Lyons Jr., Caruso’s attorney said Medicare reimbursement laws are complex and his client

“tripped over the fine print.”

Lyons said it is important to note that the case does not involve fraud, the intent to commit fraud, procedures that had not been performed, procedures performed unnecessarily or falsifying information.

“This is a very technical area of law,” Lyons said Wednesday, March 22.

Beebe Medical Center President and CEO Jeffrey Fried said the hospital essentially gave up the money it would have made for performing the procedures.

He said the $800,000 settlement paid by the hospital comes off the medical center’s balance sheet. He said in anticipation of settling the dispute, the hospital had set aside the money.

Fried said the terms of the settlement offered by the government were fair, because there were no additional fines, penalties or fees.

“We’re just glad to put it behind us,” Fried said.

Whistleblowers motivated by anger

By Jim Ritchie

TRIBUNE-REVIEW

A former PennDOT manager's legal quest to recoup hundreds of thousands of dollars agency consultants allegedly bilked from taxpayers is rare in Western Pennsylvania.

Few Pennsylvanians pursue so-called whistleblowers cases even though changes to the federal False Claims Act enacted in 1986 make it easier to prove wrongdoing by government agencies, records show.

Retired construction manager William Arnold, 62, of South Strabane, Washington County, is one of the few Pennsylvanians pursuing such a case. His claim is pending against 14 companies he says overbilled PennDOT, his former employer for 30 years. He retired in 2004.

Arnold contends PennDOT consultants were permitted in 2000 and 2001 to overbill the agency with the approval of agency managers, who were guests at expensive golf outings and sports events hosted by those consulting companies, court records show.

In November, PennDOT agreed to pay $500,000 to settle Arnold's initial whistleblower lawsuit. Arnold claimed he was demoted after reporting more than $800,000 worth of overbilling by contractors to his bosses and state and federal investigators.

Another legal victory with the false claims lawsuit could be lucrative for Arnold.

A favorable legal ruling means Arnold would collect up to 25 percent of the money in question. The rest of the money would be returned to the U.S. Department of Transportation, which provides about 32 percent of PennDOT's budget. A loss means Arnold and his attorneys, James Ashton and Jon Pushinsky, would not be reimbursed for their legal expenses.

How much money is at stake is not known. Arnold's lawyers intend to determine how much money the consulting firms overbilled PennDOT, the lawsuit states.

The 14 consultants named in Arnold's claim include some of Pennsylvania's biggest contractors --- such as Mackin Engineering Co., of Robinson, and DMJM Harris, of New York. Neither company returned messages seeking comment about Arnold's claims.

The potential windfall for Arnold is just what some good-government experts envisioned. And some want to incorporate the federal legislation into Pennsylvania law.

"We spend a lot of dollars in this state and if somebody is spending those dollars fraudulently, this law would encourage people to step forward with some protection," said state Rep. George Kenney, R-Philadelphia. "Their lives are ruined once they step forward and it's a tough thing to take on."

Kenney has tried to get a law passed in Pennsylvania. His last attempt was House Bill 898 in 2003, which passed the House by a 197-0 vote but died in the Senate without a vote. Kenney plans to reintroduce a version this year.

"I think we passed it two or three times out of the House in the past," said Kenney, who chairs the House Health and Human Services Committee. "The insurance industry always seems to have a problem with it. But no one actually admits who's putting the death knell in it (in the Senate)."

That might change. The federal Government Deficit Reduction Act includes a provision that would give a state a greater share of False Claims Act receipts if it adopts a state version of the whistleblower law.

"This would set in state law a formula by which we could recover damages for abuse of taxpayer dollars," Kenney said. "Most states are moving this way because they see the federal government has done this and been successful."

Since 1986, more than 8,800 whistleblower lawsuits have been filed nationally.

Only three cases, worth about $18.9 million, have been settled in Pittsburgh since 1994, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington, D.C., nonprofit legal group. In the same period, 65 cases, worth about $2.3 billion, were settled in Philadelphia, the group said.

"It's an amazing fact that you have this sea of fraud that you're trying to drain with two garden hoses and it's not draining real fast," said Patrick Burns, spokesman for the group.

About 400 lawsuits are filed under the False Claims Act each year and the federal government joins about 100 of those cases annually, Burns said. The average whistleblower walks away with $60,000 after paying lawyers and taxes.

Only a few high profile cases each year return five- or six-figure penalties, he said.

"What really drives whistleblowers is anger that they were asked to participate in a fraud -- it's moral outrage," Burns said. "It's not the money that drives them. It's the anger."

The act protects the whistleblower by providing reinstatement and damages equal to twice the person's lost wages if he or she is fired after filing the lawsuit. Those provisions did not apply to Arnold, who claims retaliation occurred before he filed lawsuits.

"There's a lot of fraud that's going on and I think people are generally unaware of this federal False Claims Act and the protection in there for people to not get retaliated against," said Andrew Stone, a lawyer with Stone & Stone, Downtown. "There's literally a handful of people in this town who have heard of the False Claims Act."

Cases move slowly -- an average 38 months from start to finish -- and the amount of fraud exposed is small, the taxpayers group said.

Maker of body armor under fire

BY THOMAS MAIER
Newsday Staff Writer

In the bang-bang world of business, body armor magnate David H. Brooks knows how to take a shot.

In 1992, Brooks and his brother Jeffrey were investigated by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission for their part in an insider-trading scandal. The brothers agreed to pay a $405,000 fine, without admitting any wrongdoing.

That same year, Brooks began a new business: making body armor designed to help wearers survive a potentially deadly bullet. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, profits soared at DHB Industries in Westbury, spiked by the company's sale of about 900,000 bullet-resistant vests to the military for use in Iraq and Afghanistan. According to financial records, DHB's annual sales grew to $340 million as of last July, compared with $98 million three years earlier.

But in the past few months, Brooks' once-little-known, publicly traded company has become increasingly controversial, with his own actions and his bullet-shielding vests under fire.

Probes, lawsuits

Congressional investigators have launched a review of the Defense Department's body armor program, including the "Interceptor" vests produced by Brooks' company. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Government Accountability Office, Laura Kopelson, said government investigators -- spurred by congressional concerns that the vests may be inadequate to protect troops -- are expected to launch a full review of the body armor program by July.

In addition, lawsuits by angry investors filed recently in U.S. District Court in Central Islip allege Brooks and other top company officials broke federal securities laws with a "pump and dump" scheme designed to earn the officials large sums from stock sales while they issued "false and misleading" statements about problems surrounding the company's body armor. During one high-water mark for the stock in late 2004, Brooks, the company's chairman, sold off $185 million worth of his holdings; other executives also made millions.

In its recent filings, DHB has acknowledged that the SEC is investigating financial arrangements between Brooks and the company.

As questions about the body armor's effectiveness arose, DHB stock, which traded above $20 a share in late 2004, dropped dramatically. It has hovered around $5 a share so far this year. Christopher J. Keller, one of the lawyers for the investors who are suing, said his clients lost "tens of millions of dollars" in stock value.

"There is a furiousness by investors with what has happened at DHB," says Neil Rothstein, another plaintiffs' lawyer. Referring to the $185 million, Rothstein said of Brooks, "He should be paying back every cent of that money."

The investors became even more furious when they learned Brooks, 51, who lives in Old Westbury, spent millions on a November 2005 bat mitzvah party for his daughter at Manhattan's Rainbow Room. News reports said the party cost nearly $10 million and featured performers including rapper 50 Cent and Steven Tyler of Aerosmith.

"Brooks got better talent than the NBC Katrina relief benefit," gushed one blog that published several photos from the bash.

Mike Sitrick, a spokesman for DHB, said Brooks would have no comment for this story.

However, legal representatives for Brooks and his company say the lawsuit has no merit and that criticism of Brooks' personal financial dealings is unfair. They also point to a $54-million order announced this month by the Army for more DHB body armor as a sign of a continuing good relationship with the military.

Inside trades alleged

The 19 lawsuits, now consolidated and under review by U.S. Magistrate Judge E. Thomas Boyle, contend that David Brooks "has a history of serious securities law violations" and that DHB has had four different accounting firms since 2002, which the combined suit says is "something hardly designed to boost investor confidence." By portraying DHB as a "tremendous success" with increased military sales, the lawsuit alleges, Brooks and other company officials gained "over $200 million in illegal insider trading proceeds."

The suit contends Brooks repeatedly painted a rosy picture for his company -- even as he was selling his own stock. "The future outlook for DHB appears outstanding given the continuing unstable geopolitical environment, the increased need for homeland security, and the continuing war on terror," Brooks said at about the same time as his large stock sale, according to court papers.

The suit contends that DHB executives knew then that "thousands and thousands of DHB Interceptor vests were defective," and it alleges that the investors lost millions because DHB didn't properly disclose problems with Zylon, a key substance used in some of the bullet-resistant vests that deteriorated over time.

DHB officials insist that no troops have been endangered because of their products, and that most of their anti-ballistic vests have used bullet-resistant materials other than Zylon. Last year, the National Institute of Justice, a research and advisory branch of the Justice Department, revoked its approval for the body armor using Zylon, which was found to deteriorate when exposed to high temperatures in sunlight. By August, DHB, like other body armor manufacturers, said it would stop using Zylon in vests. It also announced a voluntary recall of existing vests containing the material, and took a $60-million third-quarter charge for costs of the replacement program.

Returns, but no complaints

As a precaution, the Marines and Army have returned about 18,000 of the company's vests containing Zylon, although they say none was cited as faulty. In a written response to Newsday, an Army spokesman said the Army has seen "no concerns or complaints with the level of protection" provided by DHB's vests, many of which are manufactured by its Florida-based subsidiary, Point Blank Body Armor Inc.

Those in the metropolitan area who sell DHB's armored vests also say they've had no complaints. Warren Lehman, vice president of World of Uniforms in Medford, says his store sells the Point Blank vests for about $700 each, usually to local law enforcement.

"We've had no problems with them in eight years," Lehman said, "and no one's brought theirs back."

The lawsuit's reference to securities law violations stems from an SEC investigation that charged that $2 million in illegal profits were collected from a scheme involving a broker in a company then controlled by Brooks and his brother Jeffrey. Records show a junior-level analyst for Morgan Stanley provided confidential information about proposed takeovers to the broker in the Brookses' company, then located in East Hills. In the SEC's complaint, federal investigators said David Brooks and his brother "made no inquiries as to how [their broker] was so lucky" in trading the stocks. In the 1992 settlement, David Brooks consented to being barred for five years from the securities industry.

Brooks' representatives declined to talk about the allegations, but they stressed that he personally lent money to DHB to get it going in the 1990s, that DHB had lost money during its early days, and that Brooks and his family retain about 20 percent of the company's stock, down from a high near 50 percent in late 2004.

Lavish party criticized

"He's a self-made man -- from Brooklyn and a family of modest means," says one representative, who agreed to talk without being identified by name. He said Brooks waited years for DHB to become profitable and that certain details about Brooks' financial moves are exaggerated, including the price tag placed on his daughter's recent party.

"It's the most lavish party I've been to, and it wasn't cheap, but it wasn't nearly $10 million," said the representative, who attended the affair. None of the money for the party came from company funds, he added.

The Nov. 26 party for Brooks' 13-year-old daughter at the Rainbow Room reportedly included performers Tom Petty and Don Henley, and a cocktail serenade from saxophonist Kenny G. More than a hundred guests attended, receiving $1,000 goodie bags with new iPods stuffed inside, according to news accounts. Newsday learned that years earlier Brooks hosted a similar party for one of his older children that featured The Pointer Sisters singing group.

Some critics of DHB and Brooks' income in recent years say it is a flagrant example of profiteering from the nation's war on terror.

"He became extremely wealthy because of the war," said Sarah Anderson, a fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, a not-for-profit Washington, D.C., think tank, which issued a report last fall about top defense contractors whose executives saw their pay jump because of the government's anti-terror campaign. DHB was one of the companies she profiled.

"It's hard to explain how someone could profit so much from this war and spend it on such a lavish party," Anderson said.

Column: Vague U.S. Statute Underlies Google Case

Michael Hiltzik

Golden State

Relieved at averting another confrontation with the government that no one needs, all of cyberspace seemed to exhale last week when a federal judge cut way back on the data he would require Google to turn over to the Justice Department in a big privacy case.

But I'm not relieved, and you shouldn't be either.

Directly at issue in the ruling by U.S. District Judge James Ware of San Jose was a government subpoena that initially sought from Google a list of all Web pages in its search database as of last July 31 — that's billions of Web URLs — as well as every search query that had been entered by anyone for the two-month period ending that day. Similar subpoenas had been served on America Online, Yahoo, and Microsoft's MSN service, all of which rolled over for the G-men. Google, however, resisted. After the government narrowed its request considerably — to a random sample of only 50,000 Web addresses picked from Google's index — Judge Ware waved it through.

On a company weblog, Google, which contended it was trying to protect its users' privacy as well as its own trade secrets, called the narrowed order "a clear victory for our users and for our company."

But very few news articles about Ware's order reminded readers what really underlies the government's subpoena. It's an extremely troubling and slapdash statute known as the Child Online Protection Act, which Congress passed in 1998 in an attempt to be the nation's all-seeing Mrs. Grundy, and which Bill Clinton signed into law.

COPA, as it's known, would criminally punish anyone running a website for "commercial purposes" who posts on the Web any "material that is harmful to minors" and that minors might see.

Civil libertarians have huge problems with this law, as they should. COPA isn't aimed at material that might be considered obscene or at child pornography, but at a broader and more nebulous variety of content. Indeed, it's almost impossible to parse the term "harmful to minors." Even if we accept the law's three-pronged test that the forbidden material must be designed to appeal to "prurient interest" with respect to minors; represent sexual contact, acts, or genitals in a "patently offensive manner" with respect to minors; and lack redeeming value for minors, there's no way for a website to figure out whether its material falls into the forbidden zone. A minor can be anyone from the age of 1 to 16; manifestly, a wide gulf yawns between material that might "harm" a 6-year-old and what might "harm" a 16-year-old.

The law is also vague about "commercial" activities. Could the Los Angeles County Museum of Art qualify by hawking a $10.99 Gauguin print of a bare-breasted Tahiti maiden on its website? Some federal prosecutor, somewhere, might think so.

The American Civil Liberties Union, acting on behalf of the online journal Salon.com, a sexuality education site run by the Sexual Health Network and other websites aimed at adult markets, sued to overturn

COPA. "Our bottom line is that the government should not be in the business of deciding what people can and can't see on the Internet," Aden Fine, an ACLU staff attorney, told me.

The ACLU obtained a federal court injunction barring enforcement of the law, and the matter proceeded to ricochet up and down the federal court hierarchy, stopping twice at the Supreme Court, as judges tried to figure out if all or part of COPA might be unconstitutional.

It's an understatement to say that the law has twisted the Supreme Court in knots. The first time they looked it over, the justices issued five overlapping, separate and partially concurring opinions plus one dissent. That was in 2002, on a narrow question of constitutional law. They found the case dumped back in their laps in 2004, this time on the issue of whether

COPA was the least restrictive or narrowly tailored way to remedy the exposure of minors to harmful material. (That's a key test for laws that arguably restrict freedom of speech.)

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for a court majority, ruled that the ACLU might be right in arguing that commercial filtering software is both more effective and less restrictive than a law penalizing U.S.-based profit-seeking enterprises whose material might be discovered by children. The organization observed that filtering programs installed on home computers or offered by Internet service providers could block objectionable material coming from overseas, rather than just from within the U.S. — an important consideration, given that at least 40% of all Web content originates abroad.

Moreover, because a filter is presumably under the control of an adult in the house or at the public library, it can't interfere with an adult's activities online. Filters also block a far wider range of material than COPA, including e-mails, chat rooms and news groups, and can be configured to keep minors from sending information to strangers as well as receiving it.

But Kennedy found "a serious gap" in our knowledge of filters' effectiveness, and ordered the lower court to fill it. The Department of Justice commissioned Berkeley statistician Philip B. Stark to compare filters' effectiveness with COPA's, hoping that he would find that the filters were relative sieves of "harmful" material. For this task, it claimed, Stark required a database of websites culled from Google, Yahoo, AOL and MSN. Thus we ended up with a courthouse to-do over search privacy.

I don't know how Stark will be able to compare filtering software to COPA, since COPA's effectiveness depends on prosecutorial discretion and the judgments of judges and juries anywhere in the country. All we know about COPA is that it will allow strangers to impose on me and you their judgment of whether something is harmful to the minors in my house or yours. Software filters, on the other hand, allow us to impose our own judgments on the activities of our own kids, and don't bar us from seeing legitimate content that COPA might criminalize.

That's the true scandal lurking within the Google case: The government can't resist trying to shove its nose into our private affairs.

Subject: FACT SHEET: COMPREHENSIVE IMMIGRATION REFORM: SECURING OUR BORDER, ENFORCING OUR LAWS, AND UPHOLDING OUR VALUES

Importance: Low

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release March 27, 2006

Comprehensive Immigration Reform: Securing Our Border, Enforcing Our Laws, And Upholding Our Values

Today's Presidential Action

Today, President Bush Attended A Naturalization Ceremony And Discussed His Vision For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The President supports comprehensive immigration reform to secure our border, improve enforcement of our laws, and uphold our values. The President also discussed his proposal for a temporary worker program that rejects amnesty, allows foreign workers to fill jobs no American is willing to do, and reduces smuggling and crime at the border.

* America's Immigrant Heritage Continues To Shape Our Society. Our Nation is bound together by liberty and a conviction that all people are created with equal dignity and value. Through the generations, Americans have upheld that vision by welcoming new citizens from across the globe. Immigrants have helped shape our identity and sustain our economy.

* The President Strongly Believes America Is Stronger And More Dynamic When New Citizens Are Welcomed. The President has called on Congress to increase the number of green cards that can lead to citizenship. He supports increasing the number of visas available for foreign-born workers in highly skilled fields. The President signed legislation creating a new Office of Citizenship at the Department of Homeland Security to promote knowledge of citizenship rights and procedures; the Office of Citizenship created a new official guide for immigrants, and the Administration is working with faith-based and community groups to offer civics and English-language courses. In July 2002, the President signed an Executive Order making foreign-born members of our military immediately eligible for citizenship. Over the past four years, more than 20,000 men and women in uniform have become citizens.

* Every New Citizen Makes A Lifelong Pledge To Support The Values And Laws Of America. New citizens have an obligation to learn the customs and values that define our Nation - including liberty and civic responsibility, equality under God, tolerance for others, and the English language.

The President Welcomes A Civil And Dignified Debate On Comprehensive Immigration Reform. Congress is now considering immigration reform proposals. Immigration is an emotional topic, and we need to maintain our perspective as we conduct this debate.

To Keep The Promise Of America, We Must Enforce The Laws Of America

President Bush's Proposal For Comprehensive Immigration Reform Includes Three Critical Elements - Securing The Border, Strengthening Enforcement Inside The Country, And Creating A Temporary Worker

Program. These elements depend on and reinforce one another. Together, they will give America an immigration system that meets 21st century demands.

The First Element Is Securing Our Border. Since President Bush took office, funding for border security has increased by 66 percent. The Border Patrol has been expanded to more than 12,000 agents, an increase of more than 2,700 agents, or nearly 30 percent. The President's FY07 budget funds another 1,500 new agents. Agents are being provided with cutting-edge technology like infrared cameras, advanced motion sensors, and unmanned aerial vehicles. Protective infrastructure, such as vehicle barriers and fencing in urban areas, is being installed.
Manpower, technology, and infrastructure are being integrated in more unified ways than ever before.

* The Administration's Border Security Strategy Is Getting Results.
Since President Bush took office, agents have apprehended and sent home more than 6 million people entering the country illegally - including more than 400,000 with criminal records. Federal, State, local, and tribal law enforcement are working together. More than 600,000 illegal immigrants were apprehended through the Arizona Border Control Initiative last year - an increase of more than 50 percent increase over the previous year. The men and women of our Border Patrol have made good progress - but we have much more work ahead, and we will not be satisfied until our agents have full control of our border.

* The Administration Is Ending The Practice Of "Catch And Release." The President has set a goal to end "catch and release" over the next year. Most illegal immigrants from Mexico can be returned to Mexico within 24 hours. Non-Mexican illegal immigrants present a different challenge. For decades, government detention facilities did not have enough beds for the non-Mexican illegal immigrants caught at the border - so most were released back into society. They were each assigned a court date, but virtually no one showed up. The Administration is ending the practice of "catch and release" by increasing the number of beds in detention facilities by 12 percent this year; the President's FY07 budget proposes increasing that number by another 32 percent. The Administration is expanding the use of "expedited removal," which allows us to send non-Mexican illegal immigrants home more quickly.

* We Are Making Progress In This Effort. Last year, it took an average of 66 days to process a non-Mexican illegal immigrant. Now, the process is taking only 21 days. This has helped us end "catch and release" for illegal immigrants from Brazil, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua caught crossing our Southwest border. Since last summer, the total number of non-Mexican illegal immigrants released into society has been cut by more than a third. There is more work ahead, and the Administration will work with Congress to close loopholes that make it difficult to process illegal immigrants from certain countries and will continue pressing foreign governments like China to take back their citizens who enter our country illegally.

The Second Element Is Strengthening Enforcement Of Our Laws In The Interior Of Our Country. Since

The second element is strengthening enforcement of our laws in the interior of our country. Since President Bush took office, funding for immigration enforcement has increased by 42 percent. These resources have helped agents bring to justice smugglers, terrorists, gang members, and human traffickers. For example, through Operation Community Shield, Federal agents have arrested nearly 2,300 gang members who were in America illegally, including violent criminals like the members of the "MS-13" gang.

* Better Interior Enforcement Requires Better Worksite Enforcement.
Last year, President Bush signed legislation to more than double the resources dedicated to worksite enforcement. Next month, the Administration will launch new law enforcement task forces in 11 cities to dismantle document fraud rings.

The Third Element Is Creating A New Temporary Worker Program That Would Not Provide Amnesty. A temporary worker program would make the system more rational, orderly, and secure by providing a legal way to match willing foreign workers with willing American employers to fill jobs that no American is willing to do. Workers would be able to register for legal status on a temporary basis. If workers decided to apply for citizenship, they would have to get in line. This program would help meet the demands of our growing economy and allow honest workers to provide for their families while respecting the law.

* A Temporary Worker Program Is Vital To Securing The Border.
Creating a separate, legal channel for those entering America to do an honest day's labor would dramatically reduce the number of people attempting to sneak back and forth across the border. That would help take pressure off the border and free up law enforcement to focus on the greatest threats to our security - terrorists, drug dealers, and other criminals. The program would also improve security by creating tamper-proof identification cards that would allow authorities to keep track of every temporary worker who is in America on a legal basis and help authorities identify those who are here illegally.

* A Temporary Worker Program Should Not Provide Amnesty. Granting amnesty unfairly allows those who break the law to jump ahead of people who play by the rules and wait in the citizenship line. Amnesty would also encourage future waves of illegal immigration, increase pressure on the border, and make it more difficult for law enforcement to focus on those who mean us harm. For the sake of justice and the sake of border security, the President firmly opposes amnesty.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
March 27, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

TOMORROW'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Moussaoui (OPA)

Moussaoui testified today that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid were supposed to hijack a fifth airplane on Sept. 11th and fly it into the White House. Moussaoui told the court he knew the World Trade Center attack was coming and he lied to investigators when arrested in August 2001 because he wanted it to happen.

Talking Points:

- This is an ongoing trial and it would not be appropriate to comment specifically on the testimony. Since he pled guilty to the charges against him, Mr. Moussaoui has never hid the fact that he is a member of Al Queada with a mission and desire to kill Americans. At the highest levels of this government, we are well aware we have an enemy intent on killing innocent Americans and creating chaos by targeting the leadership institutions of this country.

Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (OPA)

Tomorrow, the government will argue the legality of the President's authority to set up military commissions to try detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Solicitor General will argue on behalf of the government during tomorrow's Supreme Court hearings.

Talking Points:

- This issue will be heard in the Supreme Court this week and the DOJ Solicitor General's office has already filed hundreds of pages briefs that purport our position in this case.

- We will reserve the specific points for the arguments in the Supreme Court, but obviously, we are pleased with the past decision where the United States Court of Appeals ruled last year in affirmation of the President's authority to establish military commissions to try and punish enemy combatants who have violated the laws of war.

- The Court also held that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to members of affiliates of al Qaeda, and they recognized the difference between terrorists and those who legitimately wage war.

- The President's authority under the laws of our Nation to try enemy combatants is a vital part of the global war on terror.

Telemarketing Firm Official Indicted in New Hampshire Phone Jamming Case (Criminal)
Shaun Hansen, former co-owner of Idaho-based telemarketing firm Mylo Enterprises, appeared in a federal court in New Hampshire today to face charges for conspiring to commit, and aiding and abetting the commission of, interstate telephone harassment relating to a scheme to jam several New Hampshire telephone lines on Election Day, 2002. The two-count indictment was returned under seal on March 8, 2006, and unsealed today upon his appearance in court. Hansen, 34, is charged with conspiracy to commit telephone harassment and aiding and abetting telephone harassment.

Federal Court Orders New Hampshire Tax-Return Preparer to Give Customer Information to IRS (Tax)
The Justice Department announced today that a federal court in New Hampshire has ordered Mark G. Loll, who operates Tax-Tactics in Peterborough, N.H., to stop preparing frivolous income tax returns and to comply with future IRS requests that he provide his customer list or copies of returns he has prepared. The government sought the permanent injunction order as part of a crackdown on tax preparers who fail to comply with their federal-law obligation to turn over customer information to the IRS on demand.

TUESDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

The Antitrust Division will have a press release on a criminal matter.

CRT will have a press release tomorrow on an agreement reached with the largest nationwide franchisee of Pizza Hut restaurants. The agreement will reconcile violations of the ADA and make the restaurants accessible to those with disabilities.

The Department will announce the awarding of $200 million in anti-crime funding to every state and territory. The funds, provided through the Edward Byrne Justice Assistance Grant (JAG) Program, will be used by state and local governments to support a broad range of activities to prevent and control crime and improve the criminal justice system.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Takes Stand, Claims Role In 9/11 Attacks. Zacarias Moussaoui took the stand in his own defense yesterday, over the objection of his lawyers, and told jurors that he and shoe-bomber Richard Reid were part of an al Qaeda team that was to hijack a fifth airliner on 9/11 and crash it into the White House. Moussaoui's admission contradicted his statement when he pleaded guilty last April, saying then that he was part of a later plot, and news coverage generally characterizes his testimony yesterday as undermining defense lawyers' attempts to save him from the death penalty.

ABC World News Tonight (3/27, lead story, 3:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "It was stunning testimony." ABC (Thomas) added, "Moussaoui admitted to a transfixed jury that he was to fly a plane into the White House as part of the 9/11 plot, and he knew the attack would come some time after August, 2001." Michael Greenberger, former Justice Department official: "Moussaoui has really rewrapped this case in a gift box and put a nice ribbon on it for the prosecution." Moussaoui "showed no remorse, calling all Americans his enemies. At one point, he shouted 'Al Qaeda, Osama, Victory.'"

The CBS Evening News (3/27, lead story, 3:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted Moussaoui confirmed "everything the prosecution says about him." CBS (Stewart) added, "A defense lawyer later told CBS the testimony amounted to a public suicide. Analysts agreed." NBC Nightly News (3/27, lead story, 2:55, P. Williams, 9.87M) called Moussaoui's testimony "riveting" and added "it gave a big boost to prosecutors."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Franken) reported, "He admitted that he lied to investigators, fundamental to the prosecution belief that had he told the truth he could have prevented" 9/11.

Under the headline "Claim Of 9/11 Role Shakes Up Trial," USA Today (3/28, A1, Johnson, 2.31M) adds, "His matter-of-fact description of his life as a terror operative who met Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda leaders captivated the courtroom," and "his testimony likely will be key to the government's claim that he should be executed because his lies to U.S. agents kept them from uncovering the 9/11 plot."

The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Serrano, 958K) notes, "He further admitted that he lied to FBI agents when arrested in Minnesota, a key point for the government. Moussaoui said he would not cooperate because 'I wanted my mission to go ahead.' … Moussaoui was cross-examined by lead prosecutor Robert Spencer, who asked him about his reaction to the loss of nearly 3,000 lives that day. 'You are Americans, and I consider every American to be my enemy,' he said."

The New York Times (3/28, , 1.19M) also reports Moussaoui's testimony seemed "only to bolster the government's case," although testimony from alleged 9/11 attack planner Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, introduced by the defense yesterday, "seemed to contradict Mr. Moussaoui's assertion that he was meant to be a pilot on Sept. 11. Mr. Mohammed portrayed Mr. Moussaoui as a fringe figure who might have been used in a second wave of attacks if needed."

The Washington Post (3/28, A1, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) calls Moussaoui's testimony "stunning," and notes legal analysts said his admission that he lied to the FBI so the 9/11 plot would not be thwarted, "combined with Moussaoui's chilling demeanor in court, probably would resonate with the jury." Former federal prosecutor Eric Muller observed, "It sounds like he's toast," and RAND analyst Brian Jenkins said Moussaoui "has destroyed much of his defense."

CNN.com (3/28, Hirschkorn) reports, "Prosecutors contend that Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen of Moroccan heritage, deserves to die. Had he not lied after his arrest, they contend, investigators could have uncovered the September 11 conspiracy. … Asked by his lawyer why he lied, Moussaoui replied, 'Because I am al Qaeda. … 'The Prophet says, "war is deceit," ' Moussaoui later told prosecutor Robert Spencer. 'You're allowed to lie for jihad. You're allowed any technique to defeat your enemy.' … After Moussaoui's testimony, the defense introduced the statements from Mohammed."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/28, Gordon) reports, "It was the most dramatic day of testimony in a three-week-old trial filled with tumult. Jurors, who scribbled notes as Moussaoui further implicated himself, now must sort out the conflicting portraits in determining whether he should be put to death for what he didn't tell interrogators while jailed in Minnesota. … U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said she expects the first phase of the trial -- to determine whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty -- to go to the jury as early as Wednesday."

The Washington Times/AP (3/28, Barakat) and Bloomberg (3/28, Arthur) report similarly on Moussaoui's testimony.

Milbank Says Moussaoui Gave "Prosecutors Just What They Needed." In his Washington Post (3/28, 744K) "Washington Sketch," reporter Dana Milbank wrote, "The terrorist gave the prosecutors just what they needed: evidence that his lies to investigators in August 2001 prevented them from thwarting the attack. Just as prosecution witnesses wound up aiding the defense earlier in the trial, Moussaoui was a gift to prosecutors. The Justice Department wants the death penalty; Moussaoui spoke like a man who wants martyrdom."

Victims' Family Members Pained By Moussaoui Testimony. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/28, Neumeister) reports Debra Burlingame, the sister of American Airlines pilot Charles Burlingame whose hijacked airliner struck the Pentagon, "says watching Zacarias Moussaoui's chilling testimony…provided new information for families desperate for answers, yet only worsened their emotional wounds." Sally Regenhard, "whose firefighter son Christian was killed at the World Trade Center," said "she 'felt very certain' that at least one of the plane attacks could have been thwarted if the work done by FBI field agents had been acted upon properly. … Her voice cracked as she dwelled on a truth too painful to bear: 'The cavalry never came.'"

LATimes Says Moussaoui Should Not Be Executed, Despite Yesterday's Testimony. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, 958K) editorializes, "Even if he was supposed to fly a plane into the White House…as he testified in court Monday, Zacarias Moussaoui should not be executed." The Times adds that – in addition to the paper's standard editorial opposition to the death penalty – execution would reward him by making him a martyr, and "if Moussaoui is indeed an important cog in a broad conspiracy, then he certainly has information that could potentially be useful both in further Sept. 11 investigations and in our fight against Al Qaeda."

Roberts Critical Of NSA Bill's Referral To Judiciary Committee. Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts was critical of the Senate parliamentarian's decision to refer a bill concerning President Bush's National Security Agency domestic surveillance plan to the Judiciary Committee. The Washington Times (3/28, Waterman, 90K) reports an intelligence committee aide said, "Chairman Roberts's strong position is that this decision was incorrect." The Times adds the parliamentarian "referred Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine's Terrorist Surveillance Act of 2006 to the Senate Judiciary Committee, after much behind-the-scenes negotiations, according to other Senate aides." In "practice, the referral means that members and staff of the intelligence committee will have only a short time to work on whatever proposal emerges from Mr. Specter's panel -- 10 days, according to committee staff."

Conyers Not Satisfied With DOJ's Response To NSA Probe. The National Journal's Technology Daily (3/28, Casey) reports, "Democrat John Conyers of Michigan dismissed as evasive and unresponsive the late Friday response from the Justice Department to a House Judiciary Committee inquiry into the National Security Agency program of wiretaps without warrants." Technology Daily continues, "Justice's response said the agency, through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, could have legally monitored confidential communications between doctors and patients or attorneys and their clients. … 'Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception if they met' the program's criteria, the department said. … 'The evasiveness of the department prevents Congress from exercising its constitutionally mandated oversight role and obstructs Congress' ability to draft meaningful legislation to provide guidelines for this activity,' said Conyers, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary panel. 'Some of the department's responses leave open the possibility that other surveillance programs exist with a scope far beyond this program.'" Technology Daily notes, "In its answers to 45 separate questions posed by Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and committee Democrats, the department acknowledged that no previous administration had authorized electronic surveillance."

Supreme Court To Hear Appeal From Bin Laden's Driver. USA Today (3/28, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the Supreme Court today hears oral arguments in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden "who is challenging the validity of President Bush's plan to try foreign terrorism suspects before military tribunals." Hamdan's attorneys "say Bush has claimed unprecedented power 'to dispense life imprisonment and death through a judicial system of his own design.'" Attorneys for the Administration "counter that the tribunals, first ordered by Bush two months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, reflect the president's broad authority to oversee war efforts." The Hamdan dispute has "been complicated by the Detainee Treatment Act, which Congress passed in December. An initial question for the justices is whether the act strips them of the power to consider Hamdan's basic claim about the validity of the tribunals that would be set up and run by the Pentagon."

Group Calls For Scalia Recusal. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 2, 1:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Justice Antonin Scalia weighed in on the "legal rights of terror suspects imprisoned on the US Navy base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The question is do these detainees deserve an American style trial by jury. Here is what Justice Scalia told a college audience in Switzerland." Antonin Scalia, Supreme Court Justice (March 8): "War is war and it has never been the case that when you capture a combatant you have to give him a jury trial in your civil courts. It's a crazy idea to me." Mitchell: "Some legal experts say Scalia should recuse himself from the case."

The Washington Post (3/28, A6, Lane, 744K) reports "a group of retired U.S. generals and admirals has asked Justice Antonin Scalia to recuse himself, arguing that his recent public comments on the subject make it impossible for him to appear impartial." Scalia's remarks "'give rise to the unfortunate appearance that, even before briefing was complete, he had already made up his mind' about issues in the case, the lawyer, David H. Remes, wrote." Noting that Scalia "reportedly had discussed the rights of accused terrorists in the context of his son Matthew's recent tour as an Army officer in Iraq, Remes wrote that this creates an appearance of 'personal bias arising from his son's military service.'"

The Legal Times (3/28, Mauro) reports, "The letter seeking recusal was sent to Supreme Court clerk William Suter late Monday with the request that it be passed on to Scalia. According to Court custom, a request for a justice's recusal is addressed to the individual justice, not to the full Court, because it is the justice's decision alone whether or not to recuse. No immediate response from the justice was forthcoming, making it likely that Scalia's recusal decision will not be known until arguments begin Tuesday, and Scalia either remains seated or gets up and leaves the Court chamber. At a Supreme Court Historical Society event at the Court Monday night that featured Scalia, he made no comment about the controversy."

Top Firms Join Forces In Detainee Case. The Legal Times (3/28, Mauro) reports, "When the U.S. Supreme Court hears arguments today in a landmark dispute over executive power in wartime, the Bush administration will be outnumbered -- if not outgunned. … Many of the nation's top law firms have signed briefs against the government and in support of Salim Hamdan, the detainee who allegedly served as chauffeur to Osama bin Laden and who is being detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The Times continues, "More than three dozen briefs have been filed on Hamdan's side, largely arguing that the military tribunals established by the White House to try the detainees are illegal. By contrast, only a handful of briefs have been filed on the other side, backing the administration's expansive view of executive authority. … The briefs in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld have flooded in to such a degree that, with the approval of the Court clerk's office, their covers carry small captions summarizing the topic discussed within, an innovation aimed at helping justices and their law clerks keep them straight. … The covers also carry the names of the big-ticket New York, Washington, D.C., and other national law firms that are bringing their muscle to bear, from Cravath, Swaine & Moore to Covington & Burling to Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld to Jones Day."

Administration Arguments In Hamdan Case Debated. USA Today (3/28, 2.31M) says in an editorial that Administration lawyers "will argue Tuesday that Hamdan has almost no rights. Worse, the government contends that the Supreme Court has no right to be hearing his case." Hamdan "has become a high-profile pawn in the administration's stubborn contention that it doesn't have to answer to anyone — not Congress, not the courts and not international treaties and organizations — in its pursuit of the war on terror. The administration asserts the right to unilaterally designate individuals as 'enemy combatants' and hold them prisoner indefinitely, possibly forever."

In an opposing view, USA Today also runs an op-ed (3/28) by Richard Samp, chief counsel of the Washington Legal Foundation, who says, "Those who have challenged the legality of the administration's policy of indefinitely detaining enemy combatants in our war against al-Qaeda have begun to face up to a harsh reality: The courts have by and large upheld the policy." Critics now "are taking a new tack. They argue that even if the administration is acting within the law, we ought to abandon the policy because it's not the right thing to do. They apparently want detainees either to be charged with crimes in our regular criminal courts or else set free. That simply is no way to fight a war."

NYCLU Urges 2nd Circuit To Unseal NSA Surveillance Ruling In Albany Mosque Case. The AP (3/28, Neumeister) reports the New York Civil Liberties Union filed a motion with the 2nd US Circuit "on Monday to force a federal judge to unseal a ruling he made…regarding the government's warrantless wiretapping program" in the case of Albany mosque imam Yassin Aref and mosque member Mohammed Hossein. "The NYCLU asked to intervene three days after defense lawyers for the men asked the same appeals court to say the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret," noting "that the judge rejected the defendants' suppression motion less than two hours after the government on March 10 submitted a secret court document opposing it."

Videotaped Confessions Seen As Highest Hurdle For Hayat Defense. The AP (3/28, Thompson) reports lawyers for Umer and Hamid Hayat "will open their defense this week, and among their biggest challenges will be persuading jurors that they should not believe their own eyes. The government's case…is built partially on separate confessions they gave to FBI agents," which "were videotaped and played to jurors." The AP notes that dismissed juror Andrea Clabaugh said last week, "I don't find the FBI interrogation damning. I felt like the FBI was leading," but "legal experts said confessions tend to resonate with juries."

Levin Surveying Military Prison Workers On Abusive Tactics. The Washington Post (3/28, A19, White, 744K) reports, "American soldiers, contractors and civilians who worked in the Abu Ghraib prison and at other US military detention facilities have begun receiving detailed questionnaires from Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, about the use of severe interrogation tactics and the military chain of command's role in their implementation." Levin has "directed the committee's minority staff to ask questions of hundreds of people who worked in detention facilities to assess where the tactics originated and how they were applied -- an approach the full committee has not endorsed."

Pan Am Bomber Sentenced To Seven More Years In Prison. The Washington Post (3/25, A5, Cauvin, 744K) reported, "Almost a quarter of a century after his bomb killed a teenager aboard a Pan Am flight bound for Honolulu, Mohammed Rashed was sentenced for the crime" Friday. "But in the complicated world of counterterrorism, saving lives is sometimes weighed against avenging deaths, and that is why Rashed…was ordered to spend just seven more years behind bars. ... By the time Rashed was brought to the United States in 1998, he had already been in custody for a decade," but "for the past three years…Rashed has been providing significant assistance, Justice Department prosecutors Scott J. Glick and Kenneth C. Kohl" told US District Judge Royce C. Lamberth at the sentencing. The AP (3/25) noted Rashed's "sentencing…was delayed for several years because he was locked up in prisons in Greece and Africa before being turned over to the FBI."

Alleged Padilla Accomplice Faces Military Tribunal. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, A1, Bravin, 2.11M) reports in a front page story on Binyam Mohamed, who allegedly conspired with "Dirty Bomber" Jose Padilla to conduct terrorist attacks in the US. Padilla "was arrested when he arrived at O'Hare airport, accused of plotting to explode a radioactive 'dirty bomb,' and jailed without charge as an 'enemy combatant.' The result is a civil-liberties storm that has twice reached the Supreme Court." But Mohamed "wasn't a U.S. citizen. And his path," after his detention in Karachi, Pakistan, "he asserts in an account provided by one of his lawyers, has led to a Moroccan torture cell, imprisonment at Guantanamo, Cuba, and a proceeding to be held in a secretive military court created by order of President Bush after Sept. 11." A "five-page charge sheet accuses Mr. Mohamed of conspiring, along with Mr. Padilla, with al Qaeda leaders to commit the war crimes of 'attacking civilians, attacking civilian objects, murder by an unprivileged belligerent, destruction of property by an unprivileged belligerent and terrorism.' The al Qaeda leaders it cites include Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri, Khalid Sheikh Mohammad, Abu Zubayda and the late Muhammad Atef."

PATRIOT ACT:

Harman, Conyers Call On Bush To Allow Congressional Patriot Act Oversight. The Boston Globe (3/28, Savage, 484K) reports Reps. Jane Harman and John Conyers "demanded that President Bush withdraw his assertion that he can ignore portions of the USA Patriot Act calling on him to provide periodic reports to Congress on how new law-enforcement tactics are being used." The ranking Democrats "on the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees, respectively -- sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking that Bush follow the law." The Globe adds that after President Bush "signed the Patriot Act reauthorization on March 9, he issued a signing statement -- an official document in which a president lays out his understanding of the law -- asserting that he had the authority to withhold the information from Congress if he decided that disclosing it would interfere with foreign relations, national security, or executive branch operations."

Patriot Act Provision To Fast-Track Death Penalty Sparks Concern. The Las Vegas Sun (3/27, Pordum) reports, "Slipped into the thick binding of the newly authorized Patriot Act is a provision designed to speed death penalty appeals." The Sun continues, "The act, signed into law this month, allows states to ask the U.S. attorney general for so-called fast-track reviews of federal habeas corpus petitions - the last appeal of a death row inmate. … Previously federal judges made that determination, which is based on whether a state's court-appointed attorneys in death penalty appeals are able to handle them." The Sun adds, "No state had qualified for the fast-track review, but that could change under the new law. A fast-track review limits the amount of time a prisoner has to appeal and the subject matter of the appeal. … 'This is very troubling,' said Allen Lichtenstein, local attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union. 'It's an attempt by certain elements of government to eviscerate the very checks and balances that are in place to guard us against the abuses of government. … Essentially it's an attack against the Bill of Rights.'" The Sun notes, "Conservative groups, long critical of the length of time it takes for appeals to wind through the system, have championed fast-track appeals. … 'If the provision holds up, it should fix the problem,' said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the nonprofit California-based Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a public interest law firm dedicated to crime victims' rights."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Reports Indicate Gaps Remain In Port, Border Security. Two GAO reports to be discussed in a Senate subcommittee hearing today are receiving broad media attention. They focus on the government's ability to detect hazardous materials coming into US ports and across borders. NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 7, 2:55, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "Four and a half years after 9/11, Senate investigators say only 39% of all containers entering the US are screened for nuclear material. Many ports, including the third-largest, Miami, still have only handheld detection devices of little value." Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota: "We still have massive blind spots in our ability to prevent nuclear material from being smuggled into this country." Myers:

DOJ_NMG_0022426

"This report by the Government Accountability Office concludes DHS is two years behind schedule in installing radiation monitors in ports and not likely to have them all done even by 2009." Investigators "found another hole in the system. Senator Coleman tells NBC News that undercover GAO investigators were able to bring enough radioactive material into the US to make two dirty bombs, penetrating both the northern and southern borders."

The Washington Times (3/28, Fagan, 90K) reports Coleman said DHS "must 'dramatically step up' its deployment 'to keep pace with the danger we are facing' there."

The New York Times (3/28, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that a test conducted by the GAO in December found that investigators were able to smuggle "into the United States enough radioactive material to make two dirty bombs, even after it set off alarms on radiation detectors installed at border checkpoints." A report based on the test to be released this morning demonstrates "the mixed progress by the Department of Homeland Security, among other federal agencies, in trying to prevent terrorists from smuggling radioactive material into the United States." Crossing the border at undisclosed locations from Canada and Mexico, investigators "showed the agents from the Customs and Border Protection agency forged import licenses from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, based on an image of the real document they found on the Internet."

USA Today (3/28, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "The Homeland Security Department's equipment worked, and its agents did what they were supposed to do during the tests, according to the report. However, the GAO criticized the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for failing to require companies that sell radioactive material to verify who is buying it, saying there is no way for border agents to verify NRC licenses or other documents."

CQ (3/27, Starks) reported that a third GAO report to be discussed by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs' Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations Tuesday finds "that radiation screening efforts by the United States in foreign countries have been hampered by poor equipment and corruption of border security officials in the former Soviet Union."

US Negotiating To Place CBP Agents At Bahamian Port. The AP (3/28) reports, "Diplomatic talks are expected to begin soon to give agents from US Customs and Border Protection a presence" at the Bahamas' largest seaport, "where the United States is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo." Jayson Ahern, assistant customs commissioner for field operations, said, "It does require bilateral discussions with another country, but we're cautiously looking at being there by the fall." He "was expected to testify Tuesday at a Senate oversight hearing on radiation detectors in the United States."

US Has No Plans For Systems To Protect Commercial Jets From Shoulder-Fired Missiles. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 7, 3:10, Vargas, 8.78M) reported on the "danger posed by shoulder-fired missiles." ABC (Ross) added that last November, an American Airlines pilot reported seeing a missile trail, but nothing was found and "the FBI concluded it was most likely a hobby rocket. But officially, the investigation remains open." Sen. Barbara Boxer: "We had a scare in Los Angeles. We've been told that they cannot rule out the fact that it was a shoulder-fired missile." Ross: "And that remains a very serious concern. An estimated 20,000 such shoulder-fired missiles, mostly Russian, are said by US officials to be for sale on worldwide black markets. The going price -- a few thousand dollars." In the US, "despite four years of warnings and congressional hearings and millions spent on feasibility studies, the Federal Government has no plan to protect US commercial aircraft, even though two companies have developed systems they say would defeat the missiles."

Supreme Court Refuses To Block Hatfill Defamation Suit Against NYTimes. The New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) reports the Supreme Court "refused to hear an appeal from The New York Times on Monday, allowing a libel suit by a former Army bioterrorism expert to go forward." The suit, "filed in 2003 by Steven J. Hatfill, accused Nicholas D. Kristof, an Op-Ed columnist for The Times, of implicating Dr. Hatfill in the unsolved anthrax attacks of 2001."

Bloomberg (3/28, Stohr) reports, "The justices, without comment in Washington, let stand a ruling that said Hatfill can pursue his suit over a series of New York Times columns written by Nicholas Kristof. The columns criticized the slow pace of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's probe into the attacks and discussed the possibility that Hatfill was the culprit. … The company argued in its appeal that the lower court ruling, issued by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia, 'will inhibit criticism of the government and penalize speech about public matters in violation of the

First Amendment.' … No one has ever been charged in connection with the attacks, in which five people died from exposure to anthrax spores sent through the mail. Hatfill, who worked until 1999 at the Fort Detrick infectious diseases research institute, said in a 2002 press conference that he 'had absolutely nothing to do with this terrible crime.'"

The AP (3/28, Holland) reports, "Hatfill, a physician and bioterrorism expert, was labeled a 'person of interest' by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, although he was never charged and has since sued Ashcroft and others. … A federal judge had thrown out Hatfill's lawsuit against The New York Times over 2002 columns by writer Nicholas Kristof that faulted the FBI for failing to thoroughly investigate Hatfill. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstated the suit, and the Supreme Court declined without comment to take up the case." The AP notes, "New York attorney David Schulz, who represented the newspaper, said the appeals court decision undermines free-speech protections for reporters and invites more lawsuits over legitimate news reporting. … The Associated Press and some 30 other news organizations urged the Court to use the case to clarify reporters' free-speech protections."

US Charges Florida Inmate With Mailing Hoax Anthrax Letters. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (3/25, Coté, 249K) reported, "Federal prosecutors on Thursday announced they charged Anthony Vassalotti…with the federal crime of mailing a hoax anthrax threat. Vassalotti allegedly sent three letters containing white powder and words such as 'breathe these anthrax spores and die die die!' to the prosecutor on his case, the Circuit Court judge who sentenced him and the Palm Beach County court clerk, according to authorities. Vassalotti was angry after being sentenced on March 16 to 40 years in prison for aggravated battery with a firearm and possession of a short-barreled shotgun, an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force investigator wrote in an affidavit." The AP (3/25) also reported on the charges against Vassalotti.

WAR NEWS:

Afghan Christian Convert Seeks Asylum. The Washington Post/AP (3/28, Shah) reports this morning Abdul Rahman, accused of renouncing Islam in Afghanistan, "has been released from prison after the case was dropped, the justice minister said Tuesday." The announcement "came after the United Nations said that Abdul Rahman had appealed for asylum outside Afghanistan and that the world body was working to find a country willing to take him."

The New York Times (3/28, Munadi, Hauser, 1.19M) reports "a prosecutor affiliated with the case who spoke only on condition of anonymity said there were fears that Mr. Rahman might be attacked if he was sent to an Afghan hospital for a mental health evaluation. 'He would be killed immediately if they release him,' the prosecutor said." Clerics "led hundreds of people in a demonstration in the northern city of Mazar-i-Sharif on Monday, demanding that Mr. Rahman be tried under Islamic law and executed." The Times adds, "A witness named Shaahed said people at the demonstration had shouted slogans against President Bush and Zalmay Khalilzad, who is originally from Balkh Province in the north and is now the American ambassador to Iraq." AFP (3/28) and Washington Times (3/28, Sands, 90K) run similar reports.

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 6, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The US State Department today said the government of Afghanistan will free" Rahman, and "that does not sit well with many Afghan Muslims." NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 6, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported the "move…has triggered new protests by hundreds of Muslims, the charges against Abdul Rahman have been dropped, and the UN says he is asking for asylum in another country after several Muslim clerics threatened to incite their followers to kill Rahman if he is released."

More Commentary. Columnist Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K), "What strikes me about the threat to execute Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who converted to Christianity, is not that Afghanistan remains deeply medieval and not even remotely the democracy that George W. Bush would like it to be, but that with the exception of the (largely) Christian West, the rest of the world has been mostly silent. The Americans have protested, the Brits have protested, the Vatican has protested and so (I assume) have some others." But "if there has been a holler of protest from anywhere in the Muslim world, it has not reached my ears. That is appalling."

Rumsfeld Says US Doing Poorly In Ideological Battle Against Terror. The AP (3/28) reports, "The United States is faring poorly in its effort to counter ideological support for terrorism, in part because the government does not communicate effectively, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday." Rumsfeld "made the remark in response to a question from a member of his audience at the Army War College, where he delivered a speech on the challenges facing the country in fighting a global war on terrorism." Said Rumsfeld, "If I were grading I would say we probably deserve a `D' or a `D-plus' as a country as to how well we're doing in the battle of ideas that's taking place in the world today. … I'm not going to suggest that it's easy, but we have not found the formula as a country" for countering the terrorists' message.

The Washington Times (3/28, Scarborough, 90K) says Rumsfeld also "delivered harsh words to war critics yesterday, saying some view al Qaeda operatives as victims, not the enemy that has killed Americans repeatedly." He also "criticized previous administrations -- without naming them -- for failing to take on Islamic terrorists despite a series of attacks, including the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. 'Before September 11, 2001, there was somewhat of a misunderstanding in America about terrorists, and in some circles, I suppose, there really is today,' Mr. Rumsfeld said. 'Even today, some folks view terrorists as criminals, not as combatants. Some even consider them victims.'"

Shiites Halt Talks On New Government Over US-Iraqi Raid. A joint US-Iraqi raid in Baghdad that resulted in the deaths of 16 Shiites has increased tensions between the US and the majority ethnic group. Although US leaders said the target of the raid was a leader of the Mehdi Army militia, Shiite leaders claimed that the joint raid was an assault on a mosque. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 5, 1:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The reaction has been swift and severe. Shiite leaders cut off negotiations to form a new government. Baghdad's Shiite governor cut off all ties with the US. And Iraq's Shiite prime minister called the top US general here, demanding an investigation."

NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 4, 2:05, Hattori, 9.87M) reported, "The US military says the dead were insurgents and that the building was not a mosque. Coalition forces say they found weapons and bomb-making equipment at the site." Lt. General Peter Chiarelli, Multinational Corps Iraq Commander: "I had the opportunity to talk to the advisors who were with the Iraqi unit, and they indicated there were absolutely no prayer rugs in the buildings." Hattori: "While the facts may still be in dispute, what is not, in dispute is the furor this incident has touched off."

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 7, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "Iraqis accuse US forces of entering a mosque and killing as many as 22 people, but the US says this was a raid led by Iraqi special operations troops who were targeting terrorists responsible for kidnappings and executions." The US "explanation did nothing to quell popular anger in the capital, where talks for a national unity government were suspended for at least a day."

The AP (3/28, Hurst) reports "there were numerous conflicting statements from Iraqis and the Americans about the raid. Iraqi police, Shiite militia officials and major politicians have all said the structure attacked was the al-Mustafa mosque." But "the U.S. military disputed this, saying no mosques were entered and that the raid targeted a building used by 'insurgents responsible for kidnapping and execution activities.'" Knight Ridder (3/28, Youssef) says "Shiite leaders charged that Sunday's raid in northeast Baghdad was an attempt by the Americans to distance themselves" from Shiites, "trying to give Sunnis more power than they won in the Dec. 15 election because they feared that Iraq would be controlled exclusively by Shiites, rather than shared with the Sunnis."

Similarly, the New York Times (3/28, Semple, 1.19M) reports "some Shiite leaders warned that the raid had been widely interpreted among their constituents as a strong-arm tactic to cow them into making political concessions." The governor of Baghdad, Hussein al-Tahaan, "said he was suspending cooperation with the American authorities 'due to the aggression that the innocent people and worshipers were subjected to.'" The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Shishkin, 2.11M) runs a similar report under the headline "US And Iraq's Shiite Leadership Differ Sharply In Accounts Of Raid," while the Washington Post (3/28, A1, Finer, Nouri, 744K) titles its story "US Officials Defend Raid Following Shiite Backlash." The Washington Times (3/28, 90K) and the Los Angeles Times (3/28, Boudreaux, Hussein, 958K) also report the story.

they stood in line at a mobile recruiting drive near the al-Kisik training base about 14 miles from Tal Afar." NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 3, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The recruitment center is near a joint American/Iraqi military base but no American troops were reported wounded in this attack."

Pace Tries To Reassure Muslim Allies About Iraq Mission. The Washington Times/AP (3/28, Baldor) reports, "In the troubled region surrounding Iraq, a frequent question posed to the top US military officer visiting the area was not when his troops will pull out of Iraq, but how long they will stay. From the glittery king's palace in Saudi Arabia to the devastated slopes of the Pakistani mountainside and a staid Turkish symposium, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sought last week to ease concerns about whether opposition to the war at home could pressure U.S. forces to leave Iraq before it is stable." On "his first diplomatic-oriented trip since the fall," Gen. Pace "traveled to three countries whose leaders are worried about the US commitment to the Iraq war and the global war on terror. … 'I told them that from the US military's viewpoint, we would stay with the mission until we got the job done,' Gen. Pace said."

Arab Foreign Ministers Agree To Increase Diplomatic Presence In Iraq. The New York Times (3/28, Allam, 1.19M) reports, "Arab foreign ministers who gathered here over the weekend to prepare for a summit meeting agreed on a proposal to increase their diplomatic presence in Iraq. The draft resolution, which does not offer a timetable, is expected to be approved by the 22 members of the Arab League meeting here on Tuesday and Wednesday." Arab diplomatic missions "have maintained minimal staffs in Iraq since the American-led invasion in 2003 and particularly after two Algerian diplomats and an Egyptian envoy were kidnapped and killed there in July."

US Central Command Not Investigating Claim Of Russian Collusion With Saddam. The Washington Post (3/28, A20, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The US military's Central Command said yesterday it has not opened an investigation into whether sources inside the command leaked details of the 2003 US invasion of Iraq to Russian officials, and distanced itself from captured Iraqi documents that contain the allegations." A Central Command official "said the command takes 'all matters of operational security seriously' but was not probing the allegations."

Russia Sees "Hidden Political Motives" For Report. The AP (3/28) reports, "Russia's foreign minister accused the United States on Monday of having 'hidden political motives' for a report that said Moscow turned over information on American military plans to Saddam Hussein during the invasion of Iraq." Sergey Lavrov's comments "were the first formal statement from President Vladimir Putin's government about the Pentagon report, though a spokesman for Russia's foreign spy agency over the weekend denied the report's allegations." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "will discuss the matter with Lavrov -- either when the foreign ministers of the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany meet in Berlin on Thursday or by telephone, the State Department said."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (3/28, A22, 744K) editorializes, "The news that Moscow would have helped Saddam Hussein fight .. forces might be unwelcome to those administration officials who still try to portray Mr. Putin as a partner of the West and a worthy host for the next summit of the Group of Eight nations." But "it shouldn't be surprising. As has been well documented, Russia did its best to weaken and then break the sanctions regime imposed on Iraq, and then to prevent the 2003 invasion. In exchange it reaped lucrative economic concessions from Saddam Hussein, including the payment of large bribes to senior officials and politicians."

Seized Iraqi Documents Made Public. The AP (3/28, Tanner) reports, "The federal government is making public a huge trove of documents seized during the invasion of Iraq, posting them on the Internet in a step that is at once a nod to the Web's power and an admission that US intelligence resources are overloaded." Republican leaders in Congress "pushed for the release, which was first proposed by conservative commentators and bloggers hoping to find evidence about the fate of Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs, or possible links to terror groups." The AP adds "the documents' value is uncertain — intelligence officials say that they are giving each one a quick review to remove anything sensitive. Skeptics of the war, suspicious of the Bush administration, believe that means the postings are either useless or cherry-picked to bolster arguments for the war."

The New York Times (3/28, Shane, 1.19M) reports "American intelligence agencies and presidential commissions long ago concluded that Saddam Hussein had no unconventional weapons and no substantive ties to Al Qaeda before the 2003 invasion." However, "an unusual experiment in public access is giving anyone with a computer a chance to play intelligence analyst and second-guess the government. … Less than two weeks into the project, and with only 600 out of possibly a million documents and video and audio files posted, some conservative bloggers are already asserting that the material undermines the official view." On his blog last week, Ray Robison, "a former Army officer from Alabama, quoted a document reporting a supposed scheme to put anthrax into American leaflets dropped in Iraq and declared: 'Saddam's W.M.D. and terrorist connections all proven in one document!!!' Not so, American intelligence officials say."

In a New York Times op-ed (3/28), Peter Bergen, a fellow at the New America Foundation, says, "Bush Administration defenders, right-wing bloggers and neoconservative publications are crowing about Iraqi documents newly released by the Pentagon that, they say, prove that Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein were in league." But a "striking feature about the supposed Qaeda-Iraq connection is that since the fall of the Taliban, not one of the thousands of documents found in Afghanistan substantiate such an alliance, even though Al Qaeda was a highly bureaucratic organization that required potential recruits to fill out application forms." This "goes to the central problem faced by proponents of the Qaeda-Iraq connection. It's long been known that Iraqi officials were playing footsie with Al Qaeda in the mid-1990's, but these desultory contacts never yielded any cooperation. And why should they have?"

Iraqi Media Growing Increasingly Sectarian. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Roug, 958K) reports that although the Bush Administration has "poured millions of dollars into creating Western-style news media in Iraq, backing at least two television channels as well as training programs for Iraqi journalists on balance and ethics," the result "is hardly what the administration set out to accomplish. Most of the channels are increasingly sectarian and often appear to be inflaming the country's tensions, critics say." The Times adds, "Homebound because of violence and curfews, Iraqis watch their world through the kaleidoscope of satellite TV. But channel surfing Iraqi-style often offers views of the country through a sectarian lens."

Blair Defends Iraq Policies. The AP (3/28, McGuirk) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday pledged to keep British troops in Iraq and Afghanistan until those countries are stabilized. 'If the going is tough, we tough it out,' Blair told a rare joint session of Australia's Parliament." Blair "told lawmakers that the 'immediate threat is from Islamist extremism,' which he said was 'not a passing spasm of anger but a global ideology at war with us and our way of life.'" AFP (3/28) reports Blair's Australian counterpart John Howard also defended his "involvement in the US-led Iraq war, describing the political situation there as 'inspiring.'"

Memo Said To Show Bush, Blair Set On War In 2003. The networks last night all followed up on an New York Times report on memorandum by an aide to British Prime Minister Tony Blair that recorded details of a January, 2003 Oval Office meeting with President Bush.

NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 5, 2:05, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "The President and Tony Blair were officially on a diplomatic track, but a secret memo now reveals, they were determined to go to war six weeks before invading Iraq." The memo "said Blair asked about 'aftermath planning.' And 'Condi Rice said that a great deal of work was now in hand.'" David Phillips, former State Department Iraq advisor: "Both Bush and Blair were prepared to move forward with military action without fully appreciating the level of difficulty that we would face."

ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 6, :35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A memo has surfaced that paints President Bush eager to provoke Saddam Hussein into war. Tony Blair's foreign policy aide, David Manning, wrote it weeks before the invasion. It says that Mr. Bush floated the idea of painting US aircraft in UN colors, adding, 'If Saddam fired on them, that would be a clear green light for war.' The memo also says Mr. Bush felt it would be unlikely there would be warfare between Iraq's different religious and ethnic groups."

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 8, 0:50, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "We have not had any confirmation from US officials here or from the White House that these reports of this memo are taken in context and are correct, but it will certainly play into the hands of those who believe the Bush Administration misjudged the situation here in Iraq from the start, Russ."

Canadian PM Thanks Bush For Help In Rescuing Hostages. The AP (3/28) reports, "Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper called President Bush with thanks Monday for U.S. help in rescuing three peace activists from captivity in Iraq last week." The activists, "two Canadians and one Briton -- were freed without a shot, ending a four-month hostage drama in which an American among the group was shot to death and dumped on a Baghdad street."

State Department Hardship, Danger Pay Limits For Iraq, Afghanistan Boosted By 35%. The Washington Post (3/28, A21, Graham, 744K) reports, "To help recruit US government civilians for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan, the State Department has boosted the pay allowances for both hardship and danger to the highest levels ever granted. Starting this month, U.S. government civilians serving in Iraq and in Afghanistan outside of Kabul are receiving an extra 35 percent above their base salaries for hardship and another 35 percent for danger."

Krauthammer Says Fukayama Fabricated His Comments On Iraq War. Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K) that Francis Fukuyama's claim that Krauthammer "attributed 'virtually unqualified success' to the [Iraq] war is a fabrication. … For Fukuyama to assert that I characterized it as 'a virtually unqualified success' is simply breathtaking. My argument then, as now, was the necessity of this undertaking, never its ensured success. And it was necessary because, as I said, there is not a single, remotely plausible, alternative strategy for attacking the root causes of Sept. 11."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Challenges Government Witness In Enron Trial. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, McWilliams) reports, "Defense attorneys for Enron Corp.'s former two top executives continued to chip away at the testimony of a former finance executive who provided details of key meetings where the two were warned about the company's precarious state." The Journal continues, "Last week in the criminal conspiracy and fraud trial of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling, former Enron treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. testified that the two executives knew several businesses had lost billions in value but did not adjust the company's books and insisted to investors the company was healthy. He also testified that Mr. Lay misled credit companies about Enron's water-distribution business in order to retain an investment-grade credit rating. … Yesterday, Mr. Glisan acknowledged he had left an Oct. 22 meeting before the company's former chief accounting officer told Mr. Lay and other Enron directors that Enron's auditors had concluded no write-down of the company's Wessex Water unit was necessary. Prosecutors contend Mr. Lay lied about auditors' decision to investors."

The New York Times (3/28, Barrionuevo) reports, "Under questioning by Bruce Collins, a lawyer for Mr. Lay, Mr. Glisan acknowledged that he had assured Mr. Lay, the chief executive, and a group of directors that Enron had enough cash to operate. … Mr. Collins displayed notes from an Oct. 22, 2001, finance committee meeting taken by Paula Rieker, the corporate secretary, that showed that Mr. Glisan and Andrew S. Fastow, then the chief financial officer, told the directors, including Mr. Lay, that Enron had adequate liquidity. … Mr. Glisan told the board that Enron had immediate access to $1.5 billion in cash and could seek more. That appeared to contradict his testimony last week that he had given Mr. Lay a much dimmer financial forecast, saying Enron's liquidity was strained and its cash flow weak."

Bloomberg (3/28, Calkins) reports, "Testimony by a former Enron Corp. executive that he warned then-Chairman Kenneth Lay in October 2001 the company's finances were 'strained' was contradicted by evidence presented today by defense lawyers at Lay's fraud trial." Bloomberg reports that Gilsan "said last week in federal court in Houston that he told Lay in September and October 2001 the company faced a liquidity crisis and that Lay knew some of Enron's assets, including a British water company, needed to be written down in value. … Today, Lay's attorney Bruce Collins presented notes from an Oct. 22, 2001, finance committee meeting that showed Glisan had optimistic estimates about the company's access to cash. The minutes show that after Glisan left the meeting, Chief Accounting Officer Rick Causey had told Lay the water company didn't need to be written down, which Lay told analysts the next day. … 'I cannot say I had all the information he had,' Glisan said under cross-examination during his fourth day on the witness stand. 'I did not have this piece of information. Mr. Causey gave a favorable report, it seems.'"

Skilling Tried To Sell Enron Stock Days Before 9/11. The Houston Chronicle (3/28, Fowler) reports, "Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling tried to sell one-fifth of his Enron stock holdings just weeks after he left the company and days before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to testimony in court Monday. … The sale of 200,000 shares never went through on Sept. 6, 2001, because his stockbroker still had him listed as a company officer restricted from selling, but he was able to sell 500,000 shares several weeks later." The Chronicle continues, "The failed sale itself wasn't illegal but it could cast doubt on statements Skilling gave to investigators that the only reason he sold stock after leaving the company was post-Sept. 11 worry." The Chronicle adds, "Testimony about the stock sale, one of 10 illegal sales the government claims Skilling made, came on day 31 of the trial. The government may finish its case against Skilling and former chairman Ken Lay as early as this afternoon. … Former Treasurer Ben Glisan, who left the stand Monday afternoon, was the last major witness the government planned to call."

Lay Faces Second Trial On Separate Bank Fraud Chages. The Washington Post (3/28, D1, Johnson) reports, "As lawyers for Enron Corp.'s former leaders prepare to start their defense next week, another potentially more dangerous trial looms for founder Kenneth L. Lay." The Post continues, "Lay is scheduled to be tried on four separate criminal charges related to personal bank loans, with the case opening as soon as the jury begins deliberations in the current trial, in which both Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling are charged with fraud in Enron's collapse. … The unusual double jeopardy is the result of a bet Lay's legal team placed -- and lost -- two years ago. Lay sought to face trial alone rather than with his protege Skilling, who ran the company's daily operations." The Post adds, "Government lawyers pounced on the strategic opportunity. The judge's ruling, in what may be the worst possible outcome for Lay, gave prosecutors not one but two chances to convict the former titan. The judge kept Lay in the major fraud case, which includes Skilling. But he split off into a separate trial four narrow fraud charges against Lay that relate to personal bank loans. .. The second proceeding, to be decided by the same judge, will begin a mere two hours after jurors retire to consider the broader charges. It means that Lay, who built a fortune once valued at more than $100 million after growing up the son of a poor Baptist preacher who hopped from job to job, will face the anxiety of awaiting a jury verdict in the first trial while he defends himself against additional charges that carry a maximum penalty of a decade behind bars."

Trustees Find Billing Problems By Enron Turnaround Expert. The AP (3/28, Sherman) reports, "The turnaround expert who led Enron Corp. through its bankruptcy engaged in unacceptable billing practices and has agreed to cut in half the $25 million he has been seeking as a 'success fee,' the Justice Department said Monday." The AP continues, "The department's U.S. Trustee Program, which monitors the administration of bankruptcy cases, said it uncovered the billing problems after Stephen Forbes Cooper LLC and its principal, Stephen Cooper, asked the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York for $25 million as the fee for guiding the one-time energy giant, decimated by scandal, through its Chapter 11 case." The AP adds, "The firm denied any billing irregularities, but agreed to reduce its request to $12.5 million after the trustee's office shared the results of its investigation with the bankruptcy court, according to papers filed with the bankruptcy court. The court agreement did not spell out the billing issues. … U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Arthur Gonzalez will determine the size of the success fee."

Former Raytheon CEO Agrees To Fine, Bonus Forfeit. The New York Times (3/28, Wayne) reports, "The former chief executive of the Raytheon Corporation, Daniel P. Burnham, has agreed to pay a fine and return part of a $1.75 million bonus to settle Securities and Exchange Commission accusations over improper accounting practices in 2000 and 2001." The Times continues, "Disclosure of the arrangement came in a regulatory filing yesterday by the First Data Corporation, where Mr. Burnham, 59, is a director and chairman of the company's compensation committee. Mr. Burnham served as chairman and chief executive of Raytheon for five years until his resignation in July 2003." The Times adds, "The alleged accounting irregularities took place in Raytheon's troubled commercial aircraft division from 1997 to 2001 and concerned the timing of losses recorded by the company. The S.E.C. said that the company had overstated its 2001 losses and that its aircraft subsidiary should have charged up to $240 million of a $693 million loss in 2000 instead. … Since January 2003, the S.E.C. has been investigating accounting practices at Raytheon's aircraft division, which had faced a deteriorating market. Last April, the company offered to settle the investigation and recorded a charge of $12 million in the first quarter of 2005 to cover potential settlement costs. Raytheon has neither admitted nor denied the charges and the offer has yet to be approved."

Former Clarent CEO Pleads Not Guilty To Securities Fraud. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/25, C1, Abate) reported, "The U.S. attorney in San Francisco has charged a Los Altos man with two counts of federal securities fraud for allegedly inflating the revenues of Clarent Corp. in 2001. Shares in the publicly traded Redwood City firm, which sold equipment to send phone calls over the Internet, collapsed between September 2001 and May 2002, wiping out $200 million in stock value, according to the indictment." Former Clarent CEO Jerry Shaw-Yau Chang, "surrendered to federal authorities in San Francisco Friday," pleaded not guilty to the charges, and was released on bond. IDG News Service (3/25, Gross) also reported on Chang's indictment.

Firms Pressured By US Over Employees' Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Koppel) reports, "Defense lawyers are closely watching an accounting-fraud case in New Hampshire that they see as the latest government effort to stop companies from paying the legal fees of indicted employees." The Journal continues, "In the past three years, federal prosecutors in New York, Alabama and, now, Concord, N.H., have pursued a strategy that puts companies at risk of being branded as uncooperative if they don't cut off such payments. Lawyers say that could be tantamount to convicting defendants before they have even had a trial, since they can't properly defend themselves. … 'If companies don't cooperate with the government, they can face a death penalty by being indicted,' says Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University College of Law. She adds that companies fear becoming the next Arthur Andersen LLP, which imploded shortly after its indictment in 2002 for allegedly obstructing the government's investigation of fraud at Enron Corp. (The accounting firm was later convicted of obstruction, but the Supreme Court overturned the verdict last year.) 'Prosecutors can now force individuals to pay their own attorneys' fees," Prof. Podgor says, "and corporations have to go along.'" The Journal notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse counters that 'the government does not force corporations to do anything.' If a company declines to advance fees, he adds, 'that is a business decision made after weighing all of the costs and benefits of cooperation.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Dismisses Two Jurors In Ryan Corruption Trial. The New York Times (3/28, Rudoren) reports, "A federal judge dismissed two jurors on Monday two weeks after the jury began deliberating in former Gov. George Ryan's corruption case, tossing into turmoil a trial that has stretched over six months." The Times continues, "The judge, Rebecca R. Pallmeyer of Federal District Court, said she had not made any decisions about whether to proceed and hoped to avoid a mistrial by replacing the two jurors with alternates. … But Mr. Ryan's lawyers objected to that prospect, arguing that 'asking them to "start deliberations anew" is asking the impossible.'" The Times notes, "The dismissals follow revelations in The Chicago Tribune last week that two jurors lied on questionnaires about whether they had criminal records, with one failing to disclose drunken-driving arrests that led to the revocation of his driver's license while Mr. Ryan, a Republican, was the secretary of state, whose office is responsible for such matters." The Times notes that "legal experts who have been following the proceedings described Monday's removals as a serious threat to the trial, raising a strong issue for appeal regardless of how the judge proceeds."

The Chicago Sun-Times (3/28, Korecki, Sweeney) reports, "In a motion filed this morning, Ryan's lawyers object to replacing the two questionable jurors with substitutes, saying that would constitute a violation of Ryan's Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial." The Sun-Times adds, "The two jurors in question were seen walking separate from other jurors this morning. It appeared they were leaving Pallmeyer's chambers. … The remaining jurors left the building at about 11:30 a.m." The Sun-Times notes, "A male juror did not disclose DUI convictions and a weapons conviction, and a female juror did not disclose six arrests and a weapons charge. The woman was never convicted, according to public records."

The AP (3/28, Robinson) reports, "The announcement came after a day in which deliberations where on hold while the judge met privately with attorneys on both sides to try to prevent a mistrial after six months of proceedings. … The trial has already cost millions of dollars to hold -- 'a very significant investment,' Pallmeyer noted. … She said her goal would be to forge ahead, if 'we can proceed with this case fairly.'"

CBS 2 Chicago (3/28, Levine) reports, "As Judge Pallmeyer ponders her next step, others question the Chicago Tribune investigation that triggered the controversy. … 'It was waiting until the trial had closed and the deliberations began with replacements gone home that caused all these problems,' said Northwestern University Law Professor Ron Allen." CBS 2 continues, "According to Tribune Editor Anne Marie Lipinski, the investigation that discovered a juror's criminal background started after deliberations began as a feature story. … 'We were looking for routine information so we could contact jurors when the case was over, which is very common in stories like this,' Lipinski said. 'The reporter assigned to this came across this information. We were quite surprised by it and immediately brought it to the attention of the court.'"

Tribune Examines How Problems Were Uncovered. The Chicago Tribune (3/28, Janega) runs a report on how the newspaper uncovered the problems with the jurors' answers. The Tribune reports, "After a 5½-month trial and eight days of jury deliberations, the Chicago Tribune uncovered public records last week indicating that two jurors in the federal trial of former Gov. George Ryan gave false answers on their jury questionnaires." The Tribune continues, "Both jurors had checked boxes on pretrial questionnaires indicating that they had never been charged with a crime, but the Tribune found public records that appeared to contradict those answers." The Tribune adds, "While the information had the potential to disrupt the trial, Tribune editors recognized it could be even more damaging if it were revealed after the jury had reached its verdict. Nationally, other cases have been overturned on appeal when it was discovered after the verdict that jurors had been untruthful to the court. … Because of this, the newspaper went to Chief Judge Charles Kocoras as soon as possible, both to continue the reporting on the story and to inform court officials of the records it had discovered."

Jury Duty Can Force Unwelcome Revelations. The Chicago Tribune (3/28, Quintanilla, Janega) reports, "The white-hot spotlight of the American judicial system can be uncomfortable, with lawyers, judges and sometimes the media prying into difficult and embarrassing moments. But defendants aren't alone in the glare. From the moment a jury summons arrives, potential jurors find their own histories under scrutiny. … 'Has any member of your immediate family or a very close friend ever been the victim of a crime?' asks a typical juror questionnaire. 'Have you ever been a party to any lawsuit?'" The Tribune adds, "Experts say most jurors, facing threat of perjury, try to be honest. But they say others may be too embarrassed to answer fully, or think it doesn't matter. … 'I think some truly don't understand the gravity of the responses that they're giving. And others are being evasive, and we have no idea which it is,' said Duke University Law School professor Neil Vidmar. … If they do have something in their past, 'they may have said, "That's over and done with,"' he said. Officers of the court seldom know when a juror has stopped being truthful."

Abramoff Defenders Seek Leniency From Sentencing Judge. The New York Times (3/28, Shenon, 1.19M) reports Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff "may be among the most unpopular men in Washington, shunned by many of his former friends at the White House and on Capitol Hill. But more than 260 others — including a House member from California, a senior Senate staff member and several leaders of the Washington Jewish community — have stepped forward in letters to a federal judge to praise Mr. Abramoff and ask that he be spared a long prison sentence." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher "said in his letter that Mr. Abramoff was a 'selfless patriot' whose work in a conservative lobbying group, Citizens for America, in the 1980's was evidence of his desire 'to make a positive contribution to the nation he loves so much.'"

Cunningham Gave NRCC $2000 In Campaign Funds. The Hill (3/28, Allen) reports that before former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) "headed to prison, he prepared a small parting gift intended to help his colleagues in the upcoming election: a $2,000 check from his expiring campaign committee to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC)." The December 13th contribution "followed on the heels of an Oct. 24 donation of $11,684 to the NRCC. It also came about two weeks after he admitted to taking $2.4 million in bribes to direct government business to certain defense contractors." NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said "that the party never received the $2,000 check and that it has 'no plans' to return the nearly $12,000 it accepted before Cunningham's Nov. 28 guilty plea."

subpoena issued to a Senate Indian Affairs Committee staffer by attorneys for David Safavian, the former Bush administration official charged with lying to federal investigators about his relationship with Jack Abramoff." Safavian's attorneys had "subpoenaed Indian Affairs investigator Bryan David Parker for all documents or notes Parker made during his discussions with Safavian in February and March 2005. The Justice Department tried to have the subpoena quashed, arguing that Safavian's attorneys already had notes from an FBI agent who interviewed Parker. Friedman eventually sided with Safavian."

Nevada Corruption Trial Jurors Hear More FBI Wiretaps Of Alleged Bribes. KVBC-TV Las Vegas (3/27) reports, "Monday was a good day to be Dario Herrera and a bad day to be Mary Kincaid-Chauncey in the G-Sting political corruption trial. … In wiretaps played for jurors," strip club owner Mike Galardi and lobbyist Lance Malone "repeatedly conspire over how much money to offer Dario Herrera in exchange for his vote to allow nude dancing with alcohol being served at strip clubs," but "no matter what Galardi offered, Herrera wouldn't budge." Kincaid-Chauncey, however, "can be heard repeatedly conspiring with Malone to get votes to go Galardi's way, and can also be heard asking Malone for Galardi's money."

Court Hearing To Reveal Details About FBI Informant In Minnesota Bribery Case. The Minneapolis Star-Tribune (3/28, Chanen, Furst) reports Gary A. Carlson's "role last year in helping the FBI investigate Dean Zimmermann, who at the time was a City Council member, is expected to come into sharper focus today at a court hearing on the bribery allegations. Zimmermann's attorney is seeking more information about Carlson -- a real estate developer and the unnamed 'cooperating witness' who assisted the FBI," telling agents "last May that Zimmermann sought campaign contributions in exchange for supporting zoning changes that would aid Chicago Commons. Zimmermann allegedly took $7,200 from the witness during three meetings in June and August, court documents said."

Prosecution Witness Backs Up Star Witness' Testimony At "Mafia Cops" Trial. Newsday (3/28, DeStefano) reports, "Visions of the tropics as the scene of skulduggery entered the 'Mafia Cops' trial Monday, with a witness telling a federal court jury that he passed money directly to one of two ex-NYPD detectives on a Caribbean island." Thomas Galpine "said he paid $10,000 to…Louis Eppolito in 1988 or 1989 for a Caribbean time-sharing unit at the behest of businessman Burton Kaplan, a key associate of the Luchese crime family." Galpine, "who is serving a 16-year sentence for marijuana trafficking," is "testifying with a promise that prosecutors would help him get a reduction in his sentence if he is a truthful witness." Yesterday, he "the effect of backing up Kaplan on a number of points, among them, Kaplan's lending of $75,000 in marijuana smuggling money to Eppolito for a Las Vegas house purchase, and Kaplan's claim that he was getting information from two cops." The New York Times (3/28, Feuer, 1.19M) notes, "Lawyers for the two defendants were in the unenviable position of hearing Mr. Kaplan's words repeated by Mr. Galpine. On cross-examination, Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, went on the attack. He called Mr. Galpine an 'acolyte and errand man' under the spell of Mr. Kaplan, whom Mr. Cutler called 'a Fagin character' who had led the witness on a 'spiral to perdition, to hell.' … Nonetheless, Mr. Galpine seemed unfazed."

Eppolito's Cousin Testifies For Prosecution. The New York Daily News (3/28, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "The feds yesterday called a member of Louis Eppolito's own crime family to testify against the reputed Mafia cop. Tammy Ahmed is the daughter of slain mob associate Frank Santora, who was the original intermediary between Eppolito -- his first cousin -- and Luchese crime associate Burton Kaplan." In "damning" testimony, Ahmed recalled "names and numbers in her father's phone book -- including the reputed Mafia cops, Kaplan and a tow-truck driver who is expected to testify today that he helped Santora bury the corpse of murder victim Israel Greenwald."

Special Agents Joseph Fonseca and Cynthia Myers "testified they were about to leave the…apartment complex where Nichols surrendered…when he made the spontaneous admission while sitting in the back seat handcuffed and shackled. … 'We told him to wait until we got to headquarters,' said FBI agent Myers," and "for the rest of the drive, the conversation was light and focused primarily on the ongoing NCAA basketball playoffs." The AP (3/28, Weber) notes, "Fonseca's testimony came during a hearing in which Nichols' lawyers were seeking to have the court throw out their client's statements to police following his arrest." The defense lawyers contend "Nichols was denied counsel before he made incriminating statements," but "prosecutors have argued Nichols waived his right to counsel and spoke voluntarily."

Fourth Man Charged In New Hampshire Phone-Jamming Scheme. The AP (3/27, Ramer) reports, "The former co-owner of a telemarketing firm pleaded not guilty Monday to participating in a Republican scheme to jam New Hampshire Democrats' get-out-the-vote phone lines on Election Day 2002." The AP continues, "Shaun Hansen, 34, of Spokane, Wash., was indicted by a federal grand jury on March 8, but the charges were not made public until his arraignment Monday. … Hansen is charged with conspiring to commit and aiding the commission of telephone harassment. Prosecutors say he was paid $2,500 to have employees at Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises place hundreds of hang-up calls to phone lines installed to help voters get rides to the polls on Nov. 5, 2002. Among the contests decided that day was the close U.S. Senate race in which Republican Rep. John Sununu beat outgoing Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen." The AP adds, "Three others have been convicted for their roles in the scheme." … Former state Republican Executive Director Chuck McGee pleaded guilty to devising the idea of jamming the lines and served seven months in prison. Allen Raymond, former president of Virginia-based GOP Marketplace LLC, pleaded guilty to executing the plan and is serving a three-month sentence. … James Tobin, who had served as New England chairman of President Bush's re-election campaign, was convicted in December of telephone harassment charges and faces up to five years in federal prison. He is scheduled to be sentenced in May."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/28, Cattabiani, Shiffman, 423K) reports, addressing a Pennsylvania Press Club luncheon in Harrisburg yesterday, "State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo said yesterday that he wasn't worried about the two-year federal probe into his role in a South Philadelphia nonprofit, predicting that it would 'go nowhere.' … For more than two years, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the FBI, and the IRS have been investigating the spending and fund-raising of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the group that the senator has called 'my nonprofit.' … Fumo suggested that the Bush administration was behind the investigation. 'In this case, you have a White House that still believes Pennsylvania should be a red state,' he said."

Texas Contractor Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison For Overcharging Lockheed. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (3/28, Okada, 247K) reports Todd Brian Loftis, president of Lockheed Martin supplier Tools and Metals, was sentenced to seven years and three-months "and ordered to repay the aeronautics company $20 million in restitution for conspiring to defraud the U.S. government by overcharging the company since 1998" on F-16 and F/A-22 fighter jet contracts. The Star-Telegram notes, "Prosecutor Ronald Eddins, who won a guilty plea from Loftis in December, estimated the fraud to be 'in the neighborhood of $20 million.' Defense counsel Thomas Melsheimer, however, presented a retired FBI expert to testify that the amount was actually $10 million, or even less."

Law Firms Worried About Pellicano-Related Wiretap Suits. The California Recorder (3/28, Scheck, Schmitt) reports, "Indictments stemming from Hollywood's latest celebrity scandal have struck fear into L.A.'s legal community. But it's the civil fallout from private eye Anthony Pellicano's wiretapping indictment that instills true horror for law firms." The Recorder continues, "While top entertainment lawyer Terry Christensen is the only attorney indicted so far in connection with Pellicano, several others face litigation that could cripple their practices -- and possibly break up their firms." The Recorder adds, "The big problem, said Timothy Halloran, an expert in law firm liability at Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney in San Francisco, is that illegal activity such as wiretapping won't be covered by malpractice insurance. … 'I would expect that in the Pellicano matter, if the wiretapping was in connection with big litigation, someone who was wiretapped can make a pretty big damages claim,' Halloran said. 'Your professional liability insurance can't cover you for that.'" The Recorder notes, "That's the issue that much of the L.A. legal community is looking at these days, as a small but well-armed armada of plaintiffs takes aim at lawyers who used Pellicano for wiretaps. … Developments during the past week indicate that while Christensen may be the first lawyer indicted, another top firm -- L.A. entertainment shop Greenberg Glusker Fields Claman Machtinger & Kinsella -- may be feeling even more heat. … At least a half-dozen Greenberg Glusker attorneys are talking about leaving, according to a source within the firm. … And while some Greenberg Glusker attorneys said last week that they were confident that the firm's future was stable, others were unsure how the firm would weather Pellicano-related lawsuits."

California Business, Civic Leader Pleads Guilty To Investment Fraud. Bay City News Wires (3/27) reports, "A former president of the Moraga Chamber of Commerce and Moraga Rotary Club has pleaded guilty to nine counts of mail fraud and seven counts of wire fraud for his role in defrauding more than 30 investors out of more than $5 million." Edwin Torres "entered his plea last Friday," admitting "that he used his status…to influence potential investors to buy high-yielding Los Angeles and Orange County municipal bonds when in fact he had no intention to buy the bonds and did not do so." BCN notes, "The U.S. Attorney's office says Torres' guilty plea is the result of an investigation by the FBI in conjunction with the Contra Costa County District Attorney's Office."

Famed Coroner Resigns After Federal Indictment. The AP (3/28, Mandak) reports on Allegheny County, PA, coroner Cyril Wecht, who federal prosecutors say "used county employees, equipment, even unclaimed morgue cadavers for the benefit of his multimillion-dollar private pathology practice. … Wecht, 74, resigned from office a few days after being indicted in January on charges including fraud and theft of honest services. But he has denied any wrongdoing and continues to crisscross the country as an expert witness in murders and wrongful-death cases. He is expected to go on trial in October." The AP adds, "Buried in the 84-count indictment is the allegation that Wecht had his former county secretary type a nasty letter to Keith Sueker, a retired engineer who poked fun of Wecht's failed run for county executive in 1999. … Federal authorities say it was another instance of Wecht using a county worker for his personal benefit - in this case, political retribution. But for longtime Wecht watchers, it shows an ugly side of Wecht generally hidden from national view." The AP notes, "Wecht, who holds a law degree in addition to a medical degree, served two 10-year stretches in the elected position of coroner, first from 1970 to 1980, then from 1996 to 2006."

DeLay's Concealed Weapon License Suspended. The Washington Post (3/28, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Texas officials have suspended the former House majority leader's license to carry a concealed weapon, according to Fort Bend County court documents first revealed over the weekend by Brazosriver.com, a Web site based in his home county. Under Texas law, anyone indicted on felony charges is prohibited from packing a pistol, and DeLay was hit with campaign money-laundering charges in October." DeLay will "get his license back if the criminal charges are dropped or he's acquitted."

Program Aims To Curb Gang Violence In Prison. The Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Abate) reports on "an unusual program aimed at breaking one of the most pervasive - and violent - influences behind bars and on the streets of urban America: gangs. In a quest to overcome deeply ingrained and often fatal differences, the initiative brings together former rival gang members in one cell pod to eat, sleep, and live. … The program, 'Breaking Barriers,' offers counseling and courses - from substance abuse to poetry readings - to help overcome the causes of gang fealty and drug addiction. The goal is to get inmates who move through the Santa Clara County central jail to permanently sever ties with gangs, and thus reduce violence, when they transfer to a state prison or return to a life on the outside." The Monitor adds, "Experts consider it one of the only local programs of its kind in the country. While the initiative is still young - only two years old - it has already shown some success in rehabilitating individual lives." The Monitor notes, "Gangs are nothing new to prison life, but over the past four decades their presence has increased dramatically. One national study found that, of the nearly 2 million people incarcerated in the US, more than 43 percent associated with a gang."

Woman Posing As WPost Employee Suspected In Credit Card Scam. The Washington Post (3/28, A9, Cauvin) reports, "A woman posing as a Washington Post employee is suspected of duping dozens of the newspaper's advertisers into turning over their credit card numbers, according to The Post and the U.S.

attorney's office." The Post continues, "Using the telephone numbers placed in classified ads, the woman would call advertisers claiming that she worked for the paper, Post spokesman Eric Grant said in a statement yesterday afternoon. … The woman would explain that the advertiser's credit card number had not gone through and that she needed to run it again. After the person provided the card information, the woman would use it to start making charges to that account." The Post adds, "At least 50 people have been victims of the scam, according to a person familiar with the case who spoke on the condition of anonymity because charges have not been filed. … The identity theft scam came to the paper's attention in 2002, and The Post notified the D.C. police, the paper said. Why the investigation has moved so slowly was not immediately clear, and officials would not say when the scam began or when it ended. The inquiry is now in the hands of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, which is frequently involved in investigating identity theft, and the investigation appears to be coming to a close."

Texas Man Cautiously Returns To Society After DNA Exoneration. The New York Times (3/28, Levy) reports, "Arthur Mumphrey says he is doing his best to enjoy life these days. But after spending 18 years in prison for a rape he did not commit, he is also finding that being on the outside can be overwhelming." The Times continues, "Gov. Rick Perry pardoned Mr. Mumphrey, 42, on March 17 after a DNA test indicated that he did not sexually assault the victim, a 13-year-old seventh grader, who was forced at knifepoint into a wooded area near Conroe, about 40 miles north of Houston, and raped repeatedly on the night of Feb. 28, 1986. … Mr. Mumphrey was paroled in 2000 after serving 14 years of a 35-year sentence, but was sent back to prison two years later after failing to contact his parole officer. He points to his case as yet another example of the merits of DNA testing and the doggedness of a defense lawyer — as well as the systemic flaws of the Texas criminal justice system." The Times adds, "Mr. Mumphrey's younger brother, Charles Mumphrey, who is in jail on an unrelated crime, confessed earlier this year to participating in the rape, said Marc Brumberger, an assistant district attorney for Montgomery County. He cannot be charged, though, because the statute of limitations has expired. … A co-defendant, Steve Thomas, pleaded guilty during a 1986 trial and testified against Arthur Mumphrey in exchange for a 15-year sentence."

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Exempts Web Communications From Campaign Finance Laws. The New York Times (3/28, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports, "The Federal Election Commission ruled unanimously Monday that political communication on the Internet, including Web logs, setting up Web sites and e-mail, was not regulated by campaign finance laws." The commission, "in a 6-to-0 decision, also ruled that paid political advertisements placed on Web sites were covered by the 2002 campaign finance law, which includes restrictions on spending and contributions and bars corporations and unions from using their treasuries to purchase Web advertisements." The Washington Post (3/28, A3, Edsall, 744K) says "the 6 to 0 vote was widely expected." The Washington Times (3/28, Pfeiffer, 90K) also reports the story under the headline "C To Leave Alone Web Political Speech."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Federal Judge Refuses To Delay New Orleans Election. The AP (3/28) reports, "New Orleans residents living in Houston, Atlanta and other cities are still waiting for the absentee ballots they applied for weeks ago. No one knows how many people will come back to the city to vote. And the polling places have yet to be selected." The AP continues, "Pulling off this city's April 22 mayoral election could wind up as a fine example of democracy under trying circumstances, or a wobbly, error-filled embarrassment." tHe AP adds, 'On Monday, a federal judge refused to postpone New Orleans' first election since Hurricane Katrina, despite complaints from civil rights groups that too many blacks scattered by the storm will be unable to take part in the voting. … U.S. District Judge Ivan Lemelle told both sides -- the state and plaintiffs -- to solve any problems that might hinder displaced residents' ability to vote. 'I recognize that there is still room for improvement in that electoral process,' he said. … Still, Lemelle said going ahead with the voting will help the city rebuild."

lawman," Department of Law Enforcement Director Guy Tunnell, "in investigating the teen's death at a Panama City boot camp, Tunnell assured Floridians he would be fair and impartial." The family was worried because he "is a former sheriff of Bay County, founded the boot camp, and is friends with the current sheriff, Frank McKeithen," and "now, a series of e-mails obtained by The Miami Herald shows that at the same time his agency was investigating the camp, Tunnell kept a running commentary to McKeithen, other sheriffs and his own staff in which he let off steam and disparaged critics of his investigation and the state's boot camps. He also kept McKeithen abreast of the FDLE's efforts to keep a video -- which showed boot camp guards kneeing and punching the teen hours before his death -- from becoming public."

Voting Machine Glitches Spark Fears Of Widespread Problems In 2006. USA Today (3/28, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that problems with voting machines in the Texas and Illinois primaries "have reinforced fears that the 2006 elections may be beset with glitches. … More than 30 million Americans will be voting on unfamiliar equipment this year, after modernization required by the Help America Vote Act. Congress passed the law in 2002 to address problems stemming from the 2000 presidential election in Florida." The next test of the machines will come in May when 10 states hold primaries.

Election Law Designed To Help Disabled Vote. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/27, Sherman) reports, "Florida's 2000 election, forever linked with the notorious hanging chads, did more than expose the flaws of the nation's aging voting systems. It cleared the way for Congress to address many lingering problems with how Americans vote. … One politically active group rushed to take advantage of that movement." The Post-Gazette continues, "The Help America Vote Act, passed in early 2002, created the first legal guarantees that all disabled voters would be able to participate in the democratic process just as readily as anyone else. .. The law, known as HAVA, requires both accessible polling places and voting machines that let disabled voters make their choices privately and independently. … 'The whole disability community was pushing for that,' said Jim Dickson, vice president of the American Association of People with Disabilities, based in Washington, D.C." The Post-Gazette notes, "Prior to the 2000 election, several federal laws addressed the need for improvements in voting access, but none had HAVA's weight. If state and local governments don't acquire at least one accessible machine per polling place, they could squander millions in aid and face lawsuits from the justice department. … In Allegheny County, many disabled voters have long had to rely on family, friends or poll workers to help them operate 40-year-old lever machines. Under HAVA, that must change by the May 16 primary election."

Baltimore Housing Bias Case Enters Remedy Stage. The Baltimore Sun (3/28, Siegel) reports, "Creating thousands of new opportunities for Baltimore public housing families to live in well-off suburbs was necessary to make 'real progress' in overcoming decades of government policies that segregated residents in poor, minority areas of the city, a lawyer for the tenants told a federal judge Monday." The Sun continues, "In his opening statement in the remedy phase of a public housing desegregation case, attorney Peter Buscemi said a proposal requiring the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to provide 6,750 special housing vouchers and new and rehabilitated units over 10 years would give public housing families a 'better chance at life.' … But a lawyer for HUD countered that the proposal was 'plagued with problems and should not be implemented in any form.'" The Sun adds, "The judge does not have the authority to order the creation of new housing but can only ask the federal agency to review decisions that he found problematic, said HUD lawyer Peter Phipps. … In January 2005, U.S. District Judge Marvin J. Garbis found that HUD had violated federal fair-housing laws by failing to "affirmatively further fair housing" by taking a regional approach to the desegregation of public housing in Baltimore. … The ruling stemmed from a class action lawsuit filed in 1995 on behalf of black Baltimore public housing residents that claimed that the city and the federal government had failed to dismantle the segregated public housing system they set up in the 1930s and 1940s. Garbis absolved the city and its Housing Authority of wrongdoing."

Supreme Court Ponders Prison Rules About Reading Material. The AP (3/28, Locy) reports, "The Supreme Court struggled Monday with whether states can keep troublesome inmates from reading secular newspapers and magazines." Pennsylvania prison officials "urged the high court to allow them to use access to newspapers and magazines as an incentive to get inmates to behave themselves." The New York Times (3/28, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the case "is a class-action lawsuit that began when the prison authorities seized a copy of The Christian Science Monitor, to which an inmate, Ronald Banks, had a subscription." The lower courts "looked at the policy as a whole, and did not scrutinize its application to individual inmates."

The Washington Post (3/28, A6, Lane, 744K) reports that "at issue is the Long-Term Segregation Unit, located in Pittsburgh until a move in recent years to Fayette County, where inmates from around the state are sent after attempting to escape or assaulting guards." Prisoners "may be kept in solitary confinement 23 hours per day. They get no television, radio, newspapers, magazines or photographs, except for religious or legal publications." The Post adds, "Access to reading material is relaxed in return for good behavior. … The appeals court ruled that Pennsylvania could not enforce the policy without evidence that it achieved its stated purposes." Then-Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. "dissented, saying that a prisoner who was subjected to the restrictions for a long time may have a claim, but that in general the rules were reasonable. Yesterday, now-Justice Alito had to sit out the case, leaving his eight colleagues to weigh the policy."

Georgia Lawmakers Approve Public School Bible Courses. Georgia lawmakers yesterday passed a bill to fund elective Bible courses in public high schools. The bill, which awaits Gov. sonny Perdue's signature, would fund separate courses on the Old and New Testaments. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Fausset, 958K) that the move has sparked "concern among 1st Amendment advocates," while "generating praise from lawmakers worried that children are losing their grasp on one of Western civilization's most influential texts."

ANTITRUST:

The AP (3/28) reports, "Microsoft Corp. filed a lawsuit on Monday challenging a set of punitive measures that South Korea's antitrust regulators imposed on the U.S. software company for its alleged unfair business practices." The AP continues, "The suit, filed with the Seoul High Court, has been widely expected as Microsoft said after the December ruling by the Fair Trade Commission that it would take the case to court. … 'Microsoft continues to believe that its actions are consistent with Korean law and have benefited Korean consumers and the Korean technology industry,' the company said in a statement announcing its appeal." The AP notes, "The ruling, which was finalized in February, said that Microsoft's practice of tying certain software to Windows was an abuse of its dominant position in the market. … The commission ordered the U.S. company to pay a fine of $33.6 million and provide two separate versions of Windows: one stripped of the Windows Media Player and Windows Messenger, and the other carrying links to Web pages that allow consumers to download competing versions of such software."

FTC Gies Antitrust Nod To Merrill Lynch-BlackRock Merger. MarketWatch (3/28) reports, "Merrill Lynch & Co. has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to spin off its asset-management business and merge it with BlackRock Inc. (BLK), creating a new, independent company with nearly $1 trillion in assets under management. … The FTC said Monday that on Friday it granted Lucent early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act."

Dow Jones (3/28) reports, "As reported, Merrill Lynch has agreed to exchange its money-management business, Merrill Lynch Investment Managers, for a 49.8% stake - valued at more than $8 billion - in BlackRock, a money manager specializing in bonds. … In a press release Feb. 15, Merrill Lynch said it would have a 45% voting interest in the combined company, which will operate under the BlackRock name and be governed by a board with a majority of independent members."

Lucent, Alcatel Seek To Ease US Security Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Berman, Silver, 2.11M) reports, "Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel SA are moving toward a plan to place some of Lucent's most sensitive defense-related research under the eye of a separate board composed only of Americans, people familiar with the matter said." The move is aimed at appeasing US government security concerns." Both Congress and "elements within the U.S. defense establishment have taken a skeptical view to foreign takeover plans of late, fearing that national security could be compromised in the process. The companies' final plans, however, still could be changed."

The New York Times (3/28, Bajaj, Sorkin, 1.19M) reports, "Though the companies have said that they are discussing a 'merger of equals,' experts say the deal will probably be treated as an acquisition of an American company by a foreign entity because Alcatel of France is one and a half times the size of Lucent and the combined company will probably be based in Paris."

Alcatel Board To Review Lucent Merger Talks. The AP (3/28) reports, "Alcatel SA's board will meet Thursday to review the company's merger talks with U.S. rival Lucent Technologies Inc., the French telecom equipment maker said Monday." The AP continues, "Alcatel board members will be briefed on the 'ongoing discussions' with Lucent at the meeting, company spokesman Mark Burnworth said. … 'There won't necessarily be any conclusions,' he said, declining further comment." The AP adds, "Alcatel and Lucent announced Friday that they were making a second attempt to negotiate a merger, after previous talks in 2001 ended without a deal. … Analysts say the deal would give Alcatel a foothold in the U.S. telecoms market and help the combined company cope with growing price pressures, as larger phone and Internet operators emerge from a new wave of consolidation and demand economies of scale on their equipment purchases."

Oil Sector Mergers Tripled In Value Last Year. The Financial Times (3/28, Hoyos) reports, "Mergers and acquisitions in the oil and gas industry tripled in value last year to $160bn - the highest level since the boom year of 1998 when Exxon and Mobil merged, BP took over Amoco, and Total bought PetroFina." The Times continues, "Deals by Chinese oil and natural gas companies, meanwhile, are expected to have grown sixfold to $6bn in 2005 as they became big international players, buying assets from Ecuador to Sudan and Syria, according to an authoritative industry study." The Times adds, "The report, released tomorrow, suggests oil industry executives and government leaders have been on a frantic global buying spree, under rising pressure to secure the oil and gas needed to fuel economic expansion. … The study by Harrison Lovegrove, the UK-based corporate advisers, and John S Herold, the US research firm, is widely regarded by the industry as the most comprehensive report on M&A activity in the sector. It is expected to show that last year oil companies were willing to pay 54 per cent more for acquisitions in North America as executives bet that high oil prices were here to stay. Acquisition prices in the rest of the world shot up 350 per cent. … Excluding the former Soviet Union, prices outside North America jumped 155 per cent. But the highest prices were attracted by Canada because of its political stability and favourable tax environment."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Senate Panel Considering Mandatory Emissions Controls. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Fialka, 2.11M) reports that the Senate Energy Committee is shifting the discussion from "whether" to "how" the federal government will impose stricter emissions rules. The panel "is hearing from industry and activists about how a mandatory plan to control carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases could work. Many big businesses that resisted efforts to fight global warming are sending blueprints and companies like Southern Co. -- an Atlanta utility opposed to new controls -- have filed detailed proposals. … The energy committee has received 160 plans from companies and organizations, and members will hold a 'roundtable' next Tuesday to sift through them. It will be Congress's first review of possible regulatory mechanisms of a system of mandatory controls."

Scientific Consensus On Global Warming Influencing Politicians. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 8, 2:30, Blakemore, 8.78M) reported, "Seattle Mayor Greg Nickels has convinced 219 mayors in 39 states to agree to cut greenhouse gas emissions and not wait for the White House or Congress to mandate it. There's gathering momentum on Capitol Hill among both parties." Sen. Richard Lugar: "I'm much more concerned, and for that matter, much more concerned now than I was two or three years ago. There is no doubt that global warming is a massive problem." Blakemore: "Many politicians changed their minds after scientists changed theirs." In "just the past two years, reports and pictures from around the world of massive ice sheets melting faster than thought possible, species struggling in the new heat, even the deep ocean currents, normally ice cold, getting warmer."

Bush Approach To Global Warming Satirized. In his Washington Post column (3/28, C3), Art Buchwald satirizes the Bush Administration's approach to global warming, saying, "Bush's handlers pointed out to the president that he had not said anything about global warming, and it was becoming a sore point with the public. One adviser says, 'Let's set up a news conference and advertise the fact that the president will talk about global warming. The president agrees that it is a good idea and asks, 'Where should we hold the conference?' Another adviser answers, 'What do you think about holding a fundraiser on the Arctic Ocean?' Someone else says, 'What about on the Titanic?' 'And we'll have a big banner saying, 'Mission Accomplished.'"

Bird Flu's Possible Impact On Humans Debated. In six-article feature package, the New York Times examines several of the key issues surrounding the avian flu and its potential impacts on humans. The New York Times (3/28, McNeil, 1.19M) reports Dr. David Nabarro, chief avian flu coordinator for the United Nations, "has become gun-shy about making predictions" on the possible spread of the virus, but "describes himself as 'quite scared,' especially since the disease has broken out of Asia and reached birds in Africa, Europe and India much faster than he expected it to." Like early AIDS, he warns that the disease has still "too many unanswered questions."

On the other side of the argument, the New York Times (3/28, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports Dr. Jeremy Farrar, who has spent time researching and treating patients with avian influenza in Vietnam, "thinks it is unlikely that the virus is poised to jump species, becoming readily transmissible to humans or among them. Nor does he believe the mantra that a horrific influenza pandemic is inevitable or long overdue." Dr. Farrar believes the world "should prepare," but finds the "doomsday" predictions "unhelpful, more fantasy than fact."

In a third article, the New York Times (3/28, Altman, 1.19M) examines the public health "dilemma" about issuing pandemic warnings to the general population. For example, "If officials do issue early warnings, and nothing happens, they stand to lose credibility among people who say that scientists promoted the worst possibilities to grab more grants and waste taxpayer dollars. If officials do not issue early or timely warnings, and a pandemic occurs, critics will say the public was not informed and protected in time."

Separately, the New York Times (3/28, Grady, 1.19M) reports that researchers at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta are "studying the transmission and virulence of bird flu … trying to understand how a virus can be wildly contagious among birds but almost impossible to spread in mammals -- and what type of mutation could change that." Other articles report on the flu's impact on the global bird population and lessons that may be learned from the 1918 flu epidemic.

FBI Says Woman Arrested For Her Father's Murder On Montana Reservation. The Havre (MT) Daily News (3/28, Corner) reports FBI Salt Lake City spokesman Patrick Kiernan said yesterday that Neil Gray "was shot to death in his residence in Hays on the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation," and "Gray's daughter, Ashley Lynn Gray…is being held in connection with the crime, Kiernan said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colorado Case Raises Questions About FBI Policy Of Not Recording Interviews. The Rocky Mountain News (3/27, Vaughan) reported, "While the majority of law enforcement agencies routinely record interviews with suspects during criminal investigations, one of the biggest and most powerful ones all but refuses to tape interrogations. … The FBI's long-standing practice is in the spotlight again in the case of a Denver firefighter facing federal charges of selling illegal machine guns." After Stan Ford "was arrested last November" and "sat down with an FBI agent and a Denver police officer. But exactly what he said is in dispute." The Mountain News adds, "Supervisory Special Agent Stephen Kodak of the FBI's national office in Washington, D.C., acknowledged that taping is rare." Kodak said that "the policy is based on the belief that taping, 'if instituted right away, when the witness does not wish to be tape recorded, can inhibit full and frank discussion.'" But Denver police Lt. Jon Priest "believes taping in major cases insures accuracy."

19 Indicted In San Diego In Meth-Smuggling Case. Washington Times/UPI (3/27) reports 19 people "were indicted in San Diego in an operation that allegedly used children to carry methamphetamines over the U.S.-Mexico border. The Drug Enforcement Administration, in a release Monday, said the group led by Jorge Arreola-Gomez smuggled large amounts of methamphetamines into the United States. … Authorities said they seized more than 140 pounds of methamphetamine, 20 pounds of pseudoephedrine used to make methamphetamines and a large amount of U.S. currency."

The AP (3/27) writes, "Jorge Arreola-Gomez was among 19 people named in the indictment unsealed Friday by the U.S. Attorney's Office alleging that the defendants used numerous couriers, many of them teenagers, to smuggle methamphetamine across the U.S.-Mexico border."

Former Baton Rouge Officer Accused Of Drug Trafficking Remains In Jail. Baton Rouge's Advocate (3/28) reports a former Baton Rouge police officer will remain in jail until trial. Daryl W. Davis "pleaded innocent Monday afternoon in Baton Rouge federal court. … A federal grand jury indicted Davis last week on one count of possession with intent to distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine. … U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents investigated Davis for more than a year before arresting him last week."

Woman's Testimony Examined In Arizona Murder, Drugs Case. The Tucson (AZ) Citizen (3/27) reports Lourdes Lopez's friends "didn't believe everything she said. Federal agents didn't, either. Now, jurors will weigh Lopez's credibility when they decide whether Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz ordered the death of Dr. Brian Stidham." The Tucson Citizen goes on to outline various conversations Lopez is said to have had with DEA agents, along with situations where she is accused of lying about her involvement with Schwartz.

California Medical Marijuana Case Focuses On Right-To-Life Issue. The AP (3/27, Kravets) reports a lawyer for a California woman whose doctor "says marijuana is the only medicine keeping her alive asked an appeals court Monday to prevent federal drug agents from ever arresting her. The case, focusing on whether the gravely ill have a right to marijuana to keep them alive when legal drugs fail, is likely to reach the U.S. Supreme Court soon. … The latest legal wrangling once again highlights the tension between the federal government, which declares marijuana an illegal controlled substance with no medical value, and the 11 states, including California and Rhode Island, allowing medical marijuana for patients with a doctor's recommendation."

In a sidebar, the AP (3/27) outlines medical marijuana Supreme Court cases.

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (3/27, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Medical marijuana and the right to fight for life -- that's the issue facing the federal appeals court in San Francisco. They are hearing arguments whether it should be legalized in very serious and special cases."

CNN (3/27, 11:00) later reported, "A federal court in San Francisco is hearing arguments in the latest effort to make medical marijuana legal. Judges are deciding whether marijuana can be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain. It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers. The Bush administration describes the lawsuit as baseless and says [there is] no fundamental right to use or distribute marijuana."

MSNBC (3/27, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "A federal appeals court is hearing arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue of medical marijuana. Today's case narrows the issue to [the] right-to-life theory that marijuana should be allowed if it's the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain. The Bush administration says the lawsuit is without merit.

Local TV Coverage. KGO-TV, San Francisco (3/27, 11:00 a.m.) reported, "An Oakland woman's legal battle against the federal government over medical marijuana takes another turn today. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Pasadena is hearing oral arguments today in Angel Raich's challenge. She says [she uses marijuana] to ease chronic pain caused by an inoperable brain tumor."

KNTV-TV, San Francisco (3/27, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "Oakland medical marijuana patient Angel Raich is renewing her fight to legally smoke pot. It comes less than a year after the US Supreme Court ruled against her, but this afternoon her lawyers will try to persuade a federal appeals court that keeping her from using medical marijuana burdens from living a life of freedom without pain."

Baltimore Detective Faces Federal Charges, Calls Heroin Exchange Policing Technique. The Baltimore Sun (3/27, Dolan) reports William A. King, one of two Baltimore narcotics detectives "accused of selling illegal drugs testified at his federal trial Monday that confiscated heroin he gave to a confidential informant was part of an off-the-books, but acceptable, policing technique designed to apprehend some of the city's top drug dealers."

British Government Accused Of Reneging Deal With Poppy Farmers. According to UPI (3/27, Harding), a new report by the Senlis Council think tank "claims the British government has failed to honor its pledge to compensate Afghani farmers for eradicating poppy crops, causing widespread anger in the volatile south of the country and leading to increased support for Taliban insurgents. … Based on interviews with farmers in the Helmand province…the group claims that U.K. counter-narcotics officers promised local farmers $350 for every fifth of a hectare of poppies they destroyed."

New Jersey Lawmakers Seek ATF Release Of Gun Data. The AP (3/28) reports, "Two federal legislators from New Jersey said Monday they will introduce proposals to once again make public data that is collected about firearms used in crimes." The AP continues, "Sen. Robert Menendez and Rep. Steve Rothman, both Democrats, said they would introduce legislation this week to undo restrictions on the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms' ability to share information on gun tracing with the public. … 'There is absolutely no good reason to hide gun crime data from the public,' Rothman said in a joint statement with Menendez. A member of the House Appropriations Committee, Rothman added that he would work to see the ATF use its resources to inform the public about gun trafficking and help prosecutors enforce the law." The AP adds, "While New Jersey has some of the strictest gun control laws in the nation, ATF data from 2001 -- the last time the bureau publicly released the information -- indicated that firearms used in Garden State crimes overwhelmingly came from out of state." The AP notes, "The author of the amendment that Menendez and Rothman are seeking to overturn said ATF already is permitted to release that information to the public. … Chuck Knapp, a spokesman for Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., told The Associated Press on Monday that the ATF is free to release aggregate information about guns used in crimes, such as percentage breakdown of where federal registries say guns were originally sold."

ATF Sees Similarities Between Bombs In Colorado, Tennessee. The AP (3/28) reports, "Federal investigators say 'strong similarities' exist between three bombs that blew up near some Colorado homes and another that exploded last month in Murfreesboro (Tennessee.)" The AP continues, "No injuries have been reported in any of the explosions, but that hasn't diminished efforts to locate the prime suspect -- 54-year-old Robert Burke. … He was fired two years ago from the Serco Group, a British firm which operates the air traffic control tower at Walker Field Airport in Grand Junction, Colorado." The AP adds, "The bomb that exploded on February first in Murfreesboro was on the roof of the Serco project management office. … Federal officials say bombs placed near homes in Grand Junction went off near of Serco and Federal Aviation Administration workers."

Tennessee Man Sentenced To 20 Years For Church Arsons. The AP (3/28) reports, "A man who pleaded guilty to burning two churches in a string of arsons has been sentenced to 20 years in prison." Henry Dibrell "was charged with setting fires at two predominantly black churches and five houses in Sparta, a town of 5,000 people about 75 miles southeast of Nashville. No one was hurt in the July 8 fires." The AP notes, "Dibrell was arrested within days of the fires after an investigation led by the FBI, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and state bomb and arson investigators."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Panel Approves Immigration Reform Bill Containing Bush Proposals. The Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday reached consensus on an immigration reform bill that not only provides for a guest worker program but also gives undocumented immigrants a path towards citizenship. Media coverage describes the development as a win for President Bush. Typical of the coverage was a New York Times story (3/28, Swarns), which says, "With Republicans deeply divided, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted on Monday to legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants and ultimately to grant them citizenship, provided that they hold jobs, pass criminal background checks, learn English and pay fines and back taxes." The panel also "voted to create a vast temporary worker program that would allow roughly 400,000 foreigners to come to the United States to work each year and would put them on a path to citizenship as well."

USA Today (3/28, Jackson, Kiely, 2.31M) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee "gave a strong bipartisan endorsement Monday to…Bush's plans for overhauling immigration laws," while the Washington Post (3/28, A1, Weisman, 744K) headlines its story "Senators Back Guest Workers; Panel's Measure Sides With Bush," and says the Judiciary Committee "voted 12 to 6 to side with…Bush's general approach to an immigration issue that is dividing the country, fracturing the Republican Party and ripening into one of the biggest political debates of this election year." The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Gaouette, Reynolds, 958K) also says the committee vote "marked a victory for immigrant advocates and for…Bush, who has urged Congress for two years to create a temporary worker program but has argued against allowing those immigrants to gain citizenship." White House "reaction was upbeat. 'We are pleased to see the Senate moving forward on legislation,' spokesman Scott McClellan said in a statement." McClellan continued, "The President believes comprehensive reform is needed if we are going to have a rational, orderly and secure immigration system. … t is a difficult issue that will require compromise and tough choices, but the important thing at this point is that the process is moving forward."

The AP (3/28, Espo) reports that "at several critical points, committee Democrats showed unity while Republicans splintered. In general, GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike DeWine of Ohio, who is seeking re-election this fall, sided with Democrats." That "created a majority that allowed them to shape the bill to their liking." Sen. Dianne Feinstein "won approval for a five-year program to permit as many as 1.5 million agriculture workers into the country. … In addition, Kennedy prevailed on a proposal to allow an additional 400,000 green cards for future immigrants, regardless of the industry where they find jobs." Sen. Jon Kyl "and other conservatives said anything but a requirement for illegal immigrants to return home amounted to amnesty, and he said he had national opinion on his side."

Kyl and Sen. John Cornyn write in the Houston Chronicle (3/28, 581K) that any solution to the immigration problem must "restore respect for the law and provide sufficient resources to control the border. And because there can be no amnesty, reform must not reward illegal activity." They add, "Immigration reform ultimately must be about legal immigration — not creating a new process that only benefits illegal aliens. Immigrants must abide by the rule of law and receive equal treatment. We hope to build consensus around reform that will restore integrity to our immigration system and meet the needs of society, the economy and national security." The Washington Times (3/28, Hurt, 90K) headlines its story "Panel OKs 'Amnesty' Bill," and says the bill "would put millions of illegal aliens on a path to US citizenship, would let them stay here while applying and would not punish their unlawful entry as a felony, contrary to a House-passed bill."

Knight Ridder (3/28, Montgomery) reports that "under the guest-worker plan, foreigners must pay fees of up to $500 and show that they have US jobs waiting." They "would receive three-year visas, which could be renewed for another three years. After four years, they could apply for green cards." The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 3, 3:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported the Senate Judiciary bill "goes to the full Senate for debate but it's far from a done deal."

Media reports also stress the "division" in GOP ranks and its possible consequences as the midterm elections draw near. The Washington Post (3/28, A4, Fletcher, Murray, 744K) reports "both Republicans and Democrats risk alienating coveted supporters as they attempt to find the right balance between toughening enforcement and expanding legal opportunities for millions of low-skill foreign workers to take jobs in the United States." The debate "poses multiple challenges for both political parties, while offering no clearly expedient solution. Two huge electoral prizes, the Southwest and Florida, are potentially up for grabs, as are millions of Hispanic votes elsewhere." But also "in play are the votes of angry residents in border states and beyond who feel overwhelmed by the rising tide of illegal immigration."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Malveaux) reported that "what happens in the next 24 to 48 hours is really critically important because it could really impact what the Congress looks like in November, even, perhaps, who is going to sit in the White House 2008. Republican strategists who I've spoken to say that this really is a very important test, a test of leadership for the President and clout. His critics argue that he's lost both, specifically the Hispanic community."

Highlighting the GOP split on immigration, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said yesterday he was "disappointed" with the bill. He said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (3/27), "The Judiciary Committee did report out a final bill that I'm a little disappointed in because I think it will be characterized as amnesty, in the sense it adopted provisions that do not require people who have been here illegally to go back to their native countries before having a green card." CQ (3/28, Sandler, Crowley) reports that before a Senate debate on the committee bill begins, Frist "must agree to swap the Judiciary draft for his own legislation (S 2454), which focuses on border security and enforcement without a guest worker proposal. Late Monday, Frist said a cloture vote on the motion to proceed to his bill scheduled for Tuesday morning would be postponed until 2:15 p.m., allowing time for him to meet with Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., about the next step."

In addition, Rep. James Sensenbrenner was asked on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (3/27) about the Senate Judiciary Committee's approval of an immigration reform bill which includes a guest worker program. Sensenbrenner said, "It's appalling because the Senate Judiciary Committee is repeating the mistake that Congress made 20 years ago when it passed the Simpson- Mazzoli bill. The Simpson-Mazzoli bill granted amnesty to illegal aliens who were in the country at the time and also set up a system of employer sanctions to try to prevent employers from hiring any more illegal aliens. Well, the employer sanctions were never enforced. The amnesty was a big flop because people were afraid of losing their job. And instead of having two million illegal aliens, we have 10 to 12 million now."

The Hill (3/28, O'Connor) reports "GOP leaders in the House are hoping to get out in front on the issue by reminding voters that they have already passed a series of tough bills to crack down in illegal immigration." House Speaker Dennis Hastert "is expected to address immigration reform in a speech later this week before the National Urban League, and the Republican Conference office has distributed talking points lauding border-security legislation that has passed the House." Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said, "Our message in this debate is that the House passed a border-security bill with the understanding that America is a nation of immigrants, a nation at war and a nation of laws. … This is a complex issue, and the House looks forward to working with the Senate and the administration as the process moves forward."

Bush Urges Civility. Also yesterday, the President again weighed in on the immigration debate, calling for civility. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 4, 1:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported Bush is "on a potential collision course with some conservatives over the immigration bill." Bush "issued a clear warning to Capitol Hill at a swearing in ceremony for some of America's newest citizens." Bush: "No one should pretend that immigrants are threats to American identity." Axelrod: "For the second time in two months, the President finds himself at odds with parts of his base. Last month, there was the ports deal, this time, there is no third party to offer an easier way out should Congress ultimately present the President with an immigration bill that lacks a guest worker program." CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Blitzer) said the President is trying "to put a kinder face." However, added CNN, "let's face it: It's a bare knuckles political brawl splitting the Republican party."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Kronholz, 2.11M) reports Bush "made his strongest appeal yet for a law that would provide employers with enough immigrant workers to keep the economy humming. … Even with the president's backing, though, immigration overhaul faces an uphill fight this week when it reaches the Senate floor." The Financial Times (3/28, Daniel, Alden) says Bush "issued a strong defence of the role of immigrants in American history as he warned legislators not to 'play on people's fears or try to pit neighbours against each other' in the intensifying debate about immigration reform." Said Bush, "We have a chance to move beyond tired choices and the harsh attitudes of the past." ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 2, 2:15, Raddatz, 8.78M) said Bush "was making a point today of pushing his own proposals," even as he "urged critics to keep the debate civil and dignified." The President wants "to accommodate illegal workers already in the country, while others, including many in the President's own party, want to prosecute the workers as felons."

The Washington Times (3/28, Dinan, 90K) says Bush "made a strong statement against amnesty, telling 30 new citizens at DAR Constitution Hall that it would be unfair to them to let illegal aliens jump the line for citizenship." NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 2, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) also reported Bush "said he opposes amnesty for the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already here, but some senators today said there should be a way for those with roots in the community to earn the right to stay." Sen. Dianne Fienstein, California: "They pay taxes, their children are Americans, they go to schools, they're good citizens, and they're needed."

Pro-Immigrant Protests Continue In Several Cities. NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 2, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The sheer number of protesters turning out for rallies in support of immigrants has shocked even the organizers. Thousands of people marched and rallied in Detroit today, just one of several cities that have drawn huge numbers over the past two weeks."

The New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) reports the "wave of angry protests" over the proposals under scrutiny on Capitol Hill continued in several US cities. In Los Angeles, about 22,000 "mostly Hispanic" students walked out of school, as did students in several Los Angeles suburbs. In San Francisco, about 1,000 demonstrators marched on the offices of Senate Judiciary Democrat Dianne Feinstein. In Detroit, "Hispanic business owners closed their shops in protest" and about 4,000 people appeared at a rally. A smaller rally took place in Boston. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Cho, Gorman, 958K) says the Southern California school walkouts "are believed to eclipse in size the demonstrations that occurred during the anti-Proposition 187 campaign in 1994 and even a famous student walkout for Chicano rights in 1968."

At the US Capitol, "hundreds of immigration advocates" demonstrated, the Washington Times (3/28, Summers, 90K) reports, with crowd estimates ranging "from U.S. Capitol Park Police officers' 1,000 to organizers' 3,000." In its Metro section, the Washington Post (3/28, B8, Shapira, 744K) reports that eight middle schoolers walked out of a Northern Virginia school, while "about 250" high school students held demonstrations. As the Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Oliver, 61K) writes, "The strength of 'Latino power' has been evident in recent days at protests in many US cities."

The Washington Times (3/28, Taylor, 90K) writes that "the Roman Catholic Church, dozens of grass-roots coalitions and Spanish-language radio disc jockeys have helped fuel" the protests. Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights organizer Marissa Graciosa "described the effort as 'the beginning of an immigration civil rights movement.'" The Washington Post (3/28, A1, Pomfret, Geis, 744K) also notes the talk of "the dawning of a new civil rights movement," with activists "drawing parallels with the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Chicano labor activist Cesar Chavez." The Post says the "grass-roots movement of immigrant churchgoers, union members, businessmen, media personalities and laborers" hopes to "use the power of their numbers to move the debate." The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Watanabe, Beccera, 958K) profiles several of the "Spanish-language radio personalities" who joined together to help turn a march "initially expected to draw fewer than 20,000" into "a massive march that police estimated at 500,000 and said was one of the largest demonstrations in Los Angeles' history."

Polls Show Broad Concern About Illegal Immigration. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 3, 3:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported "polls show 75% of Americans say the US is not doing enough to keep illegal immigrants from entering the country -- and this is key: A majority of Americans say they're more likely to vote for a candidate who favors tighter controls on illegal immigration." The Washington Times (3/28, Harper, 90K) surveys several recent polls on immigration, concluding "most Americans are concerned about the financial impact of illegal immigration and fret over porous borders, lax enforcement and easygoing policies that could reward or encourage lawbreakers." A Quinnipiac poll found 88% of registered voters, including 83% of "children or grandchildren of immigrants," think illegal immigration is a "serious problem." Meanwhile, a Gallup poll of investors found that while 84% "said illegals mostly took jobs Americans didn't want," 62% still said they "hurt the national investment climate."

Roll Call (3/28, Winston) also samples the surveys under the headline "Check The Polls, Not The Protests, On Immigration." Roll Call writes that "the views of most of the people marching in the streets of L.A. and other cities last weekend bear little or no resemblance to the majority of public opinion in this country" on the subject. For example, a January Time poll found 63% think illegal immigration is "an extremely or very serious problem," and an October 2005 New Models poll found 58% think "military troops should be used for border security." A Fox News poll, also from last October, found a slim majority in support of a "2,000-mile security fence along the U.S.-Mexico border."

Undocumented Immigrants Seen As Key Part Of US Economy. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 5, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Illegal immigrants fill millions of unskilled, low-wage jobs in this country and have a vital role in our economy," and "now make up nearly five percent of the American workforce, according to a recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center. And in some industries, the numbers show, they've become a critical part of the labor pool."

USA Today (3/28, Kiely, 2.31M) reports on the guest worker debate on its front page, profiling a nursery company in a Cleveland suburb where "of the 350 employees hired to work the March through December busy season, 271 are Mexican nationals with visas from a 'guest worker' program." USA Today says their presence in an Ohio town "illustrates how much foreign migrant labor means to the economy" and underscores why the upcoming Senate debate "is so explosive."

Activists Try To Shame Employers Who Hire Undocumented Workers. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 3, 2:00, Vargas, 8.78M) reported on the efforts of activists in Lake Forest, California, who "trying to catch employers in the act of picking up illegal immigrants. They want to shame them into stopping, by posting photographs on their website, WeHireAliens.com." The group "has posted the names of 843 companies from coast-to-coast, ranging from major corporations."

Federal Troops Help CBP Increase Apprehensions Of Illegal Border Crossers. The Washington Times (3/28, Seper, 90K) writes that a report to the Senate Armed Services Committee showed a net 60% increase in apprehensions of illegal US-Mexico border-crossers by US Customs and Border Protection last October after federal troops were deployed to assist. The "Texas-based Stryker-armored reconnaissance, surveillance and target acquisition squadron helped CBP agents capture 2,000 illegal border crossers in New Mexico and Arizona."

More Commentary. In a Wall Street Journal (3/28, A20, 2.11M) op-ed, Council on Foreign Relations senior fellow and Columbia economist Jagdish Bhagwati writes, "The profusion of proposals by politicians of left and right, the taking to the streets" by opponents of "the draconian House bill, and the agonized appeal by President Bush (a real mensch who has put his politics where his principles are, and where ours should be) that 'America is a nation of immigrants' (and 'also a nation of laws'), all underline the fact that there is now a compelling sense of public urgency about the immigration debate. … The proper objectives of American immigration reform…are twofold: to 'gain control of the border' (i.e., to have the inflow of migrants determined exclusively by legal admissions) and to treat immigrants humanely."

In a Washington Times (3/28, 90K) op-ed, American Research Foundation President Phil Kent writes, "More Americans must understand that Mexico's government, far from being a friend, is actively working to subvert our country's laws and political institutions. Not since the heyday of expansionist Soviet communism has there been such an organized effort to undermine our nation. If our borders are not controlled and immigration law enforced, will we truly be a 'United States' in another 10 years or a completely balkanized, multicultural society with English downgraded as the common tongue?"

In his Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "There are an estimated 12 million immigrants in the United States illegally. That many people don't just fade into the woodwork. The fact is, we see undocumented immigrants every day. … You probably don't know where they live. You probably don't know their children's names or where they go to school. You probably don't know what it was like for them to buy a car or even get a driver's license. You probably don't know where they get medical care. If you did know these things about individual immigrants…I think you would find the debate in Congress almost grotesque."

TAX:

Former KPMG Tax Partner Pleads Guilty. The New York Times (3/28, Browning, Moynihan) reports, "The government's criminal case against 17 former KPMG employees over sales of questionable tax shelters took an unexpected turn yesterday when one of them, David Rivkin, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and tax evasion." The Times continues, "Mr. Rivkin, who was a KPMG partner in San Diego, agreed to cooperate with the government as part of his plea. His cooperation may help federal prosecutors in Manhattan build a case against the remaining defendants as well as help prosecutors in their widening inquiry into other accounting firms, banks, law firms and others that worked with KPMG to sell bogus tax shelters, lawyers not involved in the case said. … 'Obviously, this is a person who was in a position to know and understand the inner workings of everything, so this is good news for the prosecution,' said William B. Mateja, a tax lawyer and former Justice Department lawyer who has prosecuted fraud cases."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Davies, Reilly) reports, "Mr. Rivkin is one of 17 former executives at the giant accounting firm to be charged in connection with the sale of the questionable products. The other two defendants are an outside lawyer and investment adviser who helped KPMG structure and sell the products. … Mr. Rivkin's plea deal is expected to increase pressure on the other 18 defendants scheduled to go to trial in the fall in what is seen as one of the most complex and wide-ranging tax cases ever brought by federal prosecutors. New York-based KPMG last year reached its own deal with prosecutors, agreeing to pay $456 million and admit criminal wrongdoing as part of a deferred-prosecution pact. The pact allowed the firm to avoid a criminal indictment."

The AP (3/28, Neumeister) reports, "Rivkin admitted that he conspired with others between January 1999 and May 2004 to prepare and execute false documents so that clients could file false tax returns. … He also admitted that he took steps to conceal the existence of fraudulent tax shelters from the Internal Revenue Service and avoided registering the shelters with the IRS by claiming attorney-client privileges. …

In pleading guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion, Rivkin signed an agreement to cooperate with prosecutors, who could then ask the judge to consider giving Rivkin a more lenient sentence rather than the years he might face in prison. Sentencing was set for Feb. 9, 2007."

Court Orders New Hampshire Tax Preparer To Turn Over Documents To IRS. The AP (3/28) reports, "A tax preparer has run into legal trouble with the IRS. … The federal court in Concord (NH) has ordered Mark Loll of Peterborough (NH), who runs a company called Tax-Tactics, to turn over his customer list and copies of tax returns whenever the IRS asks. Federal law requires tax preparers to do both." The AP continues, "The order stems from a December complaint alleging that Loll failed to comply with an IRS request to provide copies of the returns or a list with the customers' identifying information. … The court also ordered Loll to stop 'asserting frivolous unrealistic positions on tax returns he prepares.' … The Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 federal tax return preparers and promoters since 2001."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Holding Off-The-Record Briefings With Media Groups. The New York Times (3/28, Seelye, 1.19M) reports President Bush has "been holding informal off-the-record sessions with major news organizations over the last several days. Starting Thursday, he began meeting with groups of about a half-dozen reporters from newspapers, television, news agencies and magazines." One reporter who attended a briefing said "they have discussed a variety of issues including the war in Iraq." The New York Times, "which was invited to attend a session today, has declined to participate."

The Washington Post (3/28, A14, Babington, 744K) reports Bush "has been waging a private campaign that has included off-the-record sessions with White House reporters." One gathering, "which took place Thursday in the White House residence, was an unusual gesture by Bush, who has agreed to comparatively few lengthy exchanges with reporters during his five years in office." Last week's session "involved reporters from several prominent broadcast and print outlets, including ABC News and The Washington Post."

AARP Intensifying Promotion Of Medicare Prescription Drug Program. Roll Call (3/28, Ben Pershing) reports with the "deadline fast approaching for seniors to sign up for the Medicare prescription drug benefit, the on-again, off-again partnership between Congressional Republicans and AARP to promote the program appears to be back on." The "35-million-member seniors group announced last week that it was 'launching an expansive advertising campaign to help educate Americans about the benefits of the program and how to enroll, especially for those with limited incomes.'" AARP spokesman Steve Hahn "said Monday the group was prepared to spend "several million dollars" on print and radio ads in 44 cities in advance of the May 15 deadline for seniors to enroll in the drug program without a penalty. That's music to the ears of GOP lawmakers, who until now have expressed disappointment at AARP's relatively modest efforts to promote the GOP-backed plan after prominently endorsing it prior to passage."

Administration To Drop Double-Enrollees From One Plan. The New York Times (3/28, Pear, 1.19M) reports the Bush Administration "notified hundreds of thousands of Medicare beneficiaries on Monday that they were listed on the rolls of two prescription drug plans and would soon be dropped from one. They will retain coverage under the other plan." The notices "are supposed to clear up confusion resulting from errors and discrepancies in the enrollment records of Medicare's new prescription drug program. But some state officials and advocates for older Americans said the federal effort could create new confusion." Christina Pearson, "a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, estimated that 500,000 people could receive notices as part of the 'enrollment reconciliation process.'"

Gingrey Says Democratic Criticism Of Drug Plan Costs Seniors Money. In an op-ed in The Hill (3/28), Rep. Phil Gingrey says, "Partisan politics is keeping millions of senior citizens from learning about and enrolling in a new program that is saving seniors an average of $1,100 a year on prescription-drug costs." Marketplace competition for the prescription drug benefit "is working. Premiums are a third lower than expected, and seniors are saving up to 50 percent off their monthly medication costs. To top it off, the Congressional Budget Office recently announced the program would cost $5 billion less than projected." Seniors "have less than two months left to enroll in a plan without paying a higher premium penalty. And yet there are Democrats in this Congress who are playing politics with our seniors' health by holding town hall meetings to encourage seniors not to enroll."

Nicholson Praises VA Healthcare System As Model. The Washington Post (3/28, A21, Lee, 744K) reports that in his "state of the VA" speech yesterday, Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson noted that when "Hurricane Katrina forced the relocation from New Orleans to Houston of hundreds of Veterans Affairs hospital patients, electronic medical records enabled doctors and nurses to treat the sick and injured without skipping a beat." Nicholson "cited electronic health records as one reason the VA health-care system is 'a model for our nation' and said his department, with 234,000 employees, is 'truly one of America's good-news stories.'"

House Centrists Seek More Funding For Social Programs. The Hill (3/28, Young) reports centrist Republicans in the House "hope to replicate the recent success of their Senate counterparts by boosting spending on health, welfare and education programs this year." Rep. Mike Castle "and other centrists plan to hold a press briefing today in the Capitol basement to seek bigger budgets for programs such as the National Institutes of Health, student loans, heating assistance and job training."

Conaway Offers Plan To Cut Federal Spending. In a Roll Call op-ed (3/28), Rep. Mike Conaway, who is also a CPA, offers his suggestions to reining in the Federal budget deficit, such as "no new federal programs," "line-item veto reform," "reduction in mandatory spending growth," and making President Bush's "tax cuts permanent." These suggestions, "if applied, will significantly impact how the federal government manages our money. Eliminating ineffective government programs, reducing growth of massive government entitlements and passing procedural measures for real budget reform do not sound particularly exciting, but such actions are necessary."

Bush Digs Into The Bureaucracy To Improve Government Services. The White House Bulletin/US News (3/27) reported President Bush "and his inner circle are well aware that another management disaster such as the failed federal response to Hurricane Katrina could tarnish many Republican candidates for Congress in this fall's mid-term elections. So Bush and White House Chief of Staff Andy Card have put in place a number of new systems to prevent such foulups in the future." Bush has "always asked his staff lots of questions to make sure he fully understands what's going on, and he has stepped up that effort." Chief of Staff Card said, "He's not afraid to stick a cattle prod in the system and motivate faster action consistent with his expectations." Card says Bush is "often frustrated by the pace of the bureaucracy." Card said, "He doesn't want us to defend the government. He wants us to produce results." Card says "he and Bush will be more vigilant than ever when hurricane season starts later this year. In addition, to prevent any more firestorms like the furor over the administration's proposal to let a Dubai-owned company operate six US seaports, Card requires his staff to update him regularly on what other foreign ownership deals are in the pipeline, so he can evaluate them and not allow the President to be blind-sided again."

White House Withdraws Sanborn Nomination. In what the Washington Times/UPI (3/28, Waterman) calls "continuing fallout from the collapse" of the DP World deal, the Bush Administration yesterday withdrew the nomination of David Sanborn, one of the company's executives to run the US Maritime Administration. White House spokeswoman Erin Healy "said the withdrawal was at Mr. Sanborn's request, which was made in a letter to the president yesterday." Healy "would not comment on whether the move was connected with the sudden end of DP World's proposed takeover of operations at terminals in six U.S. ports, the result of the Arab company's takeover of Britain's Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co."

Snowe Concerned SBA Has Slowed Hurricane Loan Process. The AP (3/28, Jordan) reports Sen. Olympia Snowe said in a March 23 letter to Small Business Administrator Hector Barreto that the departure of 682 disaster assistance employees from the agency troubled her "at a time when efficiency and production are of such high importance." Meanwhile, "Calling the loan application process 'a high priority,' SBA spokeswoman Anne Marie Frawley said the agency is looking to local banks and private firms to help speed recovery aid to hurricane victims." Though the agency "has approved $6.7 billion in disaster loans to Gulf Coast businesses, homeowners and renters whose properties were damaged by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita," Snowe spokesman Chris

Chichester said "only $590 million has been distributed thus far to applicants."

Federal Judge Refuses To Delay New Orleans Mayoral Election. A hearing was held yesterday as to whether New Orleans' mayoral election should be held April 22, after the NAACP and other civil rights groups had argued that displaced voters having to pay for transportation to the city would be the "modern equivalent of a poll tax." The AP (3/28) reports US District Judge Ivan Lemelle "on Monday refused to delay" the election, "telling both sides to solve any problems that might hinder displaced residents' ability to vote." He "said voting will help the city rebuild, but he warned that its residents have already lost trust in institutions."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Blitzer) reported, "Civil rights groups had raised concerns that residents displaced by the storm would not be able to cast ballots. The judge ordered both sides in the case to identify and solve any problems that might hinder voter turnout."

GOP Desire For Change Shifting From White House To Rumsfeld. The White House Bulletin/US News (3/27) reported there has been "a shift in some of the behind-the-scenes griping over recent missteps in the Administration, especially over the war in Iraq. Some senior Republicans are beginning to think that firing people on the White House staff won't make much difference in improving management and outreach, and may actually make matters worse by creating turmoil in the West Wing at a very sensitive time." White House insiders also "don't want to deprive President Bush of valued confidants, whose loyalty and company he prizes. What makes more sense, they say, is to have Bush force Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld out of his job. That would encourage the Pentagon brass to reconsider the current policies in Iraq and elsewhere, and might encourage fresh thinking."

NHTSA To Release New Fuel Economy Rules For Trucks. The National Highway Traffic Administration this week is expected to announce new fuel economy rules for trucks. USA Today (3/28, O'Donnell, 2.31M) reports, "The rules could pressure automakers to improve the mileage of their heftiest vehicles, often known as 'three-quarter-ton' or 'one-ton' trucks. And they could create, for automakers, a bewildering array of fuel-economy standards that could vary almost from model to model."

Report Provides Guidance For Switching To Pay-For-Performance Systems. The Washington Post (3/28, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Creating fair pay-for-performance systems in the government will require effective ways of evaluating job performance and well-trained supervisors, according to a report from the Merit Systems Protection Board. … The report from the board, a quasi-judicial agency that hears appeals from employees facing major disciplinary action and that helps oversee the civil service, comes at a timely moment for the federal workforce. At least half of the workforce seems likely to shift into new pay systems in the next few years." The Post adds, "The MSPB report, which goes to the White House and Congress, provides a road map for federal employees and supervisors who are uncertain about the ingredients that go into performance-based pay systems. The 43-page report (at http://www.mspb.gov in the 'studies' section) offers a balanced view of what's at stake when adopting new compensation strategies."

Frist Says Deal Close On Lobbying Reform Legislation. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday began negotiations with Senate Democrats on legislation to curb the influence of lobbyists. The Washington Times (3/28, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that Frist told reporters that he is working with Democrats "to work out a compromise and he thinks the Senate is 'very close' to completing the bill."

Roll Call (3/28, Newmyer) reports that "leading lawmakers" say "they hope to wrap up work" on a bill by the end of the day." Roll Cal adds, "The path back to lobbying reform was cleared when Senate leadership reached an agreement with Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) to set aside his proposal for an amendment on foreign ownership of ports. … Instead, Senators will vote today on an amendment offered by Sens. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) that would ban the long-held Senate practice of allowing Members to hamstring legislation with anonymous holds." After that, the Senate "could move to a prearranged package of amendments, which have yet to be determined, or else Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) could choose to limit debate by calling for cloture on the measure."

More Controversial Issues Loom. The Washington Post (3/28, A21, Babington, 744K) reports that as if "the debates over immigration and the Iraq war weren't contentious enough, Congress is about to embark on some really hot-button issues: flag burning, same-sex marriage and censuring the president." The Senate Judiciary Committee "has scheduled a Friday hearing on Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing warrantless surveillance of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails." Meanwhile, "interest groups on the left and right are preparing for showdowns over flag desecration and same-sex marriage in June, when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has scheduled floor votes on the always-controversial issues."

Democrats Are More Concerned About Limits On 527 Groups. The Washington Post (3/28, A3, Edsall, 744K) reports that Democrats "are a lot more worried about proposals to impose sharp limits on spending by tax-exempt, non-party political groups." According to the Post, 527 groups "are viewed by the party establishment as disruptive, encouraging conservative primary challenges to moderate incumbents as much as contributing to the defeat of Democrats. Democrats, by contrast, tend to view the independent groups with gratitude rather than resentment -- because they are doing essential political work that is not being done by others." The parties "disparate approaches to building election treasures and machinery underpin Democratic opposition to and Republican support for enactment of tough, new restrictions on the independent 527 committees."

Nationals Fear Fallout From Abramoff Scandal. A front page in the Washington Post (3/28, A1, Heath, 744K) reports that while the return of a professional baseball team to Washington "provided a new venue for lobbyists to entertain members of Congress and their staff at RFK Stadium, just 20 blocks east of the Capitol," Nationals executives "are concerned that a significant piece of their business could be affected in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff bribery and corruption scandal, which is leading many lobbyists and elected officials to reconsider how and where they do business. … Nationals President Tony Tavares said the team already has had some 'push back' from lobbyists who were ticket holders a year ago, and it has led to the cancellation of ticket plans for about 100 prime seats at RFK."

Author Urges Congress To Rein In Lobbyists. In the Financial Times (3/28) author Michael Massing writes about the negative influence of corporate lobbying, saying that "it often takes years for the short-sightedness of corporate lobbying to become apparent. In the short term, the gains wrung through lobbyists and campaign contributions might seem impressive. Over time, though, lobbying, in foiling measures designed to promote the public good, can undermine the fortunes of the very industries doing the lobbying. It is yet another reason Congress should hold firm in its effort to rein in Washington's influence peddlers."

Democrats To Unveil National Security Platform. Roll Call (3/28, Billings) reports Democratic leaders will try to "convince the electorate of their military muscle," unveiling a national security platform in which they "will vow to eliminate Osama bin Laden and destroy al-Qaida." Party leaders "will focus on five major policy areas for a safer America, both within its borders and beyond. Perhaps most ambitious among the party's objectives are calls to defeat terrorists and eradicate weapons of mass destruction." Congressional Democrats "will formally outline their national security plan Wednesday when they join other party leaders and law enforcement officials in a major event at Union Station."

Scalia's "Obscene Gesture" To Reporter Sparks Questions. Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia reportedly used a hand gesture in response to a reporter's question on Sunday. The AP (3/28) reports, "The Boston Herald reported Monday that the justice made 'an obscene gesture under his chin' — which prompted some online reports that Scalia had used his middle finger. Untrue. … The sign he used in Boston is frequently used by Italians to express displeasure with someone — from mild to deep irritation. It is done by cupping the hand under the chin and flicking the fingers like a backward wave."

22nd Amendment Criticized For Causing Lame Duck Presidencies. In his Boston Globe column (3/28), Peter Canellos says there were "no quacking noises at the president's press conference last week. But" President Bush "acknowledged that the political capital he won in 2004 is dwindling. He blamed the Iraq war, but even in the best of circumstances, presidents in their second terms become lame ducks very quickly." The "reason is the 22d Amendment to the Constitution, mandating that presidents can be elected only twice." That's "partly why a bipartisan group of legislators have been filing a bill every two years to rescind the 22d Amendment, on the grounds that it deprives the country of its proper choice of leaders."

OTHER NEWS:

Gasoline Prices Level Off After Steep Increase Last Week. Gasoline prices have leveled off after increasing nearly 14 cents a gallon last week. USA Today (3/28, Healey, 2.31M) reports that the price plateau caps "a four-week run-up at the pump" but the relief "could be short-lived. Prices often zoom as warm weather spurs more driving trips, which drain supplies. Refiners also are required by law to shift to clean-air gasoline blends for spring and summer, and those cost more to make." According to USA Today, the "nationwide average for a gallon of regular is $2.498, the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported Monday."

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 10, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that the price is "up a quarter from a month ago and more than 35 cents from a year ago."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Levine, Davis, 2.11M) reports, "Analysts attribute the quick price moves to a shift that begins next month in gasoline blends, requiring chemicals to be added for environmental and other reasons. Because of the energy bill passed last year by lawmakers, most U.S. refiners will halt the use of methyl tertiary butyl ether as a gasoline additive and substitute ethanol."

WSJournal Blames Congress For Rising Gasoline Prices. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) says gas prices are rising because "Congress's energy policy mistakes are finally catching up with it." The Journal adds that Congress "created the conditions for this mess last summer with its latest energy bill," which "contained a sop to Midwest corn farmers in the form of a huge new ethanol mandate." Congress also "refused to include liability protection for producers of MTBE, a rival oxygen fuel-additive that has become a tort lawyer target. So MTBE makers are pulling out, ethanol makers can't make up the difference quickly enough, and gas supplies are getting squeezed. … If Republicans on Capitol Hill wonder why their approval ratings stay low as gasoline prices rise this spring and summer, we suggest they look in the mirror."

NYTimes Backs Markey Measure On Oil Royalty Relief. An editorial in the New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) notes that "oil companies stand to gain a minimum of $7 billion and as much as $28 billion over the next five years under an obscure provision in last year's giant energy bill that allows companies to avoid paying royalties on oil and gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico. … Edward Markey, a Democratic member of the House from Massachusetts, has proposed a bill that would keep any new contracts from granting relief when oil and gas prices were high, and would instruct the interior secretary to try to renegotiate existing contracts. That is a fair and overdue remedy."

Stock Markets Have Mixed Finish. Stocks finished with mixed results Monday. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) reported on its web site that the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 29.86 points to 11250.11. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 1.34 to 1301.61 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained by 2.76 to 2315.58. USA Today/AP (3/28, Powell) attributes the mixed results to investors "awaited the results today of the first Federal Reserve rate-setting meeting led by new Chairman Ben Bernanke."

Bernanke Seeks To Make Fed Decisionmaking More Transparent. New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke wants to bring more transparency to the Fed and is exploring ways to publicly communicate bank officials' views on the economy, the inflationary risks and the likely path of interest rates. The Washington Post (3/28, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports that "the options Bernanke and his colleagues have floated include several practices employed by central banks in other countries. They include: Writing lengthier statements after policymaking meetings to explain their actions. … Providing more descriptive minutes of their meetings. The minutes now are highly stylized summaries, former Fed officials say. Publishing more frequent economic forecasts by Fed policymakers, who now issue them twice a year. Holding news conferences after Fed meetings. Setting a long-term, numerical target for inflation."

2006 congressional campaigns "get into gear, there are two George W. Bushes traveling the country. One, the fundraiser, is welcome anywhere, anytime. Since January 2005, the president has set a record pace in raising cash for Republican campaign committees and individual candidates - $88 million at 26 events." The other, "the campaigner, appears radioactive, at least to candidates in tough races." Vice President Cheney, "whose job approval ratings are even lower than Bush's, is in the same boat: He's a money magnet at Republican fundraisers, but if it's for a candidate in a tight race, forget about the photo op." So far this cycle, Cheney "has appeared at 48 events and raised $16 million."

Bush Praises Burns At Fundraiser. The AP (3/28, Kalonick) reports that President Bush "on Monday urged Montanans to vote for Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, who is locked in a tight race for re-election this year. 'I'm proud to stand by this man,' Bush told a Washington audience of about 200 lobbyists, members of Congress and other supporters." Bush, in his speech, "urged support for the war in Iraq and energy independence. 'We're laying the foundation of peace, and it's important to have members of the United States Senate who can look beyond the short term, who have got a strategic view of the world in which we live,' Bush said. 'And Conrad Burns has that view.'" While some GOP candidates seeking reelection "have distanced themselves from Bush," Burns "said he is proud to stand next to the president. 'It always helps to have the president in your corner,'" Burns said.

Bush Remains Optimistic. The White House Bulletin/US News (3/27) reported senior White House officials say President Bush "is still optimistic that his policies will succeed in Iraq and at home, and confident that the Republicans will retain control of Congress in this fall's mid-term elections. The Democrats are too fractured over major issues to present a unified vision, and they are wrong on the merits of issues such as making Bush's tax cuts permanent (which many Democrats oppose) and imposing more restrictions on the warrantless surveillance of suspected terrorists (which many Democrats favor), Bush says." Bush "remains as decisive as ever -- a man who rarely second-guesses himself -- which his admirers praise as evidence of his strong leadership and his detractors condemn as evidence of stubbornness and swagger. Bush tells aides that Americans want their president to be decisive because it persuades the country that he knows what he's doing. Besides, Bush says, decisiveness is a morale builder for his staff because it breeds confidence in everyone around him."

Number Of Millionaire Households in US Grew Last Year. A report to be released today from the British market research firm TNS Financial Services says the number of US households with a net worth of $1 million or m ore grew to 8.9 million last year. The New York Times (3/28, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "The number of millionaire families rose to 7.1 million in 1999, said Jeanette Luhr, a TNS manager who directed the survey, and then, after the Internet bubble burst, dropped steadily to 5.5 million by 2002. The ranks of millionaire households rose to 6.2 million in 2003 and 8.2 million in 2004, she said."

Religious Conservatives Unveil "Value Voters" Contract. The Washington Times (3/28, Duin, 90K) reports a "summit of evangelical Christians and conservative Catholic and Jewish activists yesterday produced a 'Values Voters' Contract with Congress,' an outline of what the religiously minded expect their elected representatives to bring about in the near future." Modeled after "the Republican Party's 1994 'Contract with America,' the 'Values Voters' Contract' stipulated 10 aims, ranging from legislation to keep the words 'under God' in the Pledge of Allegiance to laws guaranteeing greater religious freedoms in the workplace, prohibiting human cloning and embryo research, and guaranteeing a "right to life" to all children before birth."

Bloomberg (3/28) reports that faith and family values issues "are dividing the Republican Party." Bloomberg reports, "Economic conservatives and secular Republicans complain their message is being drowned out by Christian conservatives preoccupied with banning abortion and gay marriage and limiting stem-cell research. On the other side, 'values' advocates say they have provided the party with crucial support, particularly in 2004, when they mobilized religious conservatives to go to the polls to help re-elect President George W. Bush. Such concerns are turning long-simmering Republican tensions over the role of religious conservatives into an election-year split in a party already strained by differences on the Iraq war, immigration and government spending."

Leaders Of Both Parties Getting Low Job-Approval Ratings. The Washington Times (3/28, Lambro, 90K) reports President Bush "and the Republican Congress are not the only ones getting poor job-approval grades from voters. A large number of governors and state legislatures in both parties are receiving low scores, too." While the Washington press corps "has focused on Mr. Bush's declining approval rating, down to 36 percent in the latest Gallup poll, and on Congress, whose approval rating has sunk to 27 percent, state and local government officials are not faring much better." Independent pollsters "say the national electorate is in a sour mood and is critical of the political establishment across the board, regardless of party."

Romney-McCain Rivalry Developing. A rivalry has developed between 2008 presidential rivals Sen. John McCain and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, the AP (3/28, Johnson) reports. Romney has held fundraisers in McCain's home state of Arizona and he has repeatedly "questioned the effectiveness of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, arguing it has had 'unintended consequences' and 'driven money into secret corners.'" Meanwhile, McCain aides, "speaking privately like Romney's to avoid incurring the boss' wrath, labels Romney a johnny-come-lately to conservative Republican and national security causes. They also question whether a dashing candidate dubbed 'Matinee Mitt' has the mettle to endure a rough nominating battle."

Dionne Says McCain At Risk Of Losing Maverick Appeal. In his Washington Post column (3/28, A23), E.J. Dionne says Sen. John McCain "the Maverick fought for campaign finance reform, took global warming seriously, opposed Bush's tax cuts and spoke out against torture. Those positions bred mistrust in McCain's own party, even though he was always a staunch supporter of overthrowing Saddam Hussein, a firm opponent of pork-barrel spending, an abortion foe and an advocate of private accounts carved out of Social Security." McCain's problem "is that political parties rarely nominate mavericks, and McCain has decided the only way he'll ever be president is as the Republican nominee. So today he cares very much about what hurts him or helps him in his own party." The "most flagrant sign of this was his February vote to continue Bush's dividend and capital gains tax cuts, which he once eloquently opposed." But McCain's "central appeal, even to people who disagree with him, has always been his willingness to do the nonpolitical thing -- for example, to defend Kerry that day in 2004 simply because he thought the attacks on Kerry were wrong."

Disney Hires Former McCain Aide As Lobbyist. The Hill (3/28, Schor) reports the Walt Disney Co. "had big shoes to fill when lobbyist Mitch Rose left last month to open his own shop, and Disney has turned to Bill Bailey, former communications adviser to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), as its lobbying arm's new No. 2." It is Bailey's "years working side by side with McCain, former Commerce Committee chairman and 2008 presidential contender, that may make him most valuable to Disney as it joins the fray over rewriting the Telecommunications Act of 1996."

Democrats Suggest Allen For NFL Commissioner. Democrats are suggesting that the NFL should consider Sen. George Allen to replace retiring commissioner Paul Tagliabue. The AP (3/28, Lester) reports that DSCC executive director J.D. Poersch, referring to Allen's comment that the Senate moves to slowly, said, "We hate to see a good Senate seat filled by someone who is so bored by his job that he doesn't even like to spend time in the state he is supposed to represent, let alone vote in a way that serves his state's interests."

Web Site Publishes Kerry's Hotel Requests. The Washington Post (3/28, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that The Smoking Gun web site yesterday published Sen. John Kerry's list of hotel room requirements from his 2004 presidential campaign. Kerry "nixed tomato-based foods and celery ('JK hates celery') while requesting cold cereal, meatloaf, chicken, cookies, Poland Spring bottled water and a recumbent bike for workouts." Kerry spokesman David Wade compared Kerry's list to Vice President Dick Cheney's, which the web site published last week. Said Wade, "Dick Cheney drinks Perrier and refuses to watch anything but Fox News. John Kerry hates Evian, eats meatloaf, and snacks on chocolate chip cookies. If these documents had been leaked during the campaign we'd have won in a landslide."

Research Finds "Educational Flatline" In US. Research led by a Duke University sociologist has found that the basic academic skills of US children has hardly budged despite nearly 30 years of quality of life improvements. USA Today (3/28, Toppo, 2.31M) reports, "The 'educational flatline,' as measured by scores on math and reading exams, defies researchers' expectations, because other quality-of-life measures, such as safety and family income, have improved steadily since 1975." The report "calls for more investments in preschool and adult education, as well as programs for children who enter school with inadequate English skills."

Lyn Nofziger Dead At 81. The Washington Times (3/28, Hallow, 90K) reports, "Lyn Nofziger, a long-time adviser to Ronald Reagan, died yesterday in his Falls Church home after a long bout with cancer. He was 81. Wife Bonnie, daughter Glenda Parry of Myrtle Beach, S.C., and grandson Matthew Parry were at his side when he succumbed to bladder cancer at about 5:15 p.m." The Washington Post (3/28, B6, Weil, 744K) calls Nofziger "rumpled" and "irreverent," and says he "served at Ronald Reagan's right hand both in the California capitol and in the White House, died yesterday of cancer at his home in Falls Church." The Post adds, "After leaving the White House, Mr. Nofziger felt in a personal way what he considered to be governmental overreaching. He was found guilty in 1988 on three counts of illegal lobbying at the Reagan White House within a year after he left to set up his consulting firm." But "a federal court of appeals overturned the conviction in June 1989, asserting that prosecutors had failed to prove that Mr. Nofziger 'knowingly' violated the law. The Supreme Court declined to consider reinstating the conviction."

The New York Times (3/28, Broder, 1.19M) says Nofziger "frequently expressed his disdain for Washington and for politics, but he kept returning. He put up a cynical facade that endeared him to the reporters he dealt with, but he remained devoted to Reagan, even though he was never part of the president's innermost circle."

Byrd's Wife Dies. The Hill (3/28, Downing) reports, "Erma Ora James Byrd, the wife of Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), died Saturday after struggling with a long illness. The couple had been married for 69 years."

Gore, Blood Say "Short Term" Focus Pervades Corporate, Investment Communities. Former Vice President Al Gore, who is chairman of Generation Investment Management, and David Blood, managing partner of Generation Investment Management, write in the Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) that the "interests of shareholders, over time, will be best served by companies that maximize their financial performance by strategically managing their economic, social, environmental and ethical performance. This is increasingly true as we confront the limits of our ecological system to hold up under current patterns of use." They add, "A short-term focus still pervades both corporate and investment communities, which hinders long-term value creation. … More mechanisms to incorporate environmental and social externalities will be needed to enable capital markets to achieve their intended purpose -- to consistently allocate capital to its highest and best use for the good of the people and the planet."

Hamas Leaders Say They Are "Ready For Dialogue." USA Today (3/28, Stinson, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "The Palestinian Authority's new leaders said Monday that they would reach out to the United States and other international peace mediators. For the first time, they raised the possibility that the Hamas-led government could recognize Israel's right to exist." The statements from Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh and his deputy Naser as-Sha'er "reflected a softening of rhetoric." The United States and Israel "dismissed the statements, saying the words had to be matched by action." In a speech to the Palestinian parliament, Haniyeh "said that his government 'is ready for dialogue' with the United States and the three other members of the so-called Quartet of international powers that have sought to broker peace between Israel and the Palestinians."

The Washington Times/AP (3/28, El Deeb) quotes Haniyeh saying, "The European Union has provided a lot of aid to our people and supported our right for freedom. ... We are interested in a strong relation with Europe." But "at the same time we expect the European Union to review some of its policies toward the conflict."

Kadima Predicted To Win Low-Turnout Israeli Election. The New York Times (3/28, Myre, 1.19M) calls Acting Israeli PM Ehud Olmert's Kadima Party "the overwhelming favorite" in today's election, which the Times says "is widely billed as one of the most important -- and least inspiring -- ballots in Israel's history." The Washington Post (3/28, Wilson, 744K) calls Israel's electorate "unsettled" and says the election occurs "after a campaign season marked by complacency, disappointment and a sense of betrayal among many voters now searching for new political leadership." The Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Mitnick, 61K) also says Kadima "ends the campaign fighting primarily voter apathy." Opinion polls "predict that voter turnout will be weak." The Washington Post (3/28, A17, Wilson, 744K) reports "the campaign has emerged as a referendum on Sharon's unfinished program to separate the Israeli and Palestinian populations through a series of unilateral withdrawals from the occupied territories."

PhRMA Move Against Israeli Company Sparks Anger Among US Jewish Groups. Roll Call (3/28, Ackley) reports, "A move by the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America to punish Israel on foreign trade has sparked an uproar among some American Jewish groups and raised the ire of a major Israeli drug company." In a written submission, PhRMA "has asked the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to designate Israel a 'priority foreign country' on a soon-to-be-released annual list. The list, known as the 'Special 301' report, is reserved for those countries with some of the worst intellectual property laws that affect American companies. And being on the list can lead to trade sanctions." Israel "is not the only country PhRMA has recommended be included on the priority foreign country list. PhRMA wants the USTR to put a handful on the list including Turkey, Poland, Germany and Canada." In response to PhRMA, "Jewish organizations, the Israeli embassy and Teva Pharmaceuticals in recent days have mounted a lobbying blitz aimed at the USTR, White House and Congress to keep Israel off the list, which is set to be released next month."

Rice To Discuss Iran During Three-Stop European Trip. The AP (3/27, Stringer) reports Secretary Rice "will visit several European capitals in the coming days, heading to Britain, France and Germany as new talks are scheduled concerning Iran's suspect nuclear program." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said Rice's trip will include stops in Berlin and Paris for meetings on Iran and other issues." British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw announced that the foreign ministers from France, China, Russia and Germany will join Rice and him in Berlin Thursday "for talks about Iran."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (3/28, LaFranchi, 61K) says that "what was supposed to be a quick discussion in the United Nations Security Council to solidify international opposition to Iran's nuclear program has turned into a stalemate." With both Russia and China "balking at any council statement that might open the door to sanctions against Iran further down the road, agreement on a diplomatic rebuff could still be a week or more away. That is, if broadly acceptable wording for a statement can be found even then." In the short term, the United States "appears unfazed by the delay."

WSJournal Says Iranian Dissident Could Be "Iconic Figure" In Iranian "Revolution." The Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "Successful democratic revolutions tend to have iconic figures: Think of Nelson Mandela in South Africa, Vaclav Havel in Czechoslovakia, Lech Walesa in Poland and Viktor Yushchenko in Ukraine. These men not only led their movements to victory but also, through their personal suffering, became emblems of the suffering of their people." In Iran, "the iconic figure is Akbar Ganji, who was released this month from Tehran's Evin prison after serving a six-year sentence."

Indian Foreign Secretary Will Promote Nuclear Pact In Washington. The AP (3/27, Klug) Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran "is visiting Washington this week, the start of a month-long effort to help President Bush sell his landmark civilian nuclear cooperation deal to a skeptical Congress." After Saran's visit, "a string of Indian ministers will meet in coming weeks with U.S. officials and speak at think tanks, press conferences and business gatherings across Washington. They will argue that a US-Indian deal to share nuclear technology and fuel is crucial" to meet India's "massive energy demands."

Gutierrez Urges China To Open Markets, Settle Currency Disputes. The AP (3/28) reports, "US Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez on Monday called on China to open its markets to foreign goods and settle currency disputes, warning it could face protectionist sentiment in the US if its record trade surplus keeps growing." Gutierrez will be in Beijing "for talks ahead of a possible Senate vote this week on proposed sanctions to punish China for manipulating its currency."

US-China Trade War Said To Be Possible. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Kempe, 2.11M) contrasts US-China economic competition to the nuclear standoff between Washington and Moscow during the Cold War. "As senior Washington and Beijing officials prepare for Chinese President Hu Jintao's summit with President Bush at the White House on April 20, a more unstable logic is being tested that has come to define the emerging superpower relationship that will define the first half of the 21st century. The argument holds that both countries would be so economically devastated by a trade or financial war…that neither would trigger one despite growing trade tensions. By that logic, China won't stop buying billions of U.S. dollars each month" and "the U.S. would not implement tough sanctions to punish China's undervalued currency. Don't bet on this logic holding. Miscalculation is the mother of all unintended conflicts."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (3/28, Swann, Alden) reports "the administration of President George W. Bush will face mounting pressure to take tougher action against China over the value of its currency with the introduction on Tuesday of legislation that would all but force the US Treasury to brand China as a currency manipulator." The proposal, drafted by Sens. Charles Grassley and Max Baucus, "would threaten new sanctions against countries that are found to have 'currency misalignments' with the US, according to people with knowledge of the proposal."

Pro-Western Alliance Likely To Lead Ukraine. The New York Times (3/28, Myers, 1.19M) reports Ukraine "was in political gridlock on Monday" after President Viktor Yushchenko was "stunned" by his party's third place finish in parliamentary elections. The Financial Times (3/28, Wagstyl, Warner) says Yushchenko's former ally Yulia Tymoshenko "on Monday staked her claim to head the government" and "was putting pressure on" Yushchenko "to allow her back into office."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Chazan, 2.11M) says a Yushchenko-Tymoshenko alliance "may now be the only way for Mr. Yushchenko to keep his pro-Russian rival, Viktor Yanukovych, from forming a government himself." Another Tymoshenko premiership "has raised worries among investors leery of her populist slogans and her embrace of state intervention while in office. In recent weeks, she has promised to renegotiate a key gas-supply deal with Russia, a move that could poison already-sour relations with Moscow." Meanwhile, Washington Times/AP (3/28, Isachenkov) noted White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan called the elections "free and fair."

London Mayor Calls US Ambassador "Chiselling Little Crook." The Financial Times (3/28, Adams) reports London Mayor Ken Livingstone, "the famously outspoken left-wing mayor and long-standing critic of American foreign policy," has "accused the US ambassador to the UK of behaving 'like a chiselling little crook' in a spat over the embassy's refusal to pay the city's road toll." Livingstone's "assault on Robert Tuttle was prompted by the long-running dispute over the embassy's refusal to pay the congestion charge." An embassy spokesman is quoted: "The mayor has a tendency to hyperbole. I'm not going to dignify that."

Blair Under Fire For Campaign Finance Scandal. USA Today (3/28, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "A campaign-finance scandal has erupted in Britain, where investigators are looking into the possibility that secret political payments were rewarded with seats in the House of Lords." British newspapers "such as The Independent have dubbed the scandal 'loans for peerages.' Scotland Yard last week began investigating wealthy donors who loaned money to Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party. And Parliament's Constitutional Affairs Select Committee is scheduled to hold hearings today on political fundraising in Britain." The controversy "has led some leading British publications to call for Blair to step down." The Conservative Party "has also used loans to raise cash, but so far it has declined to identify the sources of its loans."

French Workers To Stage General Strike Today Over Jobs Law. The Financial Times (3/28, Arnold) reports, "France will be hit by widespread strikes and demonstrations on Tuesday against prime minister Dominique de Villepin's controversial youth employment law." It will be "the latest round in a battle of wills over economic reforms before next year's presidential elections." The New York Times (3/28, Smith, 1.19M) says "the strikes and protests planned for Tuesday represent a test of wills, with students and trade unions demanding that the unpopular law be rescinded and the country's embattled prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, insisting that it go into effect, albeit with possible changes." The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Rotella, 958K) also reports the story.

More Commentary. George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M), "This time it's not the disaffected Muslim youths of the banlieu rioting in France. It's the privileged students of the Sorbonne banging up cars and battling the flics. … In reality, as so often happens in France, naïve youths are being exploited by unions that know exactly what they are doing -- protecting a system that gives security to job-holding union members at the expense of the unemployed. Street demonstrations are the means by which French unions show government who's boss, and who plans to continue being boss."

In a column titled "Who Moved My Fromage?," John Tierney writes in the New York Times (3/28, 1.19M), "As student protesters and workers try to paralyze France today, I don't suppose many of them are looking to America to come to their country's aid. Nor do I suppose many Americans are in the mood for a new Marshall Plan. But I have a modest proposal anyway. … Eventually we could introduce them to Trump's television show, but not right away. There's a good reason 'The Apprentice' hasn't made it to French TV. For now, 'You're fired' translates as 'We riot.'"

Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K), "The street protesters are given to much make-believe -- the illusion that if they march long enough and burn enough cars, they can prevent unwanted change. The concessions that governments make to the future are usually small and slow." France "is raising full eligibility for retirement benefits from 40 to 42 years of contributions; the change occurs between now and 2020. This suggests a messy process of grudging accommodations that neither placate public opinion nor improve economic vitality."

France Makes Major Effort To Boost Nuclear Infrastructure. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, A1, Ball, 2.11M) reports that "over the past three decades, the French government has transformed" a "15-mile finger of land from a provincial backwater into one of the world's most concentrated patches of nuclear infrastructure. On an earthen pad carved from the cliffs squats a power plant with two nuclear reactors. It's expected to get a third. At the tip of the peninsula, which juts into the English Channel, sprawls a tightly guarded factory that processes spent nuclear fuel -- not just from France, but from throughout the world." The Journal adds, "Some in France look at this landscape and cringe. Others see it as a point of national pride . One thing is clear: It stems from one of the world's most unflinching campaigns to curb fossil-fuel consumption."

Serb Authorities Admit They Helped War Crimes Fugitive. The Washington Post (3/28, A20, Williams, Maroevic, 744K) reports, "After years of denial, Serbian authorities have acknowledged in a secret report that a band of about 50 intelligence and army officials conspired to conceal the movements of war crimes fugitive Ratko Mladic and provide him refuge." The report, "delivered to the government in January, was prepared by Serbia's military intelligence agency and led to firings and other moves within the country's domestic and military spy agencies, officials say. As a result, they assert, the noose around Mladic has been tightened, although there is no indication he is prepared to give up."

Three Western Hostages Freed By Nigerian Rebels. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 9, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Two American oil workers kidnapped by militants in Nigeria were freed today by their captors. They and a Brit also freed today were among nine western oil workers kidnapped in mid-February. The others were released a few weeks ago. Militants have staged attacks and kidnappings to press their demands for a share of Nigeria's oil wealth. The violence has cut Nigeria's production and pushed oil prices even higher."

Fate Of Former Liberian Leader Remains Uncertain. The New York Times (3/28, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "Confusion reigned Monday over the status of Charles G. Taylor, the onetime warlord who became president of Liberia and who is wanted for war crimes by an international court based here for atrocities affecting Sierra Leone during neighboring Liberia's civil war." Liberia's current president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, "who had asked Nigeria on March 17 to extradite Mr. Taylor to face trial in Sierra Leone, told religious leaders in Monrovia, the capital, on Monday that Mr. Taylor should be moved directly to Sierra Leone." A State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, 'said at a briefing on Monday that the responsibility to secure Mr. Taylor lay with the Nigerian government."

Kristof Urges Focus On Gender Discrimination In Developing World. Nicholas D. Kristof writes in the New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) that it is "time to focus on gender inequality in the developing world, for that is the greatest single source of human rights violations today. Political dissidents tend to get the world's attention. But for every dissident who is beaten to death by government torturers somewhere in the world, thousands of ordinary women or girls die prematurely because of the effects of discrimination."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Takes Stand, Claims Role In 9/11 Attacks. Zacarias Moussaoui took the stand in his own defense yesterday, over the objection of his lawyers, and told jurors that he and shoe-bomber Richard Reid were part of an al Qaeda team that was to hijack a fifth airliner on 9/11 and crash it into the White House. Moussaoui's admission contradicted his statement when he pleaded guilty last April, saying then that he was part of a later plot, and news coverage generally characterizes his testimony yesterday as undermining defense lawyers' attempts to save him from the death penalty.

ABC World News Tonight (3/27, lead story, 3:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "It was stunning testimony." ABC (Thomas) added, "Moussaoui admitted to a transfixed jury that he was to fly a plane into the White House as part of the 9/11 plot, and he knew the attack would come some time after August, 2001." Michael Greenberger, former Justice Department official: "Moussaoui has really rewrapped this case in a gift box and put a nice ribbon on it for the prosecution." Moussaoui "showed no remorse, calling all Americans his enemies. At one point, he shouted 'Al Qaeda, Osama, Victory.'"

The CBS Evening News (3/27, lead story, 3:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted Moussaoui confirmed "everything the prosecution says about him." CBS (Stewart) added, "A defense lawyer later told CBS the testimony amounted to a public suicide. Analysts agreed." NBC Nightly News (3/27, lead story, 2:55, P. Williams, 9.87M) called Moussaoui's testimony "riveting" and added "it gave a big boost to prosecutors."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Franken) reported, "He admitted that he lied to investigators, fundamental to the prosecution belief that had he told the truth he could have prevented" 9/11.

Under the headline "Claim Of 9/11 Role Shakes Up Trial," USA Today (3/28, A1, Johnson, 2.31M) adds, "His matter-of-fact description of his life as a terror operative who met Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda leaders captivated the courtroom," and "his testimony likely will be key to the government's claim that he should be executed because his lies to U.S. agents kept them from uncovering the 9/11 plot."

The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Serrano, 958K) notes, "He further admitted that he lied to FBI agents when arrested in Minnesota, a key point for the government. Moussaoui said he would not cooperate because 'I wanted my mission to go ahead.' … Moussaoui was cross-examined by lead prosecutor Robert Spencer, who asked him about his reaction to the loss of nearly 3,000 lives that day. 'You are Americans, and I consider every American to be my enemy,' he said."

The New York Times (3/28, , 1.19M) also reports Moussaoui's testimony seemed "only to bolster the government's case," although testimony from alleged 9/11 attack planner Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, introduced by the defense yesterday, "seemed to contradict Mr. Moussaoui's assertion that he was meant to be a pilot on Sept. 11. Mr. Mohammed portrayed Mr. Moussaoui as a fringe figure who might have been used in a second wave of attacks if needed."

The Washington Post (3/28, A1, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) calls Moussaoui's testimony "stunning," and notes legal analysts said his admission that he lied to the FBI so the 9/11 plot would not be thwarted, "combined with Moussaoui's chilling demeanor in court, probably would resonate with the jury." Former federal prosecutor Eric Muller observed, "It sounds like he's toast," and RAND analyst Brian Jenkins said Moussaoui "has destroyed much of his defense."

CNN.com (3/28, Hirschkorn) reports, "Prosecutors contend that Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen of Moroccan heritage, deserves to die. Had he not lied after his arrest, they contend, investigators could have uncovered the September 11 conspiracy. … Asked by his lawyer why he lied, Moussaoui replied, 'Because I am al Qaeda. … 'The Prophet says, "war is deceit," ' Moussaoui later told prosecutor Robert Spencer. 'You're allowed to lie for jihad. You're allowed any technique to defeat your enemy.' … After Moussaoui's testimony, the defense introduced the statements from Mohammed."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/28, Gordon) reports, "It was the most dramatic day of testimony in a three-week-old trial filled with tumult. Jurors, who scribbled notes as Moussaoui further implicated himself, now must sort out the conflicting portraits in determining whether he should be put to death for what he didn't tell interrogators while jailed in Minnesota. … U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said she expects the first phase of the trial -- to determine whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty -- to go to the jury as early as Wednesday."

The Washington Times/AP (3/28, Barakat) and Bloomberg (3/28, Arthur) report similarly on Moussaoui's testimony.

Milbank Says Moussaoui Gave "Prosecutors Just What They Needed." In his Washington Post (3/28, 744K) "Washington Sketch," reporter Dana Milbank wrote, "The terrorist gave the prosecutors just what they needed: evidence that his lies to investigators in August 2001 prevented them from thwarting the attack. Just as prosecution witnesses wound up aiding the defense earlier in the trial, Moussaoui was a gift to prosecutors. The Justice Department wants the death penalty; Moussaoui spoke like a man who wants martyrdom."

Victims' Family Members Pained By Moussaoui Testimony. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/28, Neumeister) reports Debra Burlingame, the sister of American Airlines pilot Charles Burlingame whose hijacked airliner struck the Pentagon, "says watching Zacarias Moussaoui's chilling testimony…provided new information for families desperate for answers, yet only worsened their emotional wounds." Sally Regenhard, "whose firefighter son Christian was killed at the World Trade Center," said "she 'felt very certain' that at least one of the plane attacks could have been thwarted if the work done by FBI field agents had been acted upon properly. … Her voice cracked as she dwelled on a truth too painful to bear: 'The cavalry never came.'"

LATimes Says Moussaoui Should Not Be Executed, Despite Yesterday's Testimony. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, 958K) editorializes, "Even if he was supposed to fly a plane into the White House…as he testified in court Monday, Zacarias Moussaoui should not be executed." The Times adds that – in addition to the paper's standard editorial opposition to the death penalty – execution would reward him by making him a martyr, and "if Moussaoui is indeed an important cog in a broad conspiracy, then he certainly has information that could potentially be useful both in further Sept. 11 investigations and in our fight against Al Qaeda."

Roberts Critical Of NSA Bill's Referral To Judiciary Committee. Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts was critical of the Senate parliamentarian's decision to refer a bill concerning President Bush's National Security Agency domestic surveillance plan to the Judiciary Committee. The Washington Times (3/28, Waterman, 90K) reports an intelligence committee aide said, "Chairman Roberts's strong position is that this decision was incorrect." The Times adds the parliamentarian "referred Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine's Terrorist Surveillance Act of 2006 to the Senate Judiciary Committee, after much behind-the-scenes negotiations, according to other Senate aides." In "practice, the referral means that members and staff of the intelligence committee will have only a short time to work on whatever proposal emerges from Mr. Specter's panel -- 10 days, according to committee staff."

Conyers Not Satisfied With DOJ's Response To NSA Probe. The National Journal's Technology Daily (3/28, Casey) reports, "Democrat John Conyers of Michigan dismissed as evasive and unresponsive the late Friday response from the Justice Department to a House Judiciary Committee inquiry into the National Security Agency program of wiretaps without warrants." Technology Daily continues, "Justice's response said the agency, through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, could have legally monitored confidential communications between doctors and patients or attorneys and their clients. … 'Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception if they met' the program's criteria, the department said. … 'The evasiveness of the department prevents Congress from exercising its constitutionally mandated oversight role and obstructs Congress' ability to draft meaningful legislation to provide guidelines for this activity,' said Conyers, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary panel. 'Some of the department's responses leave open the possibility that other surveillance programs exist with a scope far beyond this program.'" Technology Daily notes, "In its answers to 45 separate questions posed by Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and committee Democrats, the department acknowledged that no previous administration had authorized electronic surveillance."

Supreme Court To Hear Appeal From Bin Laden's Driver. USA Today (3/28, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the Supreme Court today hears oral arguments in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden "who is challenging the validity of President Bush's plan to try foreign terrorism suspects before military tribunals." Hamdan's attorneys "say Bush has claimed unprecedented power 'to dispense life imprisonment and death through a judicial system of his own design.'" Attorneys for the Administration "counter that the tribunals, first ordered by Bush two months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, reflect the president's broad authority to oversee war efforts." The Hamdan dispute has "been complicated by the Detainee Treatment Act, which Congress passed in December. An initial question for the justices is whether the act strips them of the power to consider Hamdan's basic claim about the validity of the tribunals that would be set up and run by the Pentagon."

Group Calls For Scalia Recusal. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 2, 1:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Justice Antonin Scalia weighed in on the "legal rights of terror suspects imprisoned on the US Navy base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The question is do these detainees deserve an American style trial by jury. Here is what Justice Scalia told a college audience in Switzerland." Antonin Scalia, Supreme Court Justice (March 8): "War is war and it has never been the case that when you capture a combatant you have to give him a jury trial in your civil courts. It's a crazy idea to me." Mitchell: "Some legal experts say Scalia should recuse himself from the case."

The Washington Post (3/28, A6, Lane, 744K) reports "a group of retired U.S. generals and admirals has asked Justice Antonin Scalia to recuse himself, arguing that his recent public comments on the subject make it impossible for him to appear impartial." Scalia's remarks "'give rise to the unfortunate appearance that, even before briefing was complete, he had already made up his mind' about issues in the case, the lawyer, David H. Remes, wrote." Noting that Scalia "reportedly had discussed the rights of accused terrorists in the context of his son Matthew's recent tour as an Army officer in Iraq, Remes wrote that this creates an appearance of 'personal bias arising from his son's military service.'"

The Legal Times (3/28, Mauro) reports, "The letter seeking recusal was sent to Supreme Court clerk William Suter late Monday with the request that it be passed on to Scalia. According to Court custom, a request for a justice's recusal is addressed to the individual justice, not to the full Court, because it is the justice's decision alone whether or not to recuse. No immediate response from the justice was forthcoming, making it likely that Scalia's recusal decision will not be known until arguments begin Tuesday, and Scalia either remains seated or gets up and leaves the Court chamber. At a Supreme Court Historical Society event at the Court Monday night that featured Scalia, he made no comment about the controversy."

Top Firms Join Forces In Detainee Case. The Legal Times (3/28, Mauro) reports, "When the U.S. Supreme Court hears arguments today in a landmark dispute over executive power in wartime, the Bush administration will be outnumbered -- if not outgunned. … Many of the nation's top law firms have signed briefs against the government and in support of Salim Hamdan, the detainee who allegedly served as chauffeur to Osama bin Laden and who is being detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." The Times continues, "More than three dozen briefs have been filed on Hamdan's side, largely arguing that the military tribunals established by the White House to try the detainees are illegal. By contrast, only a handful of briefs have been filed on the other side, backing the administration's expansive view of executive authority. … The briefs in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld have flooded in to such a degree that, with the approval of the Court clerk's office, their covers carry small captions summarizing the topic discussed within, an innovation aimed at helping justices and their law clerks keep them straight. … The covers also carry the names of the big-ticket New York, Washington, D.C., and other national law firms that are bringing their muscle to bear, from Cravath, Swaine & Moore to Covington & Burling to Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld to Jones Day."

Administration Arguments In Hamdan Case Debated. USA Today (3/28, 2.31M) says in an editorial that Administration lawyers "will argue Tuesday that Hamdan has almost no rights. Worse, the government contends that the Supreme Court has no right to be hearing his case." Hamdan "has become a high-profile pawn in the administration's stubborn contention that it doesn't have to answer to anyone — not Congress, not the courts and not international treaties and organizations — in its pursuit of the war on terror. The administration asserts the right to unilaterally designate individuals as 'enemy combatants' and hold them prisoner indefinitely, possibly forever."

In an opposing view, USA Today also runs an op-ed (3/28) by Richard Samp, chief counsel of the Washington Legal Foundation, who says, "Those who have challenged the legality of the administration's policy of indefinitely detaining enemy combatants in our war against al-Qaeda have begun to face up to a harsh reality: The courts have by and large upheld the policy." Critics now "are taking a new tack. They argue that even if the administration is acting within the law, we ought to abandon the policy because it's not the right thing to do. They apparently want detainees either to be charged with crimes in our regular criminal courts or else set free. That simply is no way to fight a war."

NYCLU Urges 2nd Circuit To Unseal NSA Surveillance Ruling In Albany Mosque Case. The AP (3/28, Neumeister) reports the New York Civil Liberties Union filed a motion with the 2nd US Circuit "on Monday to force a federal judge to unseal a ruling he made…regarding the government's warrantless wiretapping program" in the case of Albany mosque imam Yassin Aref and mosque member Mohammed Hossein. "The NYCLU asked to intervene three days after defense lawyers for the men asked the same appeals court to say the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret," noting "that the judge rejected the defendants' suppression motion less than two hours after the government on March 10 submitted a secret court document opposing it."

Videotaped Confessions Seen As Highest Hurdle For Hayat Defense. The AP (3/28, Thompson) reports lawyers for Umer and Hamid Hayat "will open their defense this week, and among their biggest challenges will be persuading jurors that they should not believe their own eyes. The government's case…is built partially on separate confessions they gave to FBI agents," which "were videotaped and played to jurors." The AP notes that dismissed juror Andrea Clabaugh said last week, "I don't find the FBI interrogation damning. I felt like the FBI was leading," but "legal experts said confessions tend to resonate with juries."

Levin Surveying Military Prison Workers On Abusive Tactics. The Washington Post (3/28, A19, White, 744K) reports, "American soldiers, contractors and civilians who worked in the Abu Ghraib prison and at other US military detention facilities have begun receiving detailed questionnaires from Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, about the use of severe interrogation tactics and the military chain of command's role in their implementation." Levin has "directed the committee's minority staff to ask questions of hundreds of people who worked in detention facilities to assess where the tactics originated and how they were applied -- an approach the full committee has not endorsed."

Pan Am Bomber Sentenced To Seven More Years In Prison. The Washington Post (3/25, A5, Cauvin, 744K) reported, "Almost a quarter of a century after his bomb killed a teenager aboard a Pan Am flight bound for Honolulu, Mohammed Rashed was sentenced for the crime" Friday. "But in the complicated world of counterterrorism, saving lives is sometimes weighed against avenging deaths, and that is why Rashed…was ordered to spend just seven more years behind bars. ... By the time Rashed was brought to the United States in 1998, he had already been in custody for a decade," but "for the past three years…Rashed has been providing significant assistance, Justice Department prosecutors Scott J. Glick and Kenneth C. Kohl" told US District Judge Royce C. Lamberth at the sentencing. The AP (3/25) noted Rashed's "sentencing…was delayed for several years because he was locked up in prisons in Greece and Africa before being turned over to the FBI."

Alleged Padilla Accomplice Faces Military Tribunal. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, A1, Bravin, 2.11M) reports in a front page story on Binyam Mohamed, who allegedly conspired with "Dirty Bomber" Jose Padilla to conduct terrorist attacks in the US. Padilla "was arrested when he arrived at O'Hare airport, accused of plotting to explode a radioactive 'dirty bomb,' and jailed without charge as an 'enemy combatant.' The result is a civil-liberties storm that has twice reached the Supreme Court." But Mohamed "wasn't a U.S. citizen. And his path," after his detention in Karachi, Pakistan, "he asserts in an account provided by one of his lawyers, has led to a Moroccan torture cell, imprisonment at Guantanamo, Cuba, and a proceeding to be held in a secretive military court created by order of President Bush after Sept. 11." A "five-page charge sheet accuses Mr. Mohamed of conspiring, along with Mr. Padilla, with al Qaeda leaders to commit the war crimes of 'attacking civilians, attacking civilian objects, murder by an unprivileged belligerent, destruction of property by an unprivileged belligerent and terrorism.' The al Qaeda leaders it cites include Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri, Khalid Sheikh Mohammad, Abu Zubayda and the late Muhammad Atef."

PATRIOT ACT:

Harman, Conyers Call On Bush To Allow Congressional Patriot Act Oversight. The Boston Globe (3/28, Savage, 484K) reports Reps. Jane Harman and John Conyers "demanded that President Bush withdraw his assertion that he can ignore portions of the USA Patriot Act calling on him to provide periodic reports to Congress on how new law-enforcement tactics are being used." The ranking Democrats "on the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees, respectively -- sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking that Bush follow the law." The Globe adds that after President Bush "signed the Patriot Act reauthorization on March 9, he issued a signing statement -- an official document in which a president lays out his understanding of the law -- asserting that he had the authority to withhold the information from Congress if he decided that disclosing it would interfere with foreign relations, national security, or executive branch operations."

Patriot Act Provision To Fast-Track Death Penalty Sparks Concern. The Las Vegas Sun (3/27, Pordum) reports, "Slipped into the thick binding of the newly authorized Patriot Act is a provision designed to speed death penalty appeals." The Sun continues, "The act, signed into law this month, allows states to ask the U.S. attorney general for so-called fast-track reviews of federal habeas corpus petitions - the last appeal of a death row inmate. … Previously federal judges made that determination, which is based on whether a state's court-appointed attorneys in death penalty appeals are able to handle them." The Sun adds, "No state had qualified for the fast-track review, but that could change under the new law. A fast-track review limits the amount of time a prisoner has to appeal and the subject matter of the appeal. … 'This is very troubling,' said Allen Lichtenstein, local attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union. 'It's an attempt by certain elements of government to eviscerate the very checks and balances that are in place to guard us against the abuses of government. … Essentially it's an attack against the Bill of Rights.'" The Sun notes, "Conservative groups, long critical of the length of time it takes for appeals to wind through the system, have championed fast-track appeals. … 'If the provision holds up, it should fix the problem,' said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the nonprofit California-based Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a public interest law firm dedicated to crime victims' rights."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO Reports Indicate Gaps Remain In Port, Border Security. Two GAO reports to be discussed in a Senate subcommittee hearing today are receiving broad media attention. They focus on the government's ability to detect hazardous materials coming into US ports and across borders. NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 7, 2:55, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "Four and a half years after 9/11, Senate investigators say only 39% of all containers entering the US are screened for nuclear material. Many ports, including the third-largest, Miami, still have only handheld detection devices of little value." Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota: "We still have massive blind spots in our ability to prevent nuclear material from being smuggled into this country." Myers: "This report by the Government Accountability Office concludes DHS is two years behind schedule in installing radiation monitors in ports and not likely to have them all done even by 2009." Investigators "found another hole in the system. Senator Coleman tells NBC News that undercover GAO investigators were able to bring enough radioactive material into the US to make two dirty bombs, penetrating both the northern and southern borders."

The Washington Times (3/28, Fagan, 90K) reports Coleman said DHS "must 'dramatically step up' its deployment 'to keep pace with the danger we are facing' there."

The New York Times (3/28, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that a test conducted by the GAO in December found that investigators were able to smuggle "into the United States enough radioactive material to make two dirty bombs, even after it set off alarms on radiation detectors installed at border checkpoints." A report based on the test to be released this morning demonstrates "the mixed progress by the Department of Homeland Security, among other federal agencies, in trying to prevent terrorists from smuggling radioactive material into the United States." Crossing the border at undisclosed locations from Canada and Mexico, investigators "showed the agents from the Customs and Border Protection agency forged import licenses from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, based on an image of the real document they found on the Internet."

USA Today (3/28, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "The Homeland Security Department's equipment worked, and its agents did what they were supposed to do during the tests, according to the report. However, the GAO criticized the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for failing to require companies that sell radioactive material to verify who is buying it, saying there is no way for border agents to verify NRC licenses or other documents."

CQ (3/27, Starks) reported that a third GAO report to be discussed by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs' Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations Tuesday finds "that radiation screening efforts by the United States in foreign countries have been hampered by poor equipment and corruption of border security officials in the former Soviet Union."

US Negotiating To Place CBP Agents At Bahamian Port. The AP (3/28) reports, "Diplomatic talks are expected to begin soon to give agents from US Customs and Border Protection a presence" at the Bahamas' largest seaport, "where the United States is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo." Jayson Ahern, assistant customs commissioner for field operations, said, "It does require bilateral discussions with another country, but we're cautiously looking at being there by the fall." He "was expected to testify Tuesday at a Senate oversight hearing on radiation detectors in the United States."

US Has No Plans For Systems To Protect Commercial Jets From Shoulder-Fired Missiles. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 7, 3:10, Vargas, 8.78M) reported on the "danger posed by shoulder-fired missiles." ABC (Ross) added that last November, an American Airlines pilot reported seeing a missile trail, but nothing was found and "the FBI concluded it was most likely a hobby rocket. But officially, the investigation remains open." Sen. Barbara Boxer: "We had a scare in Los Angeles. We've been told that they cannot rule out the fact that it was a shoulder-fired missile." Ross: "And that remains a very serious concern. An estimated 20,000 such shoulder-fired missiles, mostly Russian, are said by US officials to be for sale on worldwide black markets. The going price -- a few thousand dollars." In the US, "despite four years of warnings and congressional hearings and millions spent on feasibility studies, the Federal Government has no plan to protect US commercial aircraft, even though two companies have developed systems they say would defeat the missiles."

Supreme Court Refuses To Block Hatfill Defamation Suit Against NYTimes. The New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) reports the Supreme Court "refused to hear an appeal from The New York Times on Monday, allowing a libel suit by a former Army bioterrorism expert to go forward." The suit, "filed in 2003 by Steven J. Hatfill, accused Nicholas D. Kristof, an Op-Ed columnist for The Times, of implicating Dr. Hatfill in the unsolved anthrax attacks of 2001."

Bloomberg (3/28, Stohr) reports, "The justices, without comment in Washington, let stand a ruling that said Hatfill can pursue his suit over a series of New York Times columns written by Nicholas Kristof. The columns criticized the slow pace of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's probe into the attacks and discussed the possibility that Hatfill was the culprit. … The company argued in its appeal that the lower court ruling, issued by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia, 'will inhibit criticism of the government and penalize speech about public matters in violation of the First Amendment.' … No one has ever been charged in connection with the attacks, in which five people died from exposure to anthrax spores sent through the mail. Hatfill, who worked until 1999 at the Fort Detrick infectious diseases research institute, said in a 2002 press conference that he 'had absolutely nothing to do with this terrible crime.'"

The AP (3/28, Holland) reports, "Hatfill, a physician and bioterrorism expert, was labeled a 'person of interest' by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, although he was never charged and has since sued Ashcroft and others. … A federal judge had thrown out Hatfill's lawsuit against The New York Times over 2002 columns by writer Nicholas Kristof that faulted the FBI for failing to thoroughly investigate Hatfill. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstated the suit, and the Supreme Court declined without comment to take up the case." The AP notes, "New York attorney David Schulz, who represented the newspaper, said the appeals court decision undermines free-speech protections for reporters and invites more lawsuits over legitimate news reporting. … The Associated Press and some 30 other news organizations urged the Court to use the case to clarify reporters' free-speech protections."

US Charges Florida Inmate With Mailing Hoax Anthrax Letters. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (3/25, Coté, 249K) reported, "Federal prosecutors on Thursday announced they charged Anthony Vassalotti…with the federal crime of mailing a hoax anthrax threat. Vassalotti allegedly sent three letters containing white powder and words such as 'breathe these anthrax spores and die die die!' to the prosecutor on his case, the Circuit Court judge who sentenced him and the Palm Beach County court clerk, according to authorities. Vassalotti was angry after being sentenced on March 16 to 40 years in prison for aggravated battery with a firearm and possession of a short-barreled shotgun, an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force investigator wrote in an affidavit." The AP (3/25) also reported on the charges against Vassalotti.

WAR NEWS:

Afghan Christian Convert Seeks Asylum. The Washington Post/AP (3/28, Shah) reports this morning Abdul Rahman, accused of renouncing Islam in Afghanistan, "has been released from prison after the case was dropped, the justice minister said Tuesday." The announcement "came after the United Nations said that Abdul Rahman had appealed for asylum outside Afghanistan and that the world body was working to find a country willing to take him."

The New York Times (3/28, Munadi, Hauser, 1.19M) reports "a prosecutor affiliated with the case who spoke only on condition of anonymity said there were fears that Mr. Rahman might be attacked if he was sent to an Afghan hospital for a mental health evaluation. 'He would be killed immediately if they release him,' the prosecutor said." Clerics "led hundreds of people in a demonstration in the northern city of Mazar-i-Sharif on Monday, demanding that Mr. Rahman be tried under Islamic law and executed." The Times adds, "A witness named Shaahed said people at the demonstration had shouted slogans against President Bush and Zalmay Khalilzad, who is originally from Balkh Province in the north and is now the American ambassador to Iraq." AFP (3/28) and Washington Times (3/28, Sands, 90K) run similar reports.

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 6, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The US State Department today said the government of Afghanistan will free" Rahman, and "that does not sit well with many Afghan Muslims." NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 6, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported the "move…has triggered new protests by hundreds of Muslims, the charges against Abdul Rahman have been dropped, and the UN says he is asking for asylum in another country after several Muslim clerics threatened to incite their followers to kill Rahman if he is released."

More Commentary. Columnist Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K), "What strikes me about the threat to execute Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who converted to Christianity, is not that Afghanistan remains deeply medieval and not even remotely the democracy that George W. Bush would like it to be, but that with the exception of the (largely) Christian West, the rest of the world has been mostly silent. The Americans have protested, the Brits have protested, the Vatican has protested and so (I assume) have some others." But "if there has been a holler of protest from anywhere in the Muslim world, it has not reached my ears. That is appalling."

Rumsfeld Says US Doing Poorly In Ideological Battle Against Terror. The AP (3/28) reports, "The United States is faring poorly in its effort to counter ideological support for terrorism, in part because the government does not communicate effectively, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday." Rumsfeld "made the remark in response to a question from a member of his audience at the Army War College, where he delivered a speech on the challenges facing the country in fighting a global war on terrorism." Said Rumsfeld, "If I were grading I would say we probably deserve a `D' or a `D-plus' as a country as to how well we're doing in the battle of ideas that's taking place in the world today. … I'm not going to suggest that it's easy, but we have not found the formula as a country" for countering the terrorists' message.

The Washington Times (3/28, Scarborough, 90K) says Rumsfeld also "delivered harsh words to war critics yesterday, saying some view al Qaeda operatives as victims, not the enemy that has killed Americans repeatedly." He also "criticized previous administrations -- without naming them -- for failing to take on Islamic terrorists despite a series of attacks, including the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. 'Before September 11, 2001, there was somewhat of a misunderstanding in America about terrorists, and in some circles, I suppose, there really is today,' Mr. Rumsfeld said.

'Even today, some folks view terrorists as criminals, not as combatants. Some even consider them victims.'"

Shiites Halt Talks On New Government Over US-Iraqi Raid. A joint US-Iraqi raid in Baghdad that resulted in the deaths of 16 Shiites has increased tensions between the US and the majority ethnic group. Although US leaders said the target of the raid was a leader of the Mehdi Army militia, Shiite leaders claimed that the joint raid was an assault on a mosque. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 5, 1:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The reaction has been swift and severe. Shiite leaders cut off negotiations to form a new government. Baghdad's Shiite governor cut off all ties with the US. And Iraq's Shiite prime minister called the top US general here, demanding an investigation."

NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 4, 2:05, Hattori, 9.87M) reported, "The US military says the dead were insurgents and that the building was not a mosque. Coalition forces say they found weapons and bomb-making equipment at the site." Lt. General Peter Chiarelli, Multinational Corps Iraq Commander: "I had the opportunity to talk to the advisors who were with the Iraqi unit, and they indicated there were absolutely no prayer rugs in the buildings." Hattori: "While the facts may still be in dispute, what is not, in dispute is the furor this incident has touched off."

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 7, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "Iraqis accuse US forces of entering a mosque and killing as many as 22 people, but the US says this was a raid led by Iraqi special operations troops who were targeting terrorists responsible for kidnappings and executions." The US "explanation did nothing to quell popular anger in the capital, where talks for a national unity government were suspended for at least a day."

The AP (3/28, Hurst) reports "there were numerous conflicting statements from Iraqis and the Americans about the raid. Iraqi police, Shiite militia officials and major politicians have all said the structure attacked was the al-Mustafa mosque." But "the U.S. military disputed this, saying no mosques were entered and that the raid targeted a building used by 'insurgents responsible for kidnapping and execution activities.'" Knight Ridder (3/28, Youssef) says "Shiite leaders charged that Sunday's raid in northeast Baghdad was an attempt by the Americans to distance themselves" from Shiites, "trying to give Sunnis more power than they won in the Dec. 15 election because they feared that Iraq would be controlled exclusively by Shiites, rather than shared with the Sunnis."

Similarly, the New York Times (3/28, Semple, 1.19M) reports "some Shiite leaders warned that the raid had been widely interpreted among their constituents as a strong-arm tactic to cow them into making political concessions." The governor of Baghdad, Hussein al-Tahaan, "said he was suspending cooperation with the American authorities 'due to the aggression that the innocent people and worshipers were subjected to.'" The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Shishkin, 2.11M) runs a similar report under the headline "US And Iraq's Shiite Leadership Differ Sharply In Accounts Of Raid," while the Washington Post (3/28, A1, Finer, Nouri, 744K) titles its story "US Officials Defend Raid Following Shiite Backlash." The Washington Times (3/28, 90K) and the Los Angeles Times (3/28, Boudreaux, Hussein, 958K) also report the story.

Attack On Army Center Near Tal Afar Kills At Least 40 Iraqis. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 4, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "At least 40 Iraqis were killed and 30 wounded when a suicide bomber blew himself up at an army recruitment center near Tal Afar. In Baghdad, gunmen kidnapped 16 employees of an Iraqi trading company. The motive is not yet known." The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 7, 2:10, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "Once again, Iraqi police recruits paid with their lives, attacked by a suicide bomber as they stood in line at a mobile recruiting drive near the al-Kisik training base about 14 miles from Tal Afar." NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 3, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The recruitment center is near a joint American/Iraqi military base but no American troops were reported wounded in this attack."

Pace Tries To Reassure Muslim Allies About Iraq Mission. The Washington Times/AP (3/28, Baldor) reports, "In the troubled region surrounding Iraq, a frequent question posed to the top US military officer visiting the area was not when his troops will pull out of Iraq, but how long they will stay. From the glittery king's palace in Saudi Arabia to the devastated slopes of the Pakistani mountainside and a staid Turkish symposium, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sought last week to ease concerns about whether opposition to the war at home could pressure U.S. forces to leave Iraq before it is stable." On "his first diplomatic-oriented trip since the fall," Gen. Pace "traveled to three countries whose leaders are worried about the US commitment to the Iraq war and the global war on terror. … 'I told them that from the US military's viewpoint, we would stay with the mission until we got the job done,' Gen. Pace said."

Arab Foreign Ministers Agree To Increase Diplomatic Presence In Iraq. The New York Times (3/28, Allam, 1.19M) reports, "Arab foreign ministers who gathered here over the weekend to prepare for a summit meeting agreed on a proposal to increase their diplomatic presence in Iraq. The draft resolution, which does not offer a timetable, is expected to be approved by the 22 members of the Arab League meeting here on Tuesday and Wednesday." Arab diplomatic missions "have maintained minimal staffs in Iraq since the American-led invasion in 2003 and particularly after two Algerian diplomats and an Egyptian envoy were kidnapped and killed there in July."

US Central Command Not Investigating Claim Of Russian Collusion With Saddam. The Washington Post (3/28, A20, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The US military's Central Command said yesterday it has not opened an investigation into whether sources inside the command leaked details of the 2003 US invasion of Iraq to Russian officials, and distanced itself from captured Iraqi documents that contain the allegations." A Central Command official "said the command takes 'all matters of operational security seriously' but was not probing the allegations."

Russia Sees "Hidden Political Motives" For Report. The AP (3/28) reports, "Russia's foreign minister accused the United States on Monday of having 'hidden political motives' for a report that said Moscow turned over information on American military plans to Saddam Hussein during the invasion of Iraq." Sergey Lavrov's comments "were the first formal statement from President Vladimir Putin's government about the Pentagon report, though a spokesman for Russia's foreign spy agency over the weekend denied the report's allegations." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "will discuss the matter with Lavrov -- either when the foreign ministers of the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany meet in Berlin on Thursday or by telephone, the State Department said."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (3/28, A22, 744K) editorializes, "The news that Moscow would have helped Saddam Hussein fight .. forces might be unwelcome to those administration officials who still try to portray Mr. Putin as a partner of the West and a worthy host for the next summit of the Group of Eight nations." But "it shouldn't be surprising. As has been well documented, Russia did its best to weaken and then break the sanctions regime imposed on Iraq, and then to prevent the 2003 invasion. In exchange it reaped lucrative economic concessions from Saddam Hussein, including the payment of large bribes to senior officials and politicians."

Seized Iraqi Documents Made Public. The AP (3/28, Tanner) reports, "The federal government is making public a huge trove of documents seized during the invasion of Iraq, posting them on the Internet in a step that is at once a nod to the Web's power and an admission that US intelligence resources are overloaded." Republican leaders in Congress "pushed for the release, which was first proposed by conservative commentators and bloggers hoping to find evidence about the fate of Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs, or possible links to terror groups." The AP adds "the documents' value is uncertain — intelligence officials say that they are giving each one a quick review to remove anything sensitive. Skeptics of the war, suspicious of the Bush administration, believe that means the postings are either useless or cherry-picked to bolster arguments for the war."

The New York Times (3/28, Shane, 1.19M) reports "American intelligence agencies and presidential commissions long ago concluded that Saddam Hussein had no unconventional weapons and no substantive ties to Al Qaeda before the 2003 invasion." However, "an unusual experiment in public access is giving anyone with a computer a chance to play intelligence analyst and second-guess the government. … Less than two weeks into the project, and with only 600 out of possibly a million documents and video and audio files posted, some conservative bloggers are already asserting that the material undermines the official view." On his blog last week, Ray Robison, "a former Army officer from Alabama, quoted a document reporting a supposed scheme to put anthrax into American leaflets dropped in Iraq and declared: 'Saddam's W.M.D. and terrorist connections all proven in one document!!!' Not so, American intelligence officials say."

In a New York Times op-ed (3/28), Peter Bergen, a fellow at the New America Foundation, says, "Bush Administration defenders, right-wing bloggers and neoconservative publications are crowing about Iraqi documents newly released by the Pentagon that, they say, prove that Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein were in league." But a "striking feature about the supposed Qaeda-Iraq connection is that since the fall of the Taliban, not one of the thousands of documents found in Afghanistan substantiate such an alliance, even though Al Qaeda was a highly bureaucratic organization that required potential recruits to fill out application forms." This "goes to the central problem faced by proponents of the Qaeda-Iraq connection. It's long been known that Iraqi officials were playing footsie with Al Qaeda in the mid-1990's, but these desultory contacts never yielded any cooperation. And why should they have?"

Iraqi Media Growing Increasingly Sectarian. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Roug, 958K) reports that although the Bush Administration has "poured millions of dollars into creating Western-style news media in Iraq, backing at least two television channels as well as training programs for Iraqi journalists on balance and ethics," the result "is hardly what the administration set out to accomplish. Most of the channels are increasingly sectarian and often appear to be inflaming the country's tensions, critics say." The Times adds, "Homebound because of violence and curfews, Iraqis watch their world through the kaleidoscope of satellite TV. But channel surfing Iraqi-style often offers views of the country through a sectarian lens."

Blair Defends Iraq Policies. The AP (3/28, McGuirk) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday pledged to keep British troops in Iraq and Afghanistan until those countries are stabilized. 'If the going is tough, we tough it out,' Blair told a rare joint session of Australia's Parliament." Blair "told lawmakers that the 'immediate threat is from Islamist extremism,' which he said was 'not a passing spasm of anger but a global ideology at war with us and our way of life.'" AFP (3/28) reports Blair's Australian counterpart John Howard also defended his "involvement in the US-led Iraq war, describing the political situation there as 'inspiring.'"

Memo Said To Show Bush, Blair Set On War In 2003. The networks last night all followed up on an New York Times report on memorandum by an aide to British Prime Minister Tony Blair that recorded details of a January, 2003 Oval Office meeting with President Bush.

NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 5, 2:05, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "The President and Tony Blair were officially on a diplomatic track, but a secret memo now reveals, they were determined to go to war six weeks before invading Iraq." The memo "said Blair asked about 'aftermath planning.' And 'Condi Rice said that a great deal of work was now in hand.'" David Phillips, former State Department Iraq advisor: "Both Bush and Blair were prepared to move forward with military action without fully appreciating the level of difficulty that we would face."

ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 6, :35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A memo has surfaced that paints President Bush eager to provoke Saddam Hussein into war. Tony Blair's foreign policy aide, David Manning, wrote it weeks before the invasion. It says that Mr. Bush floated the idea of painting US aircraft in UN colors, adding, 'If Saddam fired on them, that would be a clear green light for war.' The memo also says Mr. Bush felt it would be unlikely there would be warfare between Iraq's different religious and ethnic groups."

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 8, 0:50, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "We have not had any confirmation from US officials here or from the White House that these reports of this memo are taken in context and are correct, but it will certainly play into the hands of those who believe the Bush Administration misjudged the situation here in Iraq from the start, Russ."

Canadian PM Thanks Bush For Help In Rescuing Hostages. The AP (3/28) reports, "Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper called President Bush with thanks Monday for U.S. help in rescuing three peace activists from captivity in Iraq last week." The activists, "two Canadians and one Briton -- were freed without a shot, ending a four-month hostage drama in which an American among the group was shot to death and dumped on a Baghdad street."

State Department Hardship, Danger Pay Limits For Iraq, Afghanistan Boosted By 35%. The Washington Post (3/28, A21, Graham, 744K) reports, "To help recruit US government civilians for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan, the State Department has boosted the pay allowances for both hardship and danger to the highest levels ever granted. Starting this month, U.S. government civilians serving in Iraq and in Afghanistan outside of Kabul are receiving an extra 35 percent above their base salaries for hardship and another 35 percent for danger."

Krauthammer Says Fukayama Fabricated His Comments On Iraq War. Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K) that Francis Fukuyama's claim that Krauthammer "attributed 'virtually unqualified success' to the [Iraq] war is a fabrication. … For Fukuyama to assert that I characterized it as 'a virtually unqualified success' is simply breathtaking. My argument then, as now, was the necessity of this undertaking, never its ensured success. And it was necessary because, as I said, there is not a single, remotely plausible, alternative strategy for attacking the root causes of Sept. 11."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Challenges Government Witness In Enron Trial. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, McWilliams) reports, "Defense attorneys for Enron Corp.'s former two top executives continued to chip away at the testimony of a former finance executive who provided details of key meetings where the two were warned about the company's precarious state." The Journal continues, "Last week in the criminal conspiracy and fraud trial of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling, former Enron treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. testified that the two executives knew several businesses had lost billions in value but did not adjust the company's books and insisted to investors the company was healthy. He also testified that Mr. Lay misled credit companies about Enron's water-distribution business in order to retain an investment-grade credit rating. … Yesterday, Mr. Glisan acknowledged he had left an Oct. 22 meeting before the company's former chief accounting officer told Mr. Lay and other Enron directors that Enron's auditors had concluded no write-down of the company's Wessex Water unit was necessary. Prosecutors contend Mr. Lay lied about auditors' decision to investors."

The New York Times (3/28, Barrionuevo) reports, "Under questioning by Bruce Collins, a lawyer for Mr. Lay, Mr. Glisan acknowledged that he had assured Mr. Lay, the chief executive, and a group of directors that Enron had enough cash to operate. … Mr. Collins displayed notes from an Oct.

22, 2001, finance committee meeting taken by Paula Rieker, the corporate secretary, that showed that Mr. Glisan and Andrew S. Fastow, then the chief financial officer, told the directors, including Mr. Lay, that Enron had adequate liquidity. … Mr. Glisan told the board that Enron had immediate access to $1.5 billion in cash and could seek more. That appeared to contradict his testimony last week that he had given Mr. Lay a much dimmer financial forecast, saying Enron's liquidity was strained and its cash flow weak."

Bloomberg (3/28, Calkins) reports, "Testimony by a former Enron Corp. executive that he warned then-Chairman Kenneth Lay in October 2001 the company's finances were 'strained' was contradicted by evidence presented today by defense lawyers at Lay's fraud trial." Bloomberg reports that Gilsan "said last week in federal court in Houston that he told Lay in September and October 2001 the company faced a liquidity crisis and that Lay knew some of Enron's assets, including a British water company, needed to be written down in value. … Today, Lay's attorney Bruce Collins presented notes from an Oct. 22, 2001, finance committee meeting that showed Glisan had optimistic estimates about the company's access to cash. The minutes show that after Glisan left the meeting, Chief Accounting Officer Rick Causey had told Lay the water company didn't need to be written down, which Lay told analysts the next day. … 'I cannot say I had all the information he had,' Glisan said under cross-examination during his fourth day on the witness stand. 'I did not have this piece of information. Mr. Causey gave a favorable report, it seems.'"

Skilling Tried To Sell Enron Stock Days Before 9/11. The Houston Chronicle (3/28, Fowler) reports, "Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling tried to sell one-fifth of his Enron stock holdings just weeks after he left the company and days before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to testimony in court Monday. … The sale of 200,000 shares never went through on Sept. 6, 2001, because his stockbroker still had him listed as a company officer restricted from selling, but he was able to sell 500,000 shares several weeks later." The Chronicle continues, "The failed sale itself wasn't illegal but it could cast doubt on statements Skilling gave to investigators that the only reason he sold stock after leaving the company was post-Sept. 11 worry." The Chronicle adds, "Testimony about the stock sale, one of 10 illegal sales the government claims Skilling made, came on day 31 of the trial. The government may finish its case against Skilling and former chairman Ken Lay as early as this afternoon. … Former Treasurer Ben Glisan, who left the stand Monday afternoon, was the last major witness the government planned to call."

Lay Faces Second Trial On Separate Bank Fraud Chages. The Washington Post (3/28, D1, Johnson) reports, "As lawyers for Enron Corp.'s former leaders prepare to start their defense next week, another potentially more dangerous trial looms for founder Kenneth L. Lay." The Post continues, "Lay is scheduled to be tried on four separate criminal charges related to personal bank loans, with the case opening as soon as the jury begins deliberations in the current trial, in which both Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling are charged with fraud in Enron's collapse. … The unusual double jeopardy is the result of a bet Lay's legal team placed -- and lost -- two years ago. Lay sought to face trial alone rather than with his protege Skilling, who ran the company's daily operations." The Post adds, "Government lawyers pounced on the strategic opportunity. The judge's ruling, in what may be the worst possible outcome for Lay, gave prosecutors not one but two chances to convict the former titan. The judge kept Lay in the major fraud case, which includes Skilling. But he split off into a separate trial four narrow fraud charges against Lay that relate to personal bank loans. .. The second proceeding, to be decided by the same judge, will begin a mere two hours after jurors retire to consider the broader charges. It means that Lay, who built a fortune once valued at more than $100 million after growing up the son of a poor Baptist preacher who hopped from job to job, will face the anxiety of awaiting a jury verdict in the first trial while he defends himself against additional charges that carry a maximum penalty of a decade behind bars."

Trustees Find Billing Problems By Enron Turnaround Expert. The AP (3/28, Sherman) reports, "The turnaround expert who led Enron Corp. through its bankruptcy engaged in unacceptable billing practices and has agreed to cut in half the $25 million he has been seeking as a 'success fee,' the Justice Department said Monday." The AP continues, "The department's U.S. Trustee Program, which monitors the administration of bankruptcy cases, said it uncovered the billing problems after Stephen Forbes Cooper LLC and its principal, Stephen Cooper, asked the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York for $25 million as the fee for guiding the one-time energy giant, decimated by scandal, through its Chapter 11 case." The AP adds, "The firm denied any billing irregularities, but agreed to reduce its request to $12.5 million after the trustee's office shared the results of its investigation with the bankruptcy court, according to papers filed with the bankruptcy court. The court agreement did not spell out the billing issues. … U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Arthur Gonzalez will determine the size of the success fee."

Former Raytheon CEO Agrees To Fine, Bonus Forfeit. The New York Times (3/28, Wayne) reports, "The former chief executive of the Raytheon Corporation, Daniel P. Burnham, has agreed to pay a fine and return part of a $1.75 million bonus to settle Securities and Exchange Commission accusations over improper accounting practices in 2000 and 2001." The Times continues, "Disclosure of the arrangement came in a regulatory filing yesterday by the First Data Corporation, where Mr. Burnham, 59, is a director and chairman of the company's compensation committee. Mr. Burnham served as chairman and chief executive of Raytheon for five years until his resignation in July 2003." The Times adds, "The alleged accounting irregularities took place in Raytheon's troubled commercial aircraft division from 1997 to 2001 and concerned the timing of losses recorded by the company. The S.E.C. said that the company had overstated its 2001 losses and that its aircraft subsidiary should have charged up to $240 million of a $693 million loss in 2000 instead. … Since January 2003, the S.E.C. has been investigating accounting practices at Raytheon's aircraft division, which had faced a deteriorating market. Last April, the company offered to settle the investigation and recorded a charge of $12 million in the first quarter of 2005 to cover potential settlement costs. Raytheon has neither admitted nor denied the charges and the offer has yet to be approved."

Former Clarent CEO Pleads Not Guilty To Securities Fraud. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/25, C1, Abate) reported, "The U.S. attorney in San Francisco has charged a Los Altos man with two counts of federal securities fraud for allegedly inflating the revenues of Clarent Corp. in 2001. Shares in the publicly traded Redwood City firm, which sold equipment to send phone calls over the Internet, collapsed between September 2001 and May 2002, wiping out $200 million in stock value, according to the indictment." Former Clarent CEO Jerry Shaw-Yau Chang, "surrendered to federal authorities in San Francisco Friday," pleaded not guilty to the charges, and was released on bond. IDG News Service (3/25, Gross) also reported on Chang's indictment.

Firms Pressured By US Over Employees' Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Koppel) reports, "Defense lawyers are closely watching an accounting-fraud case in New Hampshire that they see as the latest government effort to stop companies from paying the legal fees of indicted employees." The Journal continues, "In the past three years, federal prosecutors in New York, Alabama and, now, Concord, N.H., have pursued a strategy that puts companies at risk of being branded as uncooperative if they don't cut off such payments. Lawyers say that could be tantamount to convicting defendants before they have even had a trial, since they can't properly defend themselves. … 'If companies don't cooperate with the government, they can face a death penalty by being indicted,' says Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University College of Law. She adds that companies fear becoming the next Arthur Andersen LLP, which imploded shortly after its indictment in 2002 for allegedly obstructing the government's investigation of fraud at Enron Corp. (The accounting firm was later convicted of obstruction, but the Supreme Court overturned the verdict last year.) 'Prosecutors can now force individuals to pay their own attorneys' fees," Prof. Podgor says, "and corporations have to go along.'" The Journal notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse counters that 'the government does not force corporations to do anything.' If a company declines to advance fees, he adds, 'that is a business decision made after weighing all of the costs and benefits of cooperation.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Dismisses Two Jurors In Ryan Corruption Trial. The New York Times (3/28, Rudoren) reports, "A federal judge dismissed two jurors on Monday two weeks after the jury began deliberating in former Gov. George Ryan's corruption case, tossing into turmoil a trial that has stretched over six months." The Times continues, "The judge, Rebecca R. Pallmeyer of Federal District Court, said she had not made any decisions about whether to proceed and hoped to avoid a mistrial by replacing the two jurors with alternates. … But Mr. Ryan's lawyers objected to that prospect, arguing that 'asking them to "start deliberations anew" is asking the impossible.'" The Times notes, "The dismissals follow revelations in The Chicago Tribune last week that two jurors lied on questionnaires about whether they had criminal records, with one failing to disclose drunken-driving arrests that led to the revocation of his driver's license while Mr. Ryan, a Republican, was the secretary of state, whose office is responsible for such matters." The Times notes that "legal experts who have been following the proceedings described Monday's removals as a serious threat to the trial, raising a strong issue for appeal regardless of how the judge proceeds."

The Chicago Sun-Times (3/28, Korecki, Sweeney) reports, "In a motion filed this morning, Ryan's lawyers object to replacing the two questionable jurors with substitutes, saying that would constitute a violation of Ryan's Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial." The Sun-Times adds, "The two jurors in question were seen walking separate from other jurors this morning. It appeared they were leaving Pallmeyer's chambers. … The remaining jurors left the building at about 11:30 a.m." The Sun-Times notes, "A male juror did not disclose DUI convictions and a weapons conviction, and a female juror did not disclose six arrests and a weapons charge. The woman was never convicted, according to public records."

The AP (3/28, Robinson) reports, "The announcement came after a day in which deliberations where on hold while the judge met privately with attorneys on both sides to try to prevent a mistrial after six months of proceedings. … The trial has already cost millions of dollars to hold -- 'a very significant investment,' Pallmeyer noted. … She said her goal would be to forge ahead, if 'we can proceed with this case fairly.'"

CBS 2 Chicago (3/28, Levine) reports, "As Judge Pallmeyer ponders her next step, others question the Chicago Tribune investigation that triggered the controversy. … 'It was waiting until the trial had closed and the deliberations began with replacements gone home that caused all these problems,' said Northwestern University Law Professor Ron Allen." CBS 2 continues, "According to Tribune Editor Anne Marie Lipinski, the investigation that discovered a juror's criminal background started after deliberations began as a feature story. … 'We were looking for routine information so we could contact jurors when the case was over, which is very common in stories like this,' Lipinski said. 'The reporter assigned to this came across this information. We were quite surprised by it and immediately brought it to the attention of the court.'"

Tribune Examines How Problems Were Uncovered. The Chicago Tribune (3/28, Janega) runs a report on how the newspaper uncovered the problems with the jurors' answers. The Tribune reports, "After a 5½-month trial and eight days of jury deliberations, the Chicago Tribune uncovered public records last week indicating that two jurors in the federal trial of former Gov. George Ryan gave false answers on their jury questionnaires." The Tribune continues, "Both jurors had checked boxes on pretrial questionnaires indicating that they had never been charged with a crime, but the Tribune found public records that appeared to contradict those answers." The Tribune adds, "While the information had the potential to disrupt the trial, Tribune editors recognized it could be even more damaging if it were revealed after the jury had reached its verdict. Nationally, other cases have been overturned on appeal when it was discovered after the verdict that jurors had been untruthful to the court. … Because of this, the newspaper went to Chief Judge Charles Kocoras as soon as possible, both to continue the reporting on the story and to inform court officials of the records it had discovered."

Jury Duty Can Force Unwelcome Revelations. The Chicago Tribune (3/28, Quintanilla, Janega) reports, "The white-hot spotlight of the American judicial system can be uncomfortable, with lawyers, judges and sometimes the media prying into difficult and embarrassing moments. But defendants aren't alone in the glare. From the moment a jury summons arrives, potential jurors find their own histories under scrutiny. … 'Has any member of your immediate family or a very close friend ever been the victim of a crime?' asks a typical juror questionnaire. 'Have you ever been a party to any lawsuit?'" The Tribune adds, "Experts say most jurors, facing threat of perjury, try to be honest. But they say others may be too embarrassed to answer fully, or think it doesn't matter. … 'I think some truly don't understand the gravity of the responses that they're giving. And others are being evasive, and we have no idea which it is,' said Duke University Law School professor Neil Vidmar. … If they do have something in their past, 'they may have said, "That's over and done with,"' he said. Officers of the court seldom know when a juror has stopped being truthful."

Abramoff Defenders Seek Leniency From Sentencing Judge. The New York Times (3/28, Shenon, 1.19M) reports Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff "may be among the most unpopular men in Washington, shunned by many of his former friends at the White House and on Capitol Hill. But more than 260 others — including a House member from California, a senior Senate staff member and several leaders of the Washington Jewish community — have stepped forward in letters to a federal judge to praise Mr. Abramoff and ask that he be spared a long prison sentence." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher "said in his letter that Mr. Abramoff was a 'selfless patriot' whose work in a conservative lobbying group, Citizens for America, in the 1980's was evidence of his desire 'to make a positive contribution to the nation he loves so much.'"

Cunningham Gave NRCC $2000 In Campaign Funds. The Hill (3/28, Allen) reports that before former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) "headed to prison, he prepared a small parting gift intended to help his colleagues in the upcoming election: a $2,000 check from his expiring campaign committee to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC)." The December 13th contribution "followed on the heels of an Oct. 24 donation of $11,684 to the NRCC. It also came about two weeks after he admitted to taking $2.4 million in bribes to direct government business to certain defense contractors." NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said "that the party never received the $2,000 check and that it has 'no plans' to return the nearly $12,000 it accepted before Cunningham's Nov. 28 guilty plea."

Judge Lets Safavian Subpoena To Senate Aide Stand. Roll Call (3/28, Bresnahan, Newmyer) reports US District Judge Paul Friedman "has let stand a subpoena issued to a Senate Indian Affairs Committee staffer by attorneys for David Safavian, the former Bush administration official charged with lying to federal investigators about his relationship with Jack Abramoff." Safavian's attorneys had "subpoenaed Indian Affairs investigator Bryan David Parker for all documents or notes Parker made during his discussions with Safavian in February and March 2005. The Justice Department tried to have the subpoena quashed, arguing that Safavian's attorneys already had notes from an FBI agent who interviewed Parker. Friedman eventually sided with Safavian."

Nevada Corruption Trial Jurors Hear More FBI Wiretaps Of Alleged Bribes. KVBC-TV Las Vegas (3/27) reports, "Monday was a good day to be Dario Herrera and a bad day to be Mary Kincaid-Chauncey in the G-Sting political corruption trial. … In wiretaps played for jurors," strip club owner Mike Galardi and lobbyist Lance Malone "repeatedly conspire over how much money to offer Dario Herrera in exchange for his vote to allow nude dancing with alcohol being served at strip clubs," but "no matter what Galardi offered, Herrera wouldn't budge." Kincaid-Chauncey, however, "can be heard repeatedly conspiring with Malone to get votes to go Galardi's way, and can also be heard asking Malone for Galardi's money."

Court Hearing To Reveal Details About FBI Informant In Minnesota Bribery Case. The Minneapolis Star-Tribune (3/28, Chanen, Furst) reports Gary A. Carlson's "role last year in helping the FBI investigate Dean Zimmermann, who at the time was a City Council member, is expected to come into sharper focus today at a court hearing on the bribery allegations. Zimmermann's attorney is seeking more information about Carlson -- a real estate developer and the unnamed 'cooperating witness' who assisted the FBI," telling agents "last May that Zimmermann sought campaign contributions in exchange for supporting zoning changes that would aid Chicago Commons. Zimmermann allegedly took $7,200 from the witness during three meetings in June and August, court documents said."

Prosecution Witness Backs Up Star Witness' Testimony At "Mafia Cops" Trial. Newsday (3/28, DeStefano) reports, "Visions of the tropics as the scene of skulduggery entered the 'Mafia Cops' trial Monday, with a witness telling a federal court jury that he passed money directly to one of two ex-NYPD detectives on a Caribbean island." Thomas Galpine "said he paid $10,000 to…Louis Eppolito in 1988 or 1989 for a Caribbean time-sharing unit at the behest of businessman Burton Kaplan, a key associate of the Luchese crime family." Galpine, "who is serving a 16-year sentence for marijuana trafficking," is "testifying with a promise that prosecutors would help him get a reduction in his sentence if he is a truthful witness." Yesterday, he "the effect of backing up Kaplan on a number of points, among them, Kaplan's lending of $75,000 in marijuana smuggling money to Eppolito for a Las Vegas house purchase, and Kaplan's claim that he was getting information from two cops." The New York Times (3/28, Feuer, 1.19M) notes, "Lawyers for the two defendants were in the unenviable position of hearing Mr. Kaplan's words repeated by Mr. Galpine. On cross-examination, Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, went on the attack. He called Mr. Galpine an 'acolyte and errand man' under the spell of Mr. Kaplan, whom Mr. Cutler called 'a Fagin character' who had led the witness on a 'spiral to perdition, to hell.' … Nonetheless, Mr. Galpine seemed unfazed."

Eppolito's Cousin Testifies For Prosecution. The New York Daily News (3/28, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "The feds yesterday called a member of Louis Eppolito's own crime family to testify against the reputed Mafia cop. Tammy Ahmed is the daughter of slain mob associate Frank Santora, who was the original intermediary between Eppolito -- his first cousin -- and Luchese crime associate Burton Kaplan." In "damning" testimony, Ahmed recalled "names and numbers in her father's phone book -- including the reputed Mafia cops, Kaplan and a tow-truck driver who is expected to testify today that he helped Santora bury the corpse of murder victim Israel Greenwald."

FBI Agents Testify Nichols Said Ex-Girlfriend's Affair Prompted Courthouse Shootings. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/28, Cook, 430K) reports, "Accused killer Brian Nichols told investigators he shot up the Fulton County Courthouse on March 11, 2005, because of his former girlfriend's romantic relationship with a minister, two FBI agents testified Monday." Special Agents Joseph Fonseca and Cynthia Myers "testified they were about to leave the…apartment complex where Nichols surrendered…when he made the spontaneous admission while sitting in the back seat handcuffed and shackled. … 'We told him to wait until we got to headquarters,' said FBI agent Myers," and "for the rest of the drive, the conversation was light and focused primarily on the ongoing NCAA basketball playoffs." The AP (3/28, Weber) notes, "Fonseca's testimony came during a hearing in which Nichols' lawyers were seeking to have the court throw out their client's statements to police following his arrest." The defense lawyers contend "Nichols was denied counsel before he made incriminating statements," but "prosecutors have argued Nichols waived his right to counsel and spoke voluntarily."

Fourth Man Charged In New Hampshire Phone-Jamming Scheme. The AP (3/27, Ramer) reports, "The former co-owner of a telemarketing firm pleaded not guilty Monday to participating in a Republican scheme to jam New Hampshire Democrats' get-out-the-vote phone lines on Election Day 2002." The AP continues, "Shaun Hansen, 34, of Spokane, Wash., was indicted by a federal grand jury on March 8, but the charges were not made public until his arraignment Monday. … Hansen is charged with conspiring to commit and aiding the commission of telephone harassment. Prosecutors say he was paid $2,500 to have employees at Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises place hundreds of hang-up calls to phone lines installed to help voters get rides to the polls on Nov. 5, 2002. Among the contests decided that day was the close U.S. Senate race in which Republican Rep. John Sununu beat outgoing Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen." The AP adds, "Three others have been convicted for their roles in the scheme." … Former state Republican Executive Director Chuck McGee pleaded guilty to devising the idea of jamming the lines and served seven months in prison. Allen Raymond, former president of Virginia-based GOP Marketplace LLC, pleaded guilty to executing the plan and is serving a three-month sentence. … James Tobin, who had served as New England chairman of President Bush's re-election campaign, was convicted in December of telephone harassment charges and faces up to five years in federal prison. He is scheduled to be sentenced in May."

Fumo said yesterday that he wasn't worried about the two-year federal probe into his role in a South Philadelphia nonprofit, predicting that it would 'go nowhere.' … For more than two years, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the FBI, and the IRS have been investigating the spending and fund-raising of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the group that the senator has called 'my nonprofit.' … Fumo suggested that the Bush administration was behind the investigation. 'In this case, you have a White House that still believes Pennsylvania should be a red state,' he said."

Texas Contractor Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison For Overcharging Lockheed. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (3/28, Okada, 247K) reports Todd Brian Loftis, president of Lockheed Martin supplier Tools and Metals, was sentenced to seven years and three-months "and ordered to repay the aeronautics company $20 million in restitution for conspiring to defraud the U.S. government by overcharging the company since 1998" on F-16 and F/A-22 fighter jet contracts. The Star-Telegram notes, "Prosecutor Ronald Eddins, who won a guilty plea from Loftis in December, estimated the fraud to be 'in the neighborhood of $20 million.' Defense counsel Thomas Melsheimer, however, presented a retired FBI expert to testify that the amount was actually $10 million, or even less."

Law Firms Worried About Pellicano-Related Wiretap Suits. The California Recorder (3/28, Scheck, Schmitt) reports, "Indictments stemming from Hollywood's latest celebrity scandal have struck fear into L.A.'s legal community. But it's the civil fallout from private eye Anthony Pellicano's wiretapping indictment that instills true horror for law firms." The Recorder continues, "While top entertainment lawyer Terry Christensen is the only attorney indicted so far in connection with Pellicano, several others face litigation that could cripple their practices -- and possibly break up their firms." The Recorder adds, "The big problem, said Timothy Halloran, an expert in law firm liability at Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney in San Francisco, is that illegal activity such as wiretapping won't be covered by malpractice insurance. … 'I would expect that in the Pellicano matter, if the wiretapping was in connection with big litigation, someone who was wiretapped can make a pretty big damages claim,' Halloran said. 'Your professional liability insurance can't cover you for that.'" The Recorder notes, "That's the issue that much of the L.A. legal community is looking at these days, as a small but well-armed armada of plaintiffs takes aim at lawyers who used Pellicano for wiretaps. … Developments during the past week indicate that while Christensen may be the first lawyer indicted, another top firm -- L.A. entertainment shop Greenberg Glusker Fields Claman Machtinger & Kinsella -- may be feeling even more heat. … At least a half-dozen Greenberg Glusker attorneys are talking about leaving, according to a source within the firm. … And while some Greenberg Glusker attorneys said last week that they were confident that the firm's future was stable, others were unsure how the firm would weather Pellicano-related lawsuits."

California Business, Civic Leader Pleads Guilty To Investment Fraud. Bay City News Wires (3/27) reports, "A former president of the Moraga Chamber of Commerce and Moraga Rotary Club has pleaded guilty to nine counts of mail fraud and seven counts of wire fraud for his role in defrauding more than 30 investors out of more than $5 million." Edwin Torres "entered his plea last Friday," admitting "that he used his status…to influence potential investors to buy high-yielding Los Angeles and Orange County municipal bonds when in fact he had no intention to buy the bonds and did not do so." BCN notes, "The U.S. Attorney's office says Torres' guilty plea is the result of an investigation by the FBI in conjunction with the Contra Costa County District Attorney's Office."

Famed Coroner Resigns After Federal Indictment. The AP (3/28, Mandak) reports on Allegheny County, PA, coroner Cyril Wecht, who federal prosecutors say "used county employees, equipment, even unclaimed morgue cadavers for the benefit of his multimillion-dollar private pathology practice. … Wecht, 74, resigned from office a few days after being indicted in January on charges including fraud and theft of honest services. But he has denied any wrongdoing and continues to crisscross the country as an expert witness in murders and wrongful-death cases. He is expected to go on trial in October." The AP adds, "Buried in the 84-count indictment is the allegation that Wecht had his former county secretary type a nasty letter to Keith Sueker, a retired engineer who poked fun of Wecht's failed run for county executive in 1999. … Federal authorities say it was another instance of Wecht using a county worker for his personal benefit - in this case, political retribution. But for longtime Wecht watchers, it shows an ugly side of Wecht generally hidden from national view." The AP notes, "Wecht, who holds a law degree in addition to a medical degree, served two 10-year stretches in the elected position of coroner, first from 1970 to 1980, then from 1996 to 2006."

DeLay's Concealed Weapon License Suspended. The Washington Post (3/28, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column, "Texas officials have suspended the former House majority leader's license to carry a concealed weapon, according to Fort Bend County court documents first revealed over the weekend by Brazosriver.com, a Web site based in his home county. Under Texas law, anyone indicted on felony charges is prohibited from packing a pistol, and DeLay was hit with campaign money-laundering charges in October." DeLay will "get his license back if the criminal charges are dropped or he's acquitted."

Program Aims To Curb Gang Violence In Prison. The Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Abate) reports on "an unusual program aimed at breaking one of the most pervasive - and violent - influences behind bars and on the streets of urban America: gangs. In a quest to overcome deeply ingrained and often fatal differences, the initiative brings together former rival gang members in one cell pod to eat, sleep, and live. … The program, 'Breaking Barriers,' offers counseling and courses - from substance abuse to poetry readings - to help overcome the causes of gang fealty and drug addiction. The goal is to get inmates who move through the Santa Clara County central jail to permanently sever ties with gangs, and thus reduce violence, when they transfer to a state prison or return to a life on the outside." The Monitor adds, "Experts consider it one of the only local programs of its kind in the country. While the initiative is still young - only two years old - it has already shown some success in rehabilitating individual lives." The Monitor notes, "Gangs are nothing new to prison life, but over the past four decades their presence has increased dramatically. One national study found that, of the nearly 2 million people incarcerated in the US, more than 43 percent associated with a gang."

Woman Posing As WPost Employee Suspected In Credit Card Scam. The Washington Post (3/28, A9, Cauvin) reports, "A woman posing as a Washington Post employee is suspected of duping dozens of the newspaper's advertisers into turning over their credit card numbers, according to The Post and the U.S. attorney's office." The Post continues, "Using the telephone numbers placed in classified ads, the woman would call advertisers claiming that she worked for the paper, Post spokesman Eric Grant said in a statement yesterday afternoon. … The woman would explain that the advertiser's credit card number had not gone through and that she needed to run it again. After the person provided the card information, the woman would use it to start making charges to that account." The Post adds, "At least 50 people have been victims of the scam, according to a person familiar with the case who spoke on the condition of anonymity because charges have not been filed. … The identity theft scam came to the paper's attention in 2002, and The Post notified the D.C. police, the paper said. Why the investigation has moved so slowly was not immediately clear, and officials would not say when the scam began or when it ended. The inquiry is now in the hands of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, which is frequently involved in investigating identity theft, and the investigation appears to be coming to a close."

Texas Man Cautiously Returns To Society After DNA Exoneration. The New York Times (3/28, Levy) reports, "Arthur Mumphrey says he is doing his best to enjoy life these days. But after spending 18 years in prison for a rape he did not commit, he is also finding that being on the outside can be overwhelming." The Times continues, "Gov. Rick Perry pardoned Mr. Mumphrey, 42, on March 17 after a DNA test indicated that he did not sexually assault the victim, a 13-year-old seventh grader, who was forced at knifepoint into a wooded area near Conroe, about 40 miles north of Houston, and raped repeatedly on the night of Feb. 28, 1986. … Mr. Mumphrey was paroled in 2000 after serving 14 years of a 35-year sentence, but was sent back to prison two years later after failing to contact his parole officer. He points to his case as yet another example of the merits of DNA testing and the doggedness of a defense lawyer — as well as the systemic flaws of the Texas criminal justice system." The Times adds, "Mr. Mumphrey's younger brother, Charles Mumphrey, who is in jail on an unrelated crime, confessed earlier this year to participating in the rape, said Marc Brumberger, an assistant district attorney for Montgomery County. He cannot be charged, though, because the statute of limitations has expired. … A co-defendant, Steve Thomas, pleaded guilty during a 1986 trial and testified against Arthur Mumphrey in exchange for a 15-year sentence."

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Exempts Web Communications From Campaign Finance Laws. The New York Times (3/28, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports, "The Federal Election Commission ruled unanimously Monday that political communication on the Internet, including Web logs, setting up Web sites and e-mail, was not regulated by campaign finance laws." The commission, "in a 6-to-0 decision, also ruled that paid political advertisements placed on Web sites were covered by the 2002 campaign finance law, which includes restrictions on spending and contributions and bars corporations and unions from using their treasuries to purchase Web advertisements." The Washington Post (3/28, A3, Edsall, 744K) says "the 6 to 0 vote was widely expected." The Washington Times (3/28, Pfeiffer, 90K) also reports the story under the headline "C To Leave Alone Web Political Speech."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Federal Judge Refuses To Delay New Orleans Election. The AP (3/28) reports, "New Orleans residents living in Houston, Atlanta and other cities are still waiting for the absentee ballots they applied for weeks ago. No one knows how many people will come back to the city to vote. And the polling places have yet to be selected." The AP continues, "Pulling off this city's April 22 mayoral election could wind up as a fine example of democracy under trying circumstances, or a wobbly, error-filled embarrassment." tHe AP adds, 'On Monday, a federal judge refused to postpone New Orleans' first election since Hurricane Katrina, despite complaints from civil rights groups that too many blacks scattered by the storm will be unable to take part in the voting. … U.S. District Judge Ivan Lemelle told both sides -- the state and plaintiffs -- to solve any problems that might hinder displaced residents' ability to vote. 'I recognize that there is still room for improvement in that electoral process,' he said. … Still, Lemelle said going ahead with the voting will help the city rebuild."

Emails Reveal Possible Bias By Top Florida Police Official In Boot Camp Probe. The Miami Herald (3/28, Miller, 323K) reports, "When the family of Martin Lee Anderson questioned the impartiality of Florida's top state lawman," Department of Law Enforcement Director Guy Tunnell, "in investigating the teen's death at a Panama City boot camp, Tunnell assured Floridians he would be fair and impartial." The family was worried because he "is a former sheriff of Bay County, founded the boot camp, and is friends with the current sheriff, Frank McKeithen," and "now, a series of e-mails obtained by The Miami Herald shows that at the same time his agency was investigating the camp, Tunnell kept a running commentary to McKeithen, other sheriffs and his own staff in which he let off steam and disparaged critics of his investigation and the state's boot camps. He also kept McKeithen abreast of the FDLE's efforts to keep a video -- which showed boot camp guards kneeing and punching the teen hours before his death -- from becoming public."

Voting Machine Glitches Spark Fears Of Widespread Problems In 2006. USA Today (3/28, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that problems with voting machines in the Texas and Illinois primaries "have reinforced fears that the 2006 elections may be beset with glitches. … More than 30 million Americans will be voting on unfamiliar equipment this year, after modernization required by the Help America Vote Act. Congress passed the law in 2002 to address problems stemming from the 2000 presidential election in Florida." The next test of the machines will come in May when 10 states hold primaries.

Election Law Designed To Help Disabled Vote. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/27, Sherman) reports, "Florida's 2000 election, forever linked with the notorious hanging chads, did more than expose the flaws of the nation's aging voting systems. It cleared the way for Congress to address many lingering problems with how Americans vote. … One politically active group rushed to take advantage of that movement." The Post-Gazette continues, "The Help America Vote Act, passed in early 2002, created the first legal guarantees that all disabled voters would be able to participate in the democratic process just as readily as anyone else. .. The law, known as HAVA, requires both accessible polling places and voting machines that let disabled voters make their choices privately and independently. … 'The whole disability community was pushing for that,' said Jim Dickson, vice president of the American Association of People with Disabilities, based in Washington, D.C." The Post-Gazette notes, "Prior to the 2000 election, several federal laws addressed the need for improvements in voting access, but none had HAVA's weight. If state and local governments don't acquire at least one accessible machine per polling place, they could squander millions in aid and face lawsuits from the justice department. … In Allegheny County, many disabled voters have long had to rely on family, friends or poll workers to help them operate 40-year-old lever machines. Under HAVA, that must change by the May 16 primary election."

families to live in well-off suburbs was necessary to make 'real progress' in overcoming decades of government policies that segregated residents in poor, minority areas of the city, a lawyer for the tenants told a federal judge Monday." The Sun continues, "In his opening statement in the remedy phase of a public housing desegregation case, attorney Peter Buscemi said a proposal requiring the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to provide 6,750 special housing vouchers and new and rehabilitated units over 10 years would give public housing families a 'better chance at life.' … But a lawyer for HUD countered that the proposal was 'plagued with problems and should not be implemented in any form.'" The Sun adds, "The judge does not have the authority to order the creation of new housing but can only ask the federal agency to review decisions that he found problematic, said HUD lawyer Peter Phipps. … In January 2005, U.S. District Judge Marvin J. Garbis found that HUD had violated federal fair-housing laws by failing to "affirmatively further fair housing" by taking a regional approach to the desegregation of public housing in Baltimore. … The ruling stemmed from a class action lawsuit filed in 1995 on behalf of black Baltimore public housing residents that claimed that the city and the federal government had failed to dismantle the segregated public housing system they set up in the 1930s and 1940s. Garbis absolved the city and its Housing Authority of wrongdoing."

Supreme Court Ponders Prison Rules About Reading Material. The AP (3/28, Locy) reports, "The Supreme Court struggled Monday with whether states can keep troublesome inmates from reading secular newspapers and magazines." Pennsylvania prison officials "urged the high court to allow them to use access to newspapers and magazines as an incentive to get inmates to behave themselves." The New York Times (3/28, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the case "is a class-action lawsuit that began when the prison authorities seized a copy of The Christian Science Monitor, to which an inmate, Ronald Banks, had a subscription." The lower courts "looked at the policy as a whole, and did not scrutinize its application to individual inmates."

The Washington Post (3/28, A6, Lane, 744K) reports that "at issue is the Long-Term Segregation Unit, located in Pittsburgh until a move in recent years to Fayette County, where inmates from around the state are sent after attempting to escape or assaulting guards." Prisoners "may be kept in solitary confinement 23 hours per day. They get no television, radio, newspapers, magazines or photographs, except for religious or legal publications." The Post adds, "Access to reading material is relaxed in return for good behavior. … The appeals court ruled that Pennsylvania could not enforce the policy without evidence that it achieved its stated purposes." Then-Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. "dissented, saying that a prisoner who was subjected to the restrictions for a long time may have a claim, but that in general the rules were reasonable. Yesterday, now-Justice Alito had to sit out the case, leaving his eight colleagues to weigh the policy."

Georgia Lawmakers Approve Public School Bible Courses. Georgia lawmakers yesterday passed a bill to fund elective Bible courses in public high schools. The bill, which awaits Gov. sonny Perdue's signature, would fund separate courses on the Old and New Testaments. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Fausset, 958K) that the move has sparked "concern among 1st Amendment advocates," while "generating praise from lawmakers worried that children are losing their grasp on one of Western civilization's most influential texts."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Appeals South Korea Antitrust Ruling. The AP (3/28) reports, "Microsoft Corp. filed a lawsuit on Monday challenging a set of punitive measures that South Korea's antitrust regulators imposed on the U.S. software company for its alleged unfair business practices." The AP continues, "The suit, filed with the Seoul High Court, has been widely expected as Microsoft said after the December ruling by the Fair Trade Commission that it would take the case to court. … 'Microsoft continues to believe that its actions are consistent with Korean law and have benefited Korean consumers and the Korean technology industry,' the company said in a statement announcing its appeal." The AP notes, "The ruling, which was finalized in February, said that Microsoft's practice of tying certain software to Windows was an abuse of its dominant position in the market. … The commission ordered the U.S. company to pay a fine of $33.6 million and provide two separate versions of Windows: one stripped of the Windows Media Player and Windows Messenger, and the other carrying links to Web pages that allow consumers to download competing versions of such software."

FTC Gies Antitrust Nod To Merrill Lynch-BlackRock Merger. MarketWatch (3/28) reports, "Merrill Lynch & Co. has received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to spin off its asset-management business and merge it with BlackRock Inc. (BLK), creating a new, independent company with nearly $1 trillion in assets under management. … The FTC said Monday that on Friday it granted Lucent early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act."

Dow Jones (3/28) reports, "As reported, Merrill Lynch has agreed to exchange its money-management business, Merrill Lynch Investment Managers, for a 49.8% stake - valued at more than $8 billion - in BlackRock, a money manager specializing in bonds. … In a press release Feb. 15, Merrill Lynch said it would have a 45% voting interest in the combined company, which will operate under the BlackRock name and be governed by a board with a majority of independent members."

Lucent, Alcatel Seek To Ease US Security Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Berman, Silver, 2.11M) reports, "Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel SA are moving toward a plan to place some of Lucent's most sensitive defense-related research under the eye of a separate board composed only of Americans, people familiar with the matter said." The move is aimed at appeasing US government security concerns." Both Congress and "elements within the U.S. defense establishment have taken a skeptical view to foreign takeover plans of late, fearing that national security could be compromised in the process. The companies' final plans, however, still could be changed."

The New York Times (3/28, Bajaj, Sorkin, 1.19M) reports, "Though the companies have said that they are discussing a 'merger of equals,' experts say the deal will probably be treated as an acquisition of an American company by a foreign entity because Alcatel of France is one and a half times the size of Lucent and the combined company will probably be based in Paris."

Alcatel Board To Review Lucent Merger Talks. The AP (3/28) reports, "Alcatel SA's board will meet Thursday to review the company's merger talks with U.S. rival Lucent Technologies Inc., the French telecom equipment maker said Monday." The AP continues, "Alcatel board members will be briefed on the 'ongoing discussions' with Lucent at the meeting, company spokesman Mark Burnworth said. … 'There won't necessarily be any conclusions,' he said, declining further comment." The AP adds, "Alcatel and Lucent announced Friday that they were making a second attempt to negotiate a merger, after previous talks in 2001 ended without a deal. … Analysts say the deal would give Alcatel a foothold in the U.S. telecoms market and help the combined company cope with growing price pressures, as larger phone and Internet operators emerge from a new wave of consolidation and demand economies of scale on their equipment purchases."

Oil Sector Mergers Tripled In Value Last Year. The Financial Times (3/28, Hoyos) reports, "Mergers and acquisitions in the oil and gas industry tripled in value last year to $160bn - the highest level since the boom year of 1998 when Exxon and Mobil merged, BP took over Amoco, and Total bought PetroFina." The Times continues, "Deals by Chinese oil and natural gas companies, meanwhile, are expected to have grown sixfold to $6bn in 2005 as they became big international players, buying assets from Ecuador to Sudan and Syria, according to an authoritative industry study." The Times adds, "The report, released tomorrow, suggests oil industry executives and government leaders have been on a frantic global buying spree, under rising pressure to secure the oil and gas needed to fuel economic expansion. … The study by Harrison Lovegrove, the UK-based corporate advisers, and John S Herold, the US research firm, is widely regarded by the industry as the most comprehensive report on M&A activity in the sector. It is expected to show that last year oil companies were willing to pay 54 per cent more for acquisitions in North America as executives bet that high oil prices were here to stay. Acquisition prices in the rest of the world shot up 350 per cent. … Excluding the former Soviet Union, prices outside North America jumped 155 per cent. But the highest prices were attracted by Canada because of its political stability and favourable tax environment."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Senate Panel Considering Mandatory Emissions Controls. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Fialka, 2.11M) reports that the Senate Energy Committee is shifting the discussion from "whether" to "how" the federal government will impose stricter emissions rules. The panel "is hearing from industry and activists about how a mandatory plan to control carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases could work. Many big businesses that resisted efforts to fight global warming are sending blueprints and companies like Southern Co. -- an Atlanta utility opposed to new controls -- have filed detailed proposals. … The energy committee has received 160 plans from companies and organizations, and members will hold a 'roundtable' next Tuesday to sift through them. It will be Congress's first review of possible regulatory mechanisms of a system of mandatory controls."

Scientific Consensus On Global Warming Influencing Politicians. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 8, 2:30, Blakemore, 8.78M) reported, "Seattle Mayor Greg Nickels has convinced 219 mayors in 39 states to agree to cut greenhouse gas emissions and not wait for the White House or Congress to mandate it. There's gathering momentum on Capitol Hill among both parties." Sen. Richard Lugar: "I'm much more concerned, and for that matter, much more concerned now than I was two or three years ago. There is no doubt that global warming is a massive problem." Blakemore: "Many politicians changed their minds after scientists changed theirs." In "just the past two years, reports and pictures from around the world of massive ice sheets melting faster than thought possible, species struggling in the new heat, even the deep ocean currents, normally ice cold, getting warmer."

Bush Approach To Global Warming Satirized. In his Washington Post column (3/28, C3), Art Buchwald satirizes the Bush Administration's approach to global warming, saying, "Bush's handlers pointed out to the president that he had not said anything about global warming, and it was becoming a sore point with the public. One adviser says, 'Let's set up a news conference and advertise the fact that the president will talk about global warming. The president agrees that it is a good idea and asks, 'Where should we hold the conference?' Another adviser answers, 'What do you think about holding a fundraiser on the Arctic Ocean?' Someone else says, 'What about on the Titanic?' 'And we'll have a big banner saying, 'Mission Accomplished.'"

Bird Flu's Possible Impact On Humans Debated. In six-article feature package, the New York Times examines several of the key issues surrounding the avian flu and its potential impacts on humans. The New York Times (3/28, McNeil, 1.19M) reports Dr. David Nabarro, chief avian flu coordinator for the United Nations, "has become gun-shy about making predictions" on the possible spread of the virus, but "describes himself as 'quite scared,' especially since the disease has broken out of Asia and reached birds in Africa, Europe and India much faster than he expected it to." Like early AIDS, he warns that the disease has still "too many unanswered questions."

On the other side of the argument, the New York Times (3/28, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports Dr. Jeremy Farrar, who has spent time researching and treating patients with avian influenza in Vietnam, "thinks it is unlikely that the virus is poised to jump species, becoming readily transmissible to humans or among them. Nor does he believe the mantra that a horrific influenza pandemic is inevitable or long overdue." Dr. Farrar believes the world "should prepare," but finds the "doomsday" predictions "unhelpful, more fantasy than fact."

In a third article, the New York Times (3/28, Altman, 1.19M) examines the public health "dilemma" about issuing pandemic warnings to the general population. For example, "If officials do issue early warnings, and nothing happens, they stand to lose credibility among people who say that scientists promoted the worst possibilities to grab more grants and waste taxpayer dollars. If officials do not issue early or timely warnings, and a pandemic occurs, critics will say the public was not informed and protected in time."

Separately, the New York Times (3/28, Grady, 1.19M) reports that researchers at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta are "studying the transmission and virulence of bird flu … trying to understand how a virus can be wildly contagious among birds but almost impossible to spread in mammals -- and what type of mutation could change that." Other articles report on the flu's impact on the global bird population and lessons that may be learned from the 1918 flu epidemic.

FBI Says Woman Arrested For Her Father's Murder On Montana Reservation. The Havre (MT) Daily News (3/28, Corner) reports FBI Salt Lake City spokesman Patrick Kiernan said yesterday that Neil Gray "was shot to death in his residence in Hays on the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation," and "Gray's daughter, Ashley Lynn Gray…is being held in connection with the crime, Kiernan said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colorado Case Raises Questions About FBI Policy Of Not Recording Interviews. The Rocky Mountain News (3/27, Vaughan) reported, "While the majority of law enforcement agencies routinely record interviews with suspects during criminal investigations, one of the biggest and most powerful ones all but refuses to tape interrogations. … The FBI's long-standing practice is in the spotlight again in the case of a Denver firefighter facing federal charges of selling illegal machine guns." After Stan Ford "was arrested last November" and "sat down with an FBI agent and a Denver police officer. But exactly what he said is in dispute." The Mountain News adds, "Supervisory Special Agent Stephen Kodak of the FBI's national office in Washington, D.C., acknowledged that taping is rare." Kodak said that "the policy is based on the belief that taping, 'if instituted right away, when the witness does not wish to be tape recorded, can inhibit full and frank discussion.'" But Denver police Lt. Jon Priest "believes taping in major cases insures accuracy."

19 Indicted In San Diego In Meth-Smuggling Case. Washington Times/UPI (3/27) reports 19 people "were indicted in San Diego in an operation that allegedly used children to carry methamphetamines over the U.S.-Mexico border. The Drug Enforcement Administration, in a release Monday, said the group led by Jorge Arreola-Gomez smuggled large amounts of methamphetamines into the United States. … Authorities said they seized more than 140 pounds of methamphetamine, 20 pounds of pseudoephedrine used to make methamphetamines and a large amount of U.S. currency."

The AP (3/27) writes, "Jorge Arreola-Gomez was among 19 people named in the indictment unsealed Friday by the U.S. Attorney's Office alleging that the defendants used numerous couriers, many of them teenagers, to smuggle methamphetamine across the U.S.-Mexico border."

Former Baton Rouge Officer Accused Of Drug Trafficking Remains In Jail. Baton Rouge's Advocate (3/28) reports a former Baton Rouge police officer will remain in jail until trial. Daryl W. Davis "pleaded innocent Monday afternoon in Baton Rouge federal court. … A federal grand jury indicted Davis last week on one count of possession with intent to distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine. … U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents investigated Davis for more than a year before arresting him last week."

Woman's Testimony Examined In Arizona Murder, Drugs Case. The Tucson (AZ) Citizen (3/27) reports Lourdes Lopez's friends "didn't believe everything she said. Federal agents didn't, either. Now, jurors will weigh Lopez's credibility when they decide whether Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz ordered the death of Dr. Brian Stidham." The Tucson Citizen goes on to outline various conversations Lopez is said to have had with DEA agents, along with situations where she is accused of lying about her involvement with Schwartz.

California Medical Marijuana Case Focuses On Right-To-Life Issue. The AP (3/27, Kravets) reports a lawyer for a California woman whose doctor "says marijuana is the only medicine keeping her alive asked an appeals court Monday to prevent federal drug agents from ever arresting her. The case, focusing on whether the gravely ill have a right to marijuana to keep them alive when legal drugs fail, is likely to reach the U.S. Supreme Court soon. … The latest legal wrangling once again highlights the tension between the federal government, which declares marijuana an illegal controlled substance with no medical value, and the 11 states, including California and Rhode Island, allowing medical marijuana for patients with a doctor's recommendation."

In a sidebar, the AP (3/27) outlines medical marijuana Supreme Court cases.

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (3/27, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Medical marijuana and the right to fight for life -- that's the issue facing the federal appeals court in San Francisco. They are hearing arguments whether it should be legalized in very serious and special cases."

CNN (3/27, 11:00) later reported, "A federal court in San Francisco is hearing arguments in the latest effort to make medical marijuana legal. Judges are deciding whether marijuana can be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain. It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers. The Bush administration describes the lawsuit as baseless and says [there is] no fundamental right to use or distribute marijuana."

MSNBC (3/27, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "A federal appeals court is hearing arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue of medical marijuana. Today's case narrows the issue to [the] right-to-life theory that marijuana should be allowed if it's the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain. The Bush administration says the lawsuit is without merit.

Local TV Coverage. KGO-TV, San Francisco (3/27, 11:00 a.m.) reported, "An Oakland woman's legal battle against the federal government over medical marijuana takes another turn today. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Pasadena is hearing oral arguments today in Angel Raich's challenge. She says [she uses marijuana] to ease chronic pain caused by an inoperable brain tumor."

KNTV-TV, San Francisco (3/27, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "Oakland medical marijuana patient Angel Raich is renewing her fight to legally smoke pot. It comes less than a year after the US Supreme Court ruled against her, but this afternoon her lawyers will try to persuade a federal appeals court that keeping her from using medical marijuana burdens from living a life of freedom without pain."

Baltimore Detective Faces Federal Charges, Calls Heroin Exchange Policing Technique. The Baltimore Sun (3/27, Dolan) reports William A. King, one of two Baltimore narcotics detectives "accused of selling illegal drugs testified at his federal trial Monday that confiscated heroin he gave to a confidential informant was part of an off-the-books, but acceptable, policing technique designed to apprehend some of the city's top drug dealers."

British Government Accused Of Reneging Deal With Poppy Farmers. According to UPI (3/27, Harding), a new report by the Senlis Council think tank "claims the British government has failed to honor its pledge to compensate Afghani farmers for eradicating poppy crops, causing widespread anger in the volatile south of the country and leading to increased support for Taliban insurgents. … Based on interviews with farmers in the Helmand province…the group claims that U.K. counter-narcotics officers promised local farmers $350 for every fifth of a hectare of poppies they destroyed."

New Jersey Lawmakers Seek ATF Release Of Gun Data. The AP (3/28) reports, "Two federal legislators from New Jersey said Monday they will introduce proposals to once again make public data that is collected about firearms used in crimes." The AP continues, "Sen. Robert Menendez and Rep. Steve Rothman, both Democrats, said they would introduce legislation this week to undo restrictions on the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms' ability to share information on gun tracing with the public. … 'There is absolutely no good reason to hide gun crime data from the public,' Rothman said in a joint statement with Menendez. A member of the House Appropriations Committee, Rothman added that he would work to see the ATF use its resources to inform the public about gun trafficking and help prosecutors enforce the law." The AP adds, "While New Jersey has some of the strictest gun control laws in the nation, ATF data from 2001 -- the last time the bureau publicly released the information -- indicated that firearms used in Garden State crimes overwhelmingly came from out of state." The AP notes, "The author of the amendment that Menendez and Rothman are seeking to overturn said ATF already is permitted to release that information to the public. … Chuck Knapp, a spokesman for Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., told The Associated Press on Monday that the ATF is free to release aggregate information about guns used in crimes, such as percentage breakdown of where federal registries say guns were originally sold."

The AP (3/28) reports, "Federal investigators say 'strong similarities' exist between three bombs that blew up near some Colorado homes and another that exploded last month in Murfreesboro (Tennessee.)" The AP adds, "The bomb that exploded on February first in Murfreesboro was on the roof of the Serco project management office. … Federal officials say bombs placed near homes in Grand Junction went off near of Serco and Federal Aviation Administration workers."

No one was hurt in the July 8 fires." The AP notes, "Dibrell was arrested within days of the fires after an investigation led by the FBI, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and state bomb and arson investigators."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Panel Approves Immigration Reform Bill Containing Bush Proposals. The Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday reached consensus on an immigration reform bill that not only provides for a guest worker program but also gives undocumented immigrants a path towards citizenship. Media coverage describes the development as a win for President Bush. Typical of the coverage was a New York Times story (3/28, Swarns), which says, "With Republicans deeply divided, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted on Monday to legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants and ultimately to grant them citizenship, provided that they hold jobs, pass criminal background checks, learn English and pay fines and back taxes." The panel also "voted to create a vast temporary worker program that would allow roughly 400,000 foreigners to come to the United States to work each year and would put them on a path to citizenship as well."

USA Today (3/28, Jackson, Kiely, 2.31M) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee "gave a strong bipartisan endorsement Monday to…Bush's plans for overhauling immigration laws," while the Washington Post (3/28, A1, Weisman, 744K) headlines its story "Senators Back Guest Workers; Panel's Measure Sides With Bush," and says the Judiciary Committee "voted 12 to 6 to side with…Bush's general approach to an immigration issue that is dividing the country, fracturing the Republican Party and ripening into one of the biggest political debates of this election year." The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Gaouette, Reynolds, 958K) also says the committee vote "marked a victory for immigrant advocates and for…Bush, who has urged Congress for two years to create a temporary worker program but has argued against allowing those immigrants to gain citizenship." White House "reaction was upbeat. 'We are pleased to see the Senate moving forward on legislation,' spokesman Scott McClellan said in a statement." McClellan continued, "The President believes comprehensive reform is needed if we are going to have a rational, orderly and secure immigration system. … t is a difficult issue that will require compromise and tough choices, but the important thing at this point is that the process is moving forward."

The AP (3/28, Espo) reports that "at several critical points, committee Democrats showed unity while Republicans splintered. In general, GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike DeWine of Ohio, who is seeking re-election this fall, sided with Democrats." That "created a majority that allowed them to shape the bill to their liking." Sen. Dianne Feinstein "won approval for a five-year program to permit as many as 1.5 million agriculture workers into the country. … In addition, Kennedy prevailed on a proposal to allow an additional 400,000 green cards for future immigrants, regardless of the industry where they find jobs." Sen. Jon Kyl "and other conservatives said anything but a requirement for illegal immigrants to return home amounted to amnesty, and he said he had national opinion on his side."

Kyl and Sen. John Cornyn write in the Houston Chronicle (3/28, 581K) that any solution to the immigration problem must "restore respect for the law and provide sufficient resources to control the border. And because there can be no amnesty, reform must not reward illegal activity." They add, "Immigration reform ultimately must be about legal immigration — not creating a new process that only benefits illegal aliens. Immigrants must abide by the rule of law and receive equal treatment. We hope to build consensus around reform that will restore integrity to our immigration system and meet the needs of society, the economy and national security." The Washington Times (3/28, Hurt, 90K) headlines its story "Panel OKs 'Amnesty' Bill," and says the bill "would put millions of illegal aliens on a path to US citizenship, would let them stay here while applying and would not punish their unlawful entry as a felony, contrary to a House-passed bill."

Knight Ridder (3/28, Montgomery) reports that "under the guest-worker plan, foreigners must pay fees of up to $500 and show that they have US jobs waiting." They "would receive three-year visas, which could be renewed for another three years. After four years, they could apply for green cards." The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 3, 3:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported the Senate Judiciary bill "goes to the full Senate for debate but it's far from a done deal."

Media reports also stress the "division" in GOP ranks and its possible consequences as the midterm elections draw near. The Washington Post (3/28, A4, Fletcher, Murray, 744K) reports "both Republicans and Democrats risk alienating coveted supporters as they attempt to find the right balance between toughening enforcement and expanding legal opportunities for millions of low-skill foreign workers to take jobs in the United States." The debate "poses multiple challenges for both political parties, while offering no clearly expedient solution. Two huge electoral prizes, the Southwest and Florida, are potentially up for grabs, as are millions of Hispanic votes elsewhere." But also "in play are the votes of angry residents in border states and beyond who feel overwhelmed by the rising tide of illegal immigration."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Malveaux) reported that "what happens in the next 24 to 48 hours is really critically important because it could really impact what the Congress looks like in November, even, perhaps, who is going to sit in the White House 2008. Republican strategists who I've spoken to say that this really is a very important test, a test of leadership for the President and clout. His critics argue that he's lost both, specifically the Hispanic community."

Highlighting the GOP split on immigration, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said yesterday he was "disappointed" with the bill. He said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (3/27), "The Judiciary Committee did report out a final bill that I'm a little disappointed in because I think it will be characterized as amnesty, in the sense it adopted provisions that do not require people who have been here illegally to go back to their native countries before having a green card." CQ (3/28, Sandler, Crowley) reports that before a Senate debate on the committee bill begins, Frist "must agree to swap the Judiciary draft for his own legislation (S 2454), which focuses on border security and enforcement without a guest worker proposal. Late Monday, Frist said a cloture vote on the motion to proceed to his bill scheduled for Tuesday morning would be postponed until 2:15 p.m., allowing time for him to meet with Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., about the next step."

In addition, Rep. James Sensenbrenner was asked on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (3/27) about the Senate Judiciary Committee's approval of an immigration reform bill which includes a guest worker program. Sensenbrenner said, "It's appalling because the Senate Judiciary Committee is repeating the mistake that Congress made 20 years ago when it passed the Simpson- Mazzoli bill. The Simpson-Mazzoli bill granted amnesty to illegal aliens who were in the country at the time and also set up a system of employer sanctions to try to prevent employers from hiring any more illegal aliens. Well, the employer sanctions were never enforced. The amnesty was a big flop because people were afraid of losing their job. And instead of having two million illegal aliens, we have 10 to 12 million now."

The Hill (3/28, O'Connor) reports "GOP leaders in the House are hoping to get out in front on the issue by reminding voters that they have already passed a series of tough bills to crack down in illegal immigration." House Speaker Dennis Hastert "is expected to address immigration reform in a speech later this week before the National Urban League, and the Republican Conference office has distributed talking points lauding border-security legislation that has passed the House." Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said, "Our message in this debate is that the House passed a border-security bill with the understanding that America is a nation of immigrants, a nation at war and a nation of laws. … This is a complex issue, and the House looks forward to working with the Senate and the administration as the process moves forward."

Bush Urges Civility. Also yesterday, the President again weighed in on the immigration debate, calling for civility. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 4, 1:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported Bush is "on a potential collision course with some conservatives over the immigration bill." Bush "issued a clear warning to Capitol Hill at a swearing in ceremony for some of America's newest citizens." Bush: "No one should pretend that immigrants are threats to American identity." Axelrod: "For the second time in two months, the President finds himself at odds with parts of his base. Last month, there was the ports deal, this time, there is no third party to offer an easier way out should Congress ultimately present the President with an immigration bill that lacks a guest worker program." CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Blitzer) said the President is trying "to put a kinder face." However, added CNN, "let's face it: It's a bare knuckles political brawl splitting the Republican party."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Kronholz, 2.11M) reports Bush "made his strongest appeal yet for a law that would provide employers with enough immigrant workers to keep the economy humming. … Even with the president's backing, though, immigration overhaul faces an uphill fight this week when it reaches the Senate floor." The Financial Times (3/28, Daniel, Alden) says Bush "issued a strong defence of the role of immigrants in American history as he warned legislators not to 'play on people's fears or try to pit neighbours against each other' in the intensifying debate about immigration reform." Said Bush, "We have a chance to move beyond tired choices and the harsh attitudes of the past." ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 2, 2:15, Raddatz, 8.78M) said Bush "was making a point today of pushing his own proposals," even as he "urged critics to keep the debate civil and dignified." The President wants "to accommodate illegal workers already in the country, while others, including many in the President's own party, want to prosecute the workers as felons."

The Washington Times (3/28, Dinan, 90K) says Bush "made a strong statement against amnesty, telling 30 new citizens at DAR Constitution Hall that it would be unfair to them to let illegal aliens jump the line for citizenship." NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 2, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) also reported Bush "said he opposes amnesty for the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already here, but some senators today said there should be a way for those with roots in the community to earn the right to stay." Sen. Dianne Fienstein, California: "They pay taxes, their children are Americans, they go to schools, they're good citizens, and they're needed."

Pro-Immigrant Protests Continue In Several Cities. NBC Nightly News (3/27, story 2, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The sheer number of protesters turning out for rallies in support of immigrants has shocked even the organizers. Thousands of people marched and rallied in Detroit today, just one of several cities that have drawn huge numbers over the past two weeks."

The New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) reports the "wave of angry protests" over the proposals under scrutiny on Capitol Hill continued in several US cities. In Los Angeles, about 22,000 "mostly Hispanic" students walked out of school, as did students in several Los Angeles suburbs. In San Francisco, about 1,000 demonstrators marched on the offices of Senate Judiciary Democrat Dianne Feinstein. In Detroit, "Hispanic business owners closed their shops in protest" and about 4,000 people appeared at a rally. A smaller rally took place in Boston. The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Cho, Gorman, 958K) says the Southern California school walkouts "are believed to eclipse in size the demonstrations that occurred during the anti-Proposition 187 campaign in 1994 and even a famous student walkout for Chicano rights in 1968."

At the US Capitol, "hundreds of immigration advocates" demonstrated, the Washington Times (3/28, Summers, 90K) reports, with crowd estimates ranging "from U.S. Capitol Park Police officers' 1,000 to organizers' 3,000." In its Metro section, the Washington Post (3/28, B8, Shapira, 744K) reports that eight middle schoolers walked out of a Northern Virginia school, while "about 250" high school students held demonstrations. As the Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Oliver, 61K) writes, "The strength of 'Latino power' has been evident in recent days at protests in many US cities."

The Washington Times (3/28, Taylor, 90K) writes that "the Roman Catholic Church, dozens of grass-roots coalitions and Spanish-language radio disc jockeys have helped fuel" the protests. Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights organizer Marissa Graciosa "described the effort as 'the beginning of an immigration civil rights movement.'" The Washington Post (3/28, A1, Pomfret, Geis, 744K) also notes the talk of "the dawning of a new civil rights movement," with activists "drawing parallels with the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Chicano labor activist Cesar Chavez." The Post says the "grass-roots movement of immigrant churchgoers, union members, businessmen, media personalities and laborers" hopes to "use the power of their numbers to move the debate." The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Watanabe, Beccera, 958K) profiles several of the "Spanish-language radio personalities" who joined together to help turn a march "initially expected to draw fewer than 20,000" into "a massive march that police estimated at 500,000 and said was one of the largest demonstrations in Los Angeles' history."

Polls Show Broad Concern About Illegal Immigration. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 3, 3:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported "polls show 75% of Americans say the US is not doing enough to keep illegal immigrants from entering the country -- and this is key: A majority of Americans say they're more likely to vote for a candidate who favors tighter controls on illegal immigration." The Washington Times (3/28, Harper, 90K) surveys several recent polls on immigration, concluding "most Americans are concerned about the financial impact of illegal immigration and fret over porous borders, lax enforcement and easygoing policies that could reward or encourage lawbreakers." A Quinnipiac poll found 88% of registered voters, including 83% of "children or grandchildren of immigrants," think illegal immigration is a "serious problem." Meanwhile, a Gallup poll of investors found that while 84% "said illegals mostly took jobs Americans didn't want," 62% still said they "hurt the national investment climate."

Roll Call (3/28, Winston) also samples the surveys under the headline "Check The Polls, Not The Protests, On Immigration." Roll Call writes that "the views of most of the people marching in the streets of L.A. and other cities last weekend bear little or no resemblance to the majority of public opinion in this country" on the subject. For example, a January Time poll found 63% think illegal immigration is "an extremely or very serious problem," and an October 2005 New Models poll found 58% think "military troops should be used for border security." A Fox News poll, also from last October, found a slim majority in support of a "2,000-mile security fence along the U.S.-Mexico border."

Undocumented Immigrants Seen As Key Part Of US Economy. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 5, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Illegal immigrants fill millions of unskilled, low-wage jobs in this country and have a vital role in our economy," and "now make up nearly five percent of the American workforce, according to a recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center. And in some industries, the numbers show, they've become a critical part of the labor pool."

USA Today (3/28, Kiely, 2.31M) reports on the guest worker debate on its front page, profiling a nursery company in a Cleveland suburb where "of the 350 employees hired to work the March through December busy season, 271 are Mexican nationals with visas from a 'guest worker' program." USA Today says their presence in an Ohio town "illustrates how much foreign migrant labor means to the economy" and underscores why the upcoming Senate debate "is so explosive."

Activists Try To Shame Employers Who Hire Undocumented Workers. ABC World News Tonight (3/27, story 3, 2:00, Vargas, 8.78M) reported on the efforts of activists in Lake Forest, California, who "trying to catch employers in the act of picking up illegal immigrants. They want to shame them into stopping, by posting photographs on their website, WeHireAliens.com." The group "has posted the names of 843 companies from coast-to-coast, ranging from major corporations."

Federal Troops Help CBP Increase Apprehensions Of Illegal Border Crossers. The Washington Times (3/28, Seper, 90K) writes that a report to the Senate Armed Services Committee showed a net 60% increase in apprehensions of illegal US-Mexico border-crossers by US Customs and Border Protection last October after federal troops were deployed to assist. The "Texas-based Stryker-armored reconnaissance, surveillance and target acquisition squadron helped CBP agents capture 2,000 illegal border crossers in New Mexico and Arizona."

More Commentary. In a Wall Street Journal (3/28, A20, 2.11M) op-ed, Council on Foreign Relations senior fellow and Columbia economist Jagdish Bhagwati writes, "The profusion of proposals by politicians of left and right, the taking to the streets" by opponents of "the draconian House bill, and the agonized appeal by President Bush (a real mensch who has put his politics where his principles are, and where ours should be) that 'America is a nation of immigrants' (and 'also a nation of laws'), all underline the fact that there is now a compelling sense of public urgency about the immigration debate. … The proper objectives of American immigration reform…are twofold: to 'gain control of the border' (i.e., to have the inflow of migrants determined exclusively by legal admissions) and to treat immigrants humanely."

In a Washington Times (3/28, 90K) op-ed, American Research Foundation President Phil Kent writes, "More Americans must understand that Mexico's government, far from being a friend, is actively working to subvert our country's laws and political institutions. Not since the heyday of expansionist Soviet communism has there been such an organized effort to undermine our nation. If our borders are not controlled and immigration law enforced, will we truly be a 'United States' in another 10 years or a completely balkanized, multicultural society with English downgraded as the common tongue?"

In his Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "There are an estimated 12 million immigrants in the United States illegally. That many people don't just fade into the woodwork. The fact is, we see undocumented immigrants every day. … You probably don't know where they live. You probably don't know their children's names or where they go to school. You probably don't know what it was like for them to buy a car or even get a driver's license. You probably don't know where they get medical care. If you did know these things about individual immigrants…I think you would find the debate in Congress almost grotesque."

TAX:

Former KPMG Tax Partner Pleads Guilty. The New York Times (3/28, Browning, Moynihan) reports, "The government's criminal case against 17 former KPMG employees over sales of questionable tax shelters took an unexpected turn yesterday when one of them, David Rivkin, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and tax evasion." The Times continues, "Mr. Rivkin, who was a KPMG partner in San Diego, agreed to cooperate with the government as part of his plea. His cooperation may help federal prosecutors in Manhattan build a case against the remaining defendants as well as help prosecutors in their widening inquiry into other accounting firms, banks, law firms and others that worked with KPMG to sell bogus tax shelters, lawyers not involved in the case said. … 'Obviously, this is a person who was in a position to know and understand the inner workings of everything, so this is good news for the prosecution,' said William B. Mateja, a tax lawyer and former Justice Department lawyer who has prosecuted fraud cases."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Davies, Reilly) reports, "Mr. Rivkin is one of 17 former executives at the giant accounting firm to be charged in connection with the sale of the questionable products. The other two defendants are an outside lawyer and investment adviser who helped KPMG structure and sell the products. … Mr. Rivkin's plea deal is expected to increase pressure on the other 18 defendants scheduled to go to trial in the fall in what is seen as one of the most complex and wide-ranging tax cases ever brought by federal prosecutors. New York-based KPMG last year reached its own deal with prosecutors, agreeing to pay $456 million and admit criminal wrongdoing as part of a deferred-prosecution pact. The pact allowed the firm to avoid a criminal indictment."

The AP (3/28, Neumeister) reports, "Rivkin admitted that he conspired with others between January 1999 and May 2004 to prepare and execute false documents so that clients could file false tax returns. … He also admitted that he took steps to conceal the existence of fraudulent tax shelters from the Internal Revenue Service and avoided registering the shelters with the IRS by claiming attorney-client privileges. … In pleading guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion, Rivkin signed an agreement to cooperate with prosecutors, who could then ask the judge to consider giving Rivkin a more lenient sentence rather than the years he might face in prison. Sentencing was set for Feb. 9, 2007."

Court Orders New Hampshire Tax Preparer To Turn Over Documents To IRS. The AP (3/28) reports, "A tax preparer has run into legal trouble with the IRS. … The federal court in Concord (NH) has ordered Mark Loll of Peterborough (NH), who runs a company called Tax-Tactics, to turn over his customer list and copies of tax returns whenever the IRS asks. Federal law requires tax preparers to do both." The AP continues, "The order stems from a December complaint alleging that Loll failed to comply with an IRS request to provide copies of the returns or a list with the customers' identifying information. … The court also ordered Loll to stop 'asserting frivolous unrealistic positions on tax returns he prepares.' … The Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 federal tax return preparers and promoters since 2001."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Holding Off-The-Record Briefings With Media Groups. The New York Times (3/28, Seelye, 1.19M) reports President Bush has "been holding informal off-the-record sessions with major news organizations over the last several days. Starting Thursday, he began meeting with groups of about a half-dozen reporters from newspapers, television, news agencies and magazines." One reporter who attended a briefing said "they have discussed a variety of issues including the war in Iraq." The New York Times, "which was invited to attend a session today, has declined to participate."

The Washington Post (3/28, A14, Babington, 744K) reports Bush "has been waging a private campaign that has included off-the-record sessions with White House reporters." One gathering, "which took place Thursday in the White House residence, was an unusual gesture by Bush, who has agreed to comparatively few lengthy exchanges with reporters during his five years in office." Last week's session "involved reporters from several prominent broadcast and print outlets, including ABC News and The Washington Post."

AARP Intensifying Promotion Of Medicare Prescription Drug Program. Roll Call (3/28, Ben Pershing) reports with the "deadline fast approaching for seniors to sign up for the Medicare prescription drug benefit, the on-again, off-again partnership between Congressional Republicans and AARP to promote the program appears to be back on." The "35-million-member seniors group announced last week that it was 'launching an expansive advertising campaign to help educate Americans about the benefits of the program and how to enroll, especially for those with limited incomes.'" AARP spokesman Steve Hahn "said Monday the group was prepared to spend "several million dollars" on print and radio ads in 44 cities in advance of the May 15 deadline for seniors to enroll in the drug program without a penalty. That's music to the ears of GOP lawmakers, who until now have expressed disappointment at AARP's relatively modest efforts to promote the GOP-backed plan after prominently endorsing it prior to passage."

Administration To Drop Double-Enrollees From One Plan. The New York Times (3/28, Pear, 1.19M) reports the Bush Administration "notified hundreds of thousands of Medicare beneficiaries on Monday that they were listed on the rolls of two prescription drug plans and would soon be dropped from one. They will retain coverage under the other plan." The notices "are supposed to clear up confusion resulting from errors and discrepancies in the enrollment records of Medicare's new prescription drug program. But some state officials and advocates for older Americans said the federal effort could create new confusion." Christina Pearson, "a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, estimated that 500,000 people could receive notices as part of the 'enrollment reconciliation process.'"

Gingrey Says Democratic Criticism Of Drug Plan Costs Seniors Money. In an op-ed in The Hill (3/28), Rep. Phil Gingrey says, "Partisan politics is keeping millions of senior citizens from learning about and enrolling in a new program that is saving seniors an average of $1,100 a year on prescription-drug costs." Marketplace competition for the prescription drug benefit "is working. Premiums are a third lower than expected, and seniors are saving up to 50 percent off their monthly medication costs. To top it off, the Congressional Budget Office recently announced the program would cost $5 billion less than projected." Seniors "have less than two months left to enroll in a plan without paying a higher premium penalty. And yet there are Democrats in this Congress who are playing politics with our seniors' health by holding town hall meetings to encourage seniors not to enroll."

Nicholson Praises VA Healthcare System As Model. The Washington Post (3/28, A21, Lee, 744K) reports that in his "state of the VA" speech yesterday, Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson noted that when "Hurricane Katrina forced the relocation from New Orleans to Houston of hundreds of Veterans Affairs hospital patients, electronic medical records enabled doctors and nurses to treat the sick and injured without skipping a beat." Nicholson "cited electronic health records as one reason the VA health-care system is 'a model for our nation' and said his department, with 234,000 employees, is 'truly one of America's good-news stories.'"

House Centrists Seek More Funding For Social Programs. The Hill (3/28, Young) reports centrist Republicans in the House "hope to replicate the recent success of their Senate counterparts by boosting spending on health, welfare and education programs this year." Rep. Mike Castle "and other centrists plan to hold a press briefing today in the Capitol basement to seek bigger budgets for programs such as the National Institutes of Health, student loans, heating assistance and job training."

Conaway Offers Plan To Cut Federal Spending. In a Roll Call op-ed (3/28), Rep. Mike Conaway, who is also a CPA, offers his suggestions to reining in the Federal budget deficit, such as "no new federal programs," "line-item veto reform," "reduction in mandatory spending growth," and making President Bush's "tax cuts permanent." These suggestions, "if applied, will significantly impact how the federal government manages our money. Eliminating ineffective government programs, reducing growth of massive government entitlements and passing procedural measures for real budget reform do not sound particularly exciting, but such actions are necessary."

Bush Digs Into The Bureaucracy To Improve Government Services. The White House Bulletin/US News (3/27) reported President Bush "and his inner circle are well aware that another management disaster such as the failed federal response to Hurricane Katrina could tarnish many Republican candidates for Congress in this fall's mid-term elections. So Bush and White House Chief of Staff Andy Card have put in place a number of new systems to prevent such foulups in the future." Bush has "always asked his staff lots of questions to make sure he fully understands what's going on, and he has stepped up that effort." Chief of Staff Card said, "He's not afraid to stick a cattle prod in the system and motivate faster action consistent with his expectations." Card says Bush is "often frustrated by the pace of the bureaucracy." Card said, "He doesn't want us to defend the government. He wants us to produce results." Card says "he and Bush will be more vigilant than ever when hurricane season starts later this year. In addition, to prevent any more firestorms like the furor over the administration's proposal to let a Dubai-owned company operate six US seaports, Card requires his staff to update him regularly on what other foreign ownership deals are in the pipeline, so he can evaluate them and not allow the President to be blind-sided again."

White House Withdraws Sanborn Nomination. In what the Washington Times/UPI (3/28, Waterman) calls "continuing fallout from the collapse" of the DP World deal, the Bush Administration yesterday withdrew the nomination of David Sanborn, one of the company's executives to run the US Maritime Administration. White House spokeswoman Erin Healy "said the withdrawal was at Mr. Sanborn's request, which was made in a letter to the president yesterday." Healy "would not comment on whether the move was connected with the sudden end of DP World's proposed takeover of operations at terminals in six U.S. ports, the result of the Arab company's takeover of Britain's Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co."

Snowe Concerned SBA Has Slowed Hurricane Loan Process. The AP (3/28, Jordan) reports Sen. Olympia Snowe said in a March 23 letter to Small Business Administrator Hector Barreto that the departure of 682 disaster assistance employees from the agency troubled her "at a time when efficiency and production are of such high importance." Meanwhile, "Calling the loan application process 'a high priority,' SBA spokeswoman Anne Marie Frawley said the agency is looking to local banks and private firms to help speed recovery aid to hurricane victims." Though the agency "has approved $6.7 billion in disaster loans to Gulf Coast businesses, homeowners and renters whose properties were damaged by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita," Snowe spokesman Chris Chichester said "only $590 million has been distributed thus far to applicants."

Federal Judge Refuses To Delay New Orleans Mayoral Election. A hearing was held yesterday as to whether New Orleans' mayoral election should be held April 22, after the NAACP and other civil rights groups had argued that displaced voters having to pay for transportation to the city would be the "modern equivalent of a poll tax." The AP (3/28) reports US District Judge Ivan Lemelle "on Monday refused to delay" the election, "telling both sides to solve any problems that might hinder displaced residents' ability to vote." He "said voting will help the city rebuild, but he warned that its residents have already lost trust in institutions."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/27, Blitzer) reported, "Civil rights groups had raised concerns that residents displaced by the storm would not be able to cast ballots. The judge ordered both sides in the case to identify and solve any problems that might hinder voter turnout."

GOP Desire For Change Shifting From White House To Rumsfeld. The White House Bulletin/US News (3/27) reported there has been "a shift in some of the behind-the-scenes griping over recent missteps in the Administration, especially over the war in Iraq. Some senior Republicans are beginning to think that firing people on the White House staff won't make much difference in improving management and outreach, and may actually make matters worse by creating turmoil in the West Wing at a very sensitive time." White House insiders also "don't want to deprive President Bush of valued confidants, whose loyalty and company he prizes. What makes more sense, they say, is to have Bush force Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld out of his job. That would encourage the Pentagon brass to reconsider the current policies in Iraq and elsewhere, and might encourage fresh thinking."

NHTSA To Release New Fuel Economy Rules For Trucks. The National Highway Traffic Administration this week is expected to announce new fuel economy rules for trucks. USA Today (3/28, O'Donnell, 2.31M) reports, "The rules could pressure automakers to improve the mileage of their heftiest vehicles, often known as 'three-quarter-ton' or 'one-ton' trucks. And they could create, for automakers, a bewildering array of fuel-economy standards that could vary almost from model to model."

Report Provides Guidance For Switching To Pay-For-Performance Systems. The Washington Post (3/28, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Creating fair pay-for-performance systems in the government will require effective ways of evaluating job performance and well-trained supervisors, according to a report from the Merit Systems Protection Board. … The report from the board, a quasi-judicial agency that hears appeals from employees facing major disciplinary action and that helps oversee the civil service, comes at a timely moment for the federal workforce. At least half of the workforce seems likely to shift into new pay systems in the next few years." The Post adds, "The MSPB report, which goes to the White House and Congress, provides a road map for federal employees and supervisors who are uncertain about the ingredients that go into performance-based pay systems. The 43-page report (at http://www.mspb.gov in the 'studies' section) offers a balanced view of what's at stake when adopting new compensation strategies."

Frist Says Deal Close On Lobbying Reform Legislation. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday began negotiations with Senate Democrats on legislation to curb the influence of lobbyists. The Washington Times (3/28, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that Frist told reporters that he is working with Democrats "to work out a compromise and he thinks the Senate is 'very close' to completing the bill."

Roll Call (3/28, Newmyer) reports that "leading lawmakers" say "they hope to wrap up work" on a bill by the end of the day." Roll Cal adds, "The path back to lobbying reform was cleared when Senate leadership reached an agreement with Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) to set aside his proposal for an amendment on foreign ownership of ports. … Instead, Senators will vote today on an amendment offered by Sens. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) that would ban the long-held Senate practice of allowing Members to hamstring legislation with anonymous holds." After that, the Senate "could move to a prearranged package of amendments, which have yet to be determined, or else Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) could choose to limit debate by calling for cloture on the measure."

More Controversial Issues Loom. The Washington Post (3/28, A21, Babington, 744K) reports that as if "the debates over immigration and the Iraq war weren't contentious enough, Congress is about to embark on some really hot-button issues: flag burning, same-sex marriage and censuring the president." The Senate Judiciary Committee "has scheduled a Friday hearing on Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing warrantless surveillance of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails." Meanwhile, "interest groups on the left and right are preparing for showdowns over flag desecration and same-sex marriage in June, when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has scheduled floor votes on the always-controversial issues."

Democrats Are More Concerned About Limits On 527 Groups. The Washington Post (3/28, A3, Edsall, 744K) reports that Democrats "are a lot more worried about proposals to impose sharp limits on spending by tax-exempt, non-party political groups." According to the Post, 527 groups "are viewed by the party establishment as disruptive, encouraging conservative primary challenges to moderate incumbents as much as contributing to the defeat of Democrats. Democrats, by contrast, tend to view the independent groups with gratitude rather than resentment -- because they are doing essential political work that is not being done by others." The parties "disparate approaches to building election treasures and machinery underpin Democratic opposition to and Republican support for enactment of tough, new restrictions on the independent 527 committees."

Nationals Fear Fallout From Abramoff Scandal. A front page in the Washington Post (3/28, A1, Heath, 744K) reports that while the return of a professional baseball team to Washington "provided a new venue for lobbyists to entertain members of Congress and their staff at RFK Stadium, just 20 blocks east of the Capitol," Nationals executives "are concerned that a significant piece of their business could be affected in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff bribery and corruption scandal, which is leading many lobbyists and elected officials to reconsider how and where they do business. … Nationals President Tony Tavares said the team already has had some 'push back' from lobbyists who were ticket holders a year ago, and it has led to the cancellation of ticket plans for about 100 prime seats at RFK."

Author Urges Congress To Rein In Lobbyists. In the Financial Times (3/28) author Michael Massing writes about the negative influence of corporate lobbying, saying that "it often takes years for the short-sightedness of corporate lobbying to become apparent. In the short term, the gains wrung through lobbyists and campaign contributions might seem impressive. Over time, though, lobbying, in foiling measures designed to promote the public good, can undermine the fortunes of the very industries doing the lobbying. It is yet another reason Congress should hold firm in its effort to rein in Washington's influence peddlers."

Democrats To Unveil National Security Platform. Roll Call (3/28, Billings) reports Democratic leaders will try to "convince the electorate of their military muscle," unveiling a national security platform in which they "will vow to eliminate Osama bin Laden and destroy al-Qaida." Party leaders "will focus on five major policy areas for a safer America, both within its borders and beyond. Perhaps most ambitious among the party's objectives are calls to defeat terrorists and eradicate weapons of mass destruction." Congressional Democrats "will formally outline their national security plan Wednesday when they join other party leaders and law enforcement officials in a major event at Union Station."

Scalia's "Obscene Gesture" To Reporter Sparks Questions. Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia reportedly used a hand gesture in response to a reporter's question on Sunday. The AP (3/28) reports, "The Boston Herald reported Monday that the justice made 'an obscene gesture under his chin' — which prompted some online reports that Scalia had used his middle finger. Untrue. … The sign he used in Boston is frequently used by Italians to express displeasure with someone — from mild to deep irritation. It is done by cupping the hand under the chin and flicking the fingers like a backward wave."

22nd Amendment Criticized For Causing Lame Duck Presidencies. In his Boston Globe column (3/28), Peter Canellos says there were "no quacking noises at the president's press conference last week. But" President Bush "acknowledged that the political capital he won in 2004 is dwindling. He blamed the Iraq war, but even in the best of circumstances, presidents in their second terms become lame ducks very quickly." The "reason is the 22d Amendment to the Constitution, mandating that presidents can be elected only twice." That's "partly why a bipartisan group of legislators have been filing a bill every two years to rescind the 22d Amendment, on the grounds that it deprives the country of its proper choice of leaders."

Gasoline Prices Level Off After Steep Increase Last Week. Gasoline prices have leveled off after increasing nearly 14 cents a gallon last week. USA Today (3/28, Healey, 2.31M) reports that the price plateau caps "a four-week run-up at the pump" but the relief "could be short-lived. Prices often zoom as warm weather spurs more driving trips, which drain supplies. Refiners also are required by law to shift to clean-air gasoline blends for spring and summer, and those cost more to make." According to USA Today, the

"nationwide average for a gallon of regular is $2.498, the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported Monday."

The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 10, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that the price is "up a quarter from a month ago and more than 35 cents from a year ago."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Levine, Davis, 2.11M) reports, "Analysts attribute the quick price moves to a shift that begins next month in gasoline blends, requiring chemicals to be added for environmental and other reasons. Because of the energy bill passed last year by lawmakers, most U.S. refiners will halt the use of methyl tertiary butyl ether as a gasoline additive and substitute ethanol."

WSJournal Blames Congress For Rising Gasoline Prices. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) says gas prices are rising because "Congress's energy policy mistakes are finally catching up with it." The Journal adds that Congress "created the conditions for this mess last summer with its latest energy bill," which "contained a sop to Midwest corn farmers in the form of a huge new ethanol mandate." Congress also "refused to include liability protection for producers of MTBE, a rival oxygen fuel-additive that has become a tort lawyer target. So MTBE makers are pulling out, ethanol makers can't make up the difference quickly enough, and gas supplies are getting squeezed. … If Republicans on Capitol Hill wonder why their approval ratings stay low as gasoline prices rise this spring and summer, we suggest they look in the mirror."

NYTimes Backs Markey Measure On Oil Royalty Relief. An editorial in the New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) notes that "oil companies stand to gain a minimum of $7 billion and as much as $28 billion over the next five years under an obscure provision in last year's giant energy bill that allows companies to avoid paying royalties on oil and gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico. … Edward Markey, a Democratic member of the House from Massachusetts, has proposed a bill that would keep any new contracts from granting relief when oil and gas prices were high, and would instruct the interior secretary to try to renegotiate existing contracts. That is a fair and overdue remedy."

Stock Markets Have Mixed Finish. Stocks finished with mixed results Monday. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) reported on its web site that the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 29.86 points to 11250.11. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 1.34 to 1301.61 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained by 2.76 to 2315.58. USA Today/AP (3/28, Powell) attributes the mixed results to investors "awaited the results today of the first Federal Reserve rate-setting meeting led by new Chairman Ben Bernanke."

Bernanke Seeks To Make Fed Decisionmaking More Transparent. New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke wants to bring more transparency to the Fed and is exploring ways to publicly communicate bank officials' views on the economy, the inflationary risks and the likely path of interest rates. The Washington Post (3/28, D1, Henderson, 744K) reports that "the options Bernanke and his colleagues have floated include several practices employed by central banks in other countries. They include: Writing lengthier statements after policymaking meetings to explain their actions. … Providing more descriptive minutes of their meetings. The minutes now are highly stylized summaries, former Fed officials say. Publishing more frequent economic forecasts by Fed policymakers, who now issue them twice a year. Holding news conferences after Fed meetings. Setting a long-term, numerical target for inflation."

Candidates Welcoming Bush, Cheney For Fundraisers, But Not Photo-Ops. The Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Feldmann, 61K) reports that as the 2006 congressional campaigns "get into gear, there are two George W. Bushes traveling the country. One, the fundraiser, is welcome anywhere, anytime. Since January 2005, the president has set a record pace in raising cash for Republican campaign committees and individual candidates - $88 million at 26 events." The other, "the campaigner, appears radioactive, at least to candidates in tough races." Vice President Cheney, "whose job approval ratings are even lower than Bush's, is in the same boat: He's a money magnet at Republican fundraisers, but if it's for a candidate in a tight race, forget about the photo op." So far this cycle, Cheney "has appeared at 48 events and raised $16 million."

Bush Praises Burns At Fundraiser. The AP (3/28, Kalonick) reports that President Bush "on Monday urged Montanans to vote for Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, who is locked in a tight race for re-election this year. 'I'm proud to stand by this man,' Bush told a Washington audience of about 200 lobbyists, members of Congress and other supporters." Bush, in his speech, "urged support for the war in Iraq and energy independence. 'We're laying the foundation of peace, and it's important to have members of the United States Senate who can look beyond the short term, who have got a strategic view of the world in which we live,' Bush said. 'And Conrad Burns has that view.'" While some GOP candidates seeking reelection "have distanced themselves from Bush," Burns "said he is proud to stand next to the president. 'It always helps to have the president in your corner,'" Burns said.

Bush Remains Optimistic. The White House Bulletin/US News (3/27) reported senior White House officials say President Bush "is still optimistic that his policies will succeed in Iraq and at home, and confident that the Republicans will retain control of Congress in this fall's mid-term elections. The Democrats are too fractured over major issues to present a unified vision, and they are wrong on the merits of issues such as making Bush's tax cuts permanent (which many Democrats oppose) and imposing more restrictions on the warrantless surveillance of suspected terrorists (which many Democrats favor), Bush says." Bush "remains as decisive as ever -- a man who rarely second-guesses himself -- which his admirers praise as evidence of his strong leadership and his detractors condemn as evidence of stubbornness and swagger. Bush tells aides that Americans want their president to be decisive because it persuades the country that he knows what he's doing. Besides, Bush says, decisiveness is a morale builder for his staff because it breeds confidence in everyone around him."

Number Of Millionaire Households in US Grew Last Year. A report to be released today from the British market research firm TNS Financial Services says the number of US households with a net worth of $1 million or m ore grew to 8.9 million last year. The New York Times (3/28, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "The number of millionaire families rose to 7.1 million in 1999, said Jeanette Luhr, a TNS manager who directed the survey, and then, after the Internet bubble burst, dropped steadily to 5.5 million by 2002. The ranks of millionaire households rose to 6.2 million in 2003 and 8.2 million in 2004, she said."

Religious Conservatives Unveil "Value Voters" Contract. The Washington Times (3/28, Duin, 90K) reports a "summit of evangelical Christians and conservative Catholic and Jewish activists yesterday produced a 'Values Voters' Contract with Congress,' an outline of what the religiously minded expect their elected representatives to bring about in the near future." Modeled after "the Republican Party's 1994 'Contract with America,' the 'Values Voters' Contract' stipulated 10 aims, ranging from legislation to keep the words 'under God' in the Pledge of Allegiance to laws guaranteeing greater religious freedoms in the workplace, prohibiting human cloning and embryo research, and guaranteeing a "right to life" to all children before birth."

Bloomberg (3/28) reports that faith and family values issues "are dividing the Republican Party." Bloomberg reports, "Economic conservatives and secular Republicans complain their message is being drowned out by Christian conservatives preoccupied with banning abortion and gay marriage and limiting stem-cell research. On the other side, 'values' advocates say they have provided the party with crucial support, particularly in 2004, when they mobilized religious conservatives to go to the polls to help re-elect President George W. Bush. Such concerns are turning long-simmering Republican tensions over the role of religious conservatives into an election-year split in a party already strained by differences on the Iraq war, immigration and government spending."

Leaders Of Both Parties Getting Low Job-Approval Ratings. The Washington Times (3/28, Lambro, 90K) reports President Bush "and the Republican Congress are not the only ones getting poor job-approval grades from voters. A large number of governors and state legislatures in both parties are receiving low scores, too." While the Washington press corps "has focused on Mr. Bush's declining approval rating, down to 36 percent in the latest Gallup poll, and on Congress, whose approval rating has sunk to 27 percent, state and local government officials are not faring much better." Independent pollsters "say the national electorate is in a sour mood and is critical of the political establishment across the board, regardless of party."

Romney-McCain Rivalry Developing. A rivalry has developed between 2008 presidential rivals Sen. John McCain and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, the AP (3/28, Johnson) reports. Romney has held fundraisers in McCain's home state of Arizona and he has repeatedly "questioned the effectiveness of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, arguing it has had 'unintended consequences' and 'driven money into secret corners.'" Meanwhile, McCain aides, "speaking privately like Romney's to avoid incurring the boss' wrath, labels Romney a johnny-come-lately to conservative Republican and national security causes. They also question whether a dashing candidate dubbed 'Matinee Mitt' has the mettle to endure a rough nominating battle."

Dionne Says McCain At Risk Of Losing Maverick Appeal. In his Washington Post column (3/28, A23), E.J. Dionne says Sen. John McCain "the Maverick fought for campaign finance reform, took global warming seriously, opposed Bush's tax cuts and spoke out against torture. Those positions bred mistrust in McCain's own party, even though he was always a staunch supporter of overthrowing Saddam Hussein, a firm opponent of pork-barrel spending, an abortion foe and an advocate of private accounts carved out of Social Security." McCain's problem "is that political parties rarely nominate mavericks, and McCain has decided the only way he'll ever be president is as the Republican nominee. So today he cares very much about what hurts him or helps him in his own party." The "most flagrant sign of this was his February vote to continue Bush's dividend and capital gains tax cuts, which he once eloquently opposed." But McCain's "central appeal, even to people who disagree with him, has always been his willingness to do the nonpolitical thing -- for example, to defend Kerry that day in 2004 simply because he thought the attacks on Kerry were wrong."

Disney Hires Former McCain Aide As Lobbyist. The Hill (3/28, Schor) reports the Walt Disney Co. "had big shoes to fill when lobbyist Mitch Rose left last month to open his own shop, and Disney has turned to Bill Bailey, former communications adviser to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), as its lobbying arm's new No. 2." It is Bailey's "years working side by side with McCain, former Commerce Committee chairman and 2008 presidential contender, that may make him most valuable to Disney as it joins the fray over rewriting the Telecommunications Act of 1996."

Democrats Suggest Allen For NFL Commissioner. Democrats are suggesting that the NFL should consider Sen. George Allen to replace retiring commissioner Paul Tagliabue. The AP (3/28, Lester) reports that DSCC executive director J.D. Poersch, referring to Allen's comment that the Senate moves to slowly, said, "We hate to see a good Senate seat filled by someone who is so bored by his job that he doesn't even like to spend time in the state he is supposed to represent, let alone vote in a way that serves his state's interests."

Web Site Publishes Kerry's Hotel Requests. The Washington Post (3/28, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that The Smoking Gun web site yesterday published Sen. John Kerry's list of hotel room requirements from his 2004 presidential campaign. Kerry "nixed tomato-based foods and celery ('JK hates celery') while requesting cold cereal, meatloaf, chicken, cookies, Poland Spring bottled water and a recumbent bike for workouts." Kerry spokesman David Wade compared Kerry's list to Vice President Dick Cheney's, which the web site published last week. Said Wade, "Dick Cheney drinks Perrier and refuses to watch anything but Fox News. John Kerry hates Evian, eats meatloaf, and snacks on chocolate chip cookies. If these documents had been leaked during the campaign we'd have won in a landslide."

Research Finds "Educational Flatline" In US. Research led by a Duke University sociologist has found that the basic academic skills of US children has hardly budged despite nearly 30 years of quality of life improvements. USA Today (3/28, Toppo, 2.31M) reports, "The 'educational flatline,' as measured by scores on math and reading exams, defies researchers' expectations, because other quality-of-life measures, such as safety and family income, have improved steadily since 1975." The report "calls for more investments in preschool and adult education, as well as programs for children who enter school with inadequate English skills."

Lyn Nofziger Dead At 81. The Washington Times (3/28, Hallow, 90K) reports, "Lyn Nofziger, a long-time adviser to Ronald Reagan, died yesterday in his Falls Church home after a long bout with cancer. He was 81. Wife Bonnie, daughter Glenda Parry of Myrtle Beach, S.C., and grandson Matthew Parry were at his side when he succumbed to bladder cancer at about 5:15 p.m." The Washington Post (3/28, B6, Weil, 744K) calls Nofziger "rumpled" and "irreverent," and says he "served at Ronald Reagan's right hand both in the California capitol and in the White House, died yesterday of cancer at his home in Falls Church." The Post adds, "After leaving the White House, Mr. Nofziger felt in a personal way what he considered to be governmental overreaching. He was found guilty in 1988 on three counts of illegal lobbying at the Reagan White House within a year after he left to set up his consulting firm." But "a federal court of appeals overturned the conviction in June 1989, asserting that prosecutors had failed to prove that Mr. Nofziger 'knowingly' violated the law. The Supreme Court declined to consider reinstating the conviction."

The New York Times (3/28, Broder, 1.19M) says Nofziger "frequently expressed his disdain for Washington and for politics, but he kept returning. He put up a cynical facade that endeared him to the reporters he dealt with, but he remained devoted to Reagan, even though he was never part of the president's innermost circle."

Byrd's Wife Dies. The Hill (3/28, Downing) reports, "Erma Ora James Byrd, the wife of Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), died Saturday after struggling with a long illness. The couple had been married for 69 years."

Gore, Blood Say "Short Term" Focus Pervades Corporate, Investment Communities. Former Vice President Al Gore, who is chairman of Generation Investment Management, and David Blood, managing partner of Generation Investment Management, write in the Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) that the "interests of shareholders, over time, will be best served by companies that maximize their financial performance by strategically managing their economic, social, environmental and ethical performance. This is increasingly true as we confront the limits of our ecological system to hold up under current patterns of use." They add, "A short-term focus still pervades both corporate and investment communities, which hinders long-term value creation. … More mechanisms to incorporate environmental and social externalities will be needed to enable capital markets to achieve their intended purpose -- to consistently allocate capital to its highest and best use for the good of the people and the planet."

Hamas Leaders Say They Are "Ready For Dialogue." USA Today (3/28, Stinson, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "The Palestinian Authority's new leaders said Monday that they would reach out to the United States and other international peace mediators. For the first time, they raised the possibility that the Hamas-led government could recognize Israel's right to exist." The statements from Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh and his deputy Naser as-Sha'er "reflected a softening of rhetoric." The United States and Israel "dismissed the statements, saying the words had to be matched by action." In a speech to the Palestinian parliament, Haniyeh "said that his government 'is ready for dialogue' with the United States and the three other members of the so-called Quartet of international powers that have sought to broker peace between Israel and the Palestinians."

The Washington Times/AP (3/28, El Deeb) quotes Haniyeh saying, "The European Union has provided a lot of aid to our people and supported our right for freedom. ... We are interested in a strong relation with Europe." But "at the same time we expect the European Union to review some of its policies toward the conflict."

Kadima Predicted To Win Low-Turnout Israeli Election. The New York Times (3/28, Myre, 1.19M) calls Acting Israeli PM Ehud Olmert's Kadima Party "the overwhelming favorite" in today's election, which the Times says "is widely billed as one of the most important -- and least inspiring -- ballots in Israel's history." The Washington Post (3/28, Wilson, 744K) calls Israel's electorate "unsettled" and says the election occurs "after a campaign season marked by complacency, disappointment and a sense of betrayal among many voters now searching for new political leadership." The Christian Science Monitor (3/28, Mitnick, 61K) also says Kadima "ends the campaign fighting primarily voter apathy." Opinion polls "predict that voter turnout will be weak." The Washington Post (3/28, A17, Wilson, 744K) reports "the campaign has emerged as a referendum on Sharon's unfinished program to separate the Israeli and Palestinian populations through a series of unilateral withdrawals from the occupied territories."

PhRMA Move Against Israeli Company Sparks Anger Among US Jewish Groups. Roll Call (3/28, Ackley) reports, "A move by the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America to punish Israel on foreign trade has sparked an uproar among some American Jewish groups and raised the ire of a major Israeli drug company." In a written submission, PhRMA "has asked the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to designate Israel a 'priority foreign country' on a soon-to-be-released annual list. The list, known as the 'Special 301' report, is reserved for those countries with some of the worst intellectual property laws that affect American companies. And being on the list can lead to trade sanctions." Israel "is not the only country PhRMA has recommended be included on the priority foreign country list. PhRMA wants the USTR to put a handful on the list including Turkey, Poland, Germany and Canada." In response to PhRMA, "Jewish organizations, the Israeli embassy and Teva Pharmaceuticals in recent days have mounted a lobbying blitz aimed at the USTR, White House and Congress to keep Israel off the list, which is set to be released next month."

Rice To Discuss Iran During Three-Stop European Trip. The AP (3/27, Stringer) reports Secretary Rice "will visit several European capitals in the coming days, heading to Britain, France and Germany as new talks are scheduled concerning Iran's suspect nuclear program." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said Rice's trip will include stops in Berlin and Paris for meetings on Iran and other issues." British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw announced that the foreign ministers from France, China, Russia and Germany will join Rice and him in Berlin Thursday "for talks about Iran."

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (3/28, LaFranchi, 61K) says that "what was supposed to be a quick discussion in the United Nations Security Council to solidify international opposition to Iran's nuclear program has turned into a stalemate." With both Russia and China "balking at any council statement that might open the door to sanctions against Iran further down the road, agreement on a diplomatic rebuff could still be a week or more away. That is, if broadly acceptable wording for a statement can be found even then." In the short term, the United States "appears unfazed by the delay."

WSJournal Says Iranian Dissident Could Be "Iconic Figure" In Iranian "Revolution." The Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "Successful democratic revolutions tend to have iconic figures: Think of Nelson Mandela in South Africa, Vaclav Havel in Czechoslovakia, Lech Walesa in Poland and Viktor Yushchenko in Ukraine. These men not only led their movements to victory but also, through their personal suffering, became emblems of the suffering of their people." In Iran, "the iconic figure is Akbar Ganji, who was released this month from Tehran's Evin prison after serving a six-year sentence."

Indian Foreign Secretary Will Promote Nuclear Pact In Washington. The AP (3/27, Klug) Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran "is visiting Washington this week, the start of a month-long effort to help President Bush sell his landmark civilian nuclear cooperation deal to a skeptical Congress." After Saran's visit, "a string of Indian ministers will meet in coming weeks with U.S. officials and speak at think tanks, press conferences and business gatherings across Washington. They will argue that a US-Indian deal to share nuclear technology and fuel is crucial" to meet India's "massive energy demands."

Gutierrez Urges China To Open Markets, Settle Currency Disputes. The AP (3/28) reports, "US Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez on Monday called on China to open its markets to foreign goods and settle currency disputes, warning it could face protectionist sentiment in the US if its record trade surplus keeps growing."

Gutierrez will be in Beijing "for talks ahead of a possible Senate vote this week on proposed sanctions to punish China for manipulating its currency."

US-China Trade War Said To Be Possible. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Kempe, 2.11M) contrasts US-China economic competition to the nuclear standoff between Washington and Moscow during the Cold War. "As senior Washington and Beijing officials prepare for Chinese President Hu Jintao's summit with President Bush at the White House on April 20, a more unstable logic is being tested that has come to define the emerging superpower relationship that will define the first half of the 21st century. The argument holds that both countries would be so economically devastated by a trade or financial war…that neither would trigger one despite growing trade tensions. By that logic, China won't stop buying billions of U.S. dollars each month" and "the U.S. would not implement tough sanctions to punish China's undervalued currency. Don't bet on this logic holding. Miscalculation is the mother of all unintended conflicts."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (3/28, Swann, Alden) reports "the administration of President George W. Bush will face mounting pressure to take tougher action against China over the value of its currency with the introduction on Tuesday of legislation that would all but force the US Treasury to brand China as a currency manipulator." The proposal, drafted by Sens. Charles Grassley and Max Baucus, "would threaten new sanctions against countries that are found to have 'currency misalignments' with the US, according to people with knowledge of the proposal."

Pro-Western Alliance Likely To Lead Ukraine. The New York Times (3/28, Myers, 1.19M) reports Ukraine "was in political gridlock on Monday" after President Viktor Yushchenko was "stunned" by his party's third place finish in parliamentary elections. The Financial Times (3/28, Wagstyl, Warner) says Yushchenko's former ally Yulia Tymoshenko "on Monday staked her claim to head the government" and "was putting pressure on" Yushchenko "to allow her back into office."

The Wall Street Journal (3/28, Chazan, 2.11M) says a Yushchenko-Tymoshenko alliance "may now be the only way for Mr. Yushchenko to keep his pro-Russian rival, Viktor Yanukovych, from forming a government himself." Another Tymoshenko premiership "has raised worries among investors leery of her populist slogans and her embrace of state intervention while in office. In recent weeks, she has promised to renegotiate a key gas-supply deal with Russia, a move that could poison already-sour relations with Moscow." Meanwhile, Washington Times/AP (3/28, Isachenkov) noted White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan called the elections "free and fair."

London Mayor Calls US Ambassador "Chiselling Little Crook." The Financial Times (3/28, Adams) reports London Mayor Ken Livingstone, "the famously outspoken left-wing mayor and long-standing critic of American foreign policy," has "accused the US ambassador to the UK of behaving 'like a chiselling little crook' in a spat over the embassy's refusal to pay the city's road toll." Livingstone's "assault on Robert Tuttle was prompted by the long-running dispute over the embassy's refusal to pay the congestion charge." An embassy spokesman is quoted: "The mayor has a tendency to hyperbole. I'm not going to dignify that."

Blair Under Fire For Campaign Finance Scandal. USA Today (3/28, Soriano, 2.31M) reports, "A campaign-finance scandal has erupted in Britain, where investigators are looking into the possibility that secret political payments were rewarded with seats in the House of Lords." British newspapers "such as The Independent have dubbed the scandal 'loans for peerages.' Scotland Yard last week began investigating wealthy donors who loaned money to Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party. And Parliament's Constitutional Affairs Select Committee is scheduled to hold hearings today on political fundraising in Britain." The controversy "has led some leading British publications to call for Blair to step down." The Conservative Party "has also used loans to raise cash, but so far it has declined to identify the sources of its loans."

French Workers To Stage General Strike Today Over Jobs Law. The Financial Times (3/28, Arnold) reports, "France will be hit by widespread strikes and demonstrations on Tuesday against prime minister Dominique de Villepin's controversial youth employment law." It will be "the latest round in a battle of wills over economic reforms before next year's presidential elections." The New York Times (3/28, Smith, 1.19M) says "the strikes and protests planned for Tuesday represent a test of wills, with students and trade unions demanding that the unpopular law be rescinded and the country's embattled prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, insisting that it go into effect, albeit with possible changes." The Los Angeles Times (3/28, Rotella, 958K) also reports the story.

More Commentary. George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/28, 2.11M), "This time it's not the disaffected Muslim youths of the banlieu rioting in France. It's the privileged students of the Sorbonne banging up cars and battling the flics. … In reality, as so often happens in France, naïve youths are being exploited by unions that know exactly what they are doing -- protecting a system that gives security to job-holding union members at the expense of the unemployed. Street demonstrations are the means by which French unions show government who's boss, and who plans to continue being boss."

In a column titled "Who Moved My Fromage?," John Tierney writes in the New York Times (3/28, 1.19M), "As student protesters and workers try to paralyze France today, I don't suppose many of them are looking to America to come to their country's aid. Nor do I suppose many Americans are in the mood for a new Marshall Plan. But I have a modest proposal anyway. … Eventually we could introduce them to Trump's television show, but not right away. There's a good reason 'The Apprentice' hasn't made it to French TV. For now, 'You're fired' translates as 'We riot.'"

Robert Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (3/28, A23, 744K), "The street protesters are given to much make-believe -- the illusion that if they march long enough and burn enough cars, they can prevent unwanted change. The concessions that governments make to the future are usually small and slow." France "is raising full eligibility for retirement benefits from 40 to 42 years of contributions; the change occurs between now and 2020. This suggests a messy process of grudging accommodations that neither placate public opinion nor improve economic vitality."

France Makes Major Effort To Boost Nuclear Infrastructure. The Wall Street Journal (3/28, A1, Ball, 2.11M) reports that "over the past three decades, the French government has transformed" a "15-mile finger of land from a provincial backwater into one of the world's most concentrated patches of nuclear infrastructure. On an earthen pad carved from the cliffs squats a power plant with two nuclear reactors. It's expected to get a third. At the tip of the peninsula, which juts into the English Channel, sprawls a tightly guarded factory that processes spent nuclear fuel -- not just from France, but from throughout the world." The Journal adds, "Some in France look at this landscape and cringe. Others see it as a point of national pride . One thing is clear: It stems from one of the world's most unflinching campaigns to curb fossil-fuel consumption."

Serb Authorities Admit They Helped War Crimes Fugitive. The Washington Post (3/28, A20, Williams, Maroevic, 744K) reports, "After years of denial, Serbian authorities have acknowledged in a secret report that a band of about 50 intelligence and army officials conspired to conceal the movements of war crimes fugitive Ratko Mladic and provide him refuge." The report, "delivered to the government in January, was prepared by Serbia's military intelligence agency and led to firings and other moves within the country's domestic and military spy agencies, officials say. As a result, they assert, the noose around Mladic has been tightened, although there is no indication he is prepared to give up."

Three Western Hostages Freed By Nigerian Rebels. The CBS Evening News (3/27, story 9, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Two American oil workers kidnapped by militants in Nigeria were freed today by their captors. They and a Brit also freed today were among nine western oil workers kidnapped in mid-February. The others were released a few weeks ago. Militants have staged attacks and kidnappings to press their demands for a share of Nigeria's oil wealth. The violence has cut Nigeria's production and pushed oil prices even higher."

Fate Of Former Liberian Leader Remains Uncertain. The New York Times (3/28, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "Confusion reigned Monday over the status of Charles G. Taylor, the onetime warlord who became president of Liberia and who is wanted for war crimes by an international court based here for atrocities affecting Sierra Leone during neighboring Liberia's civil war." Liberia's current president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, "who had asked Nigeria on March 17 to extradite Mr. Taylor to face trial in Sierra Leone, told religious leaders in Monrovia, the capital, on Monday that Mr. Taylor should be moved directly to Sierra Leone." A State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, 'said at a briefing on Monday that the responsibility to secure Mr. Taylor lay with the Nigerian government."

Kristof Urges Focus On Gender Discrimination In Developing World. Nicholas D. Kristof writes in the New York Times (3/28, 1.19M) that it is "time to focus on gender inequality in the developing world, for that is the greatest single source of human rights violations today. Political dissidents tend to get the world's attention. But for every dissident who is beaten to death by government torturers somewhere in the world, thousands of ordinary women or girls die prematurely because of the effects of discrimination."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Claim Of 9/11 Role Shakes Up Trial (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson
USA Today, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022510

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Convicted al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's sentencing trial took a stunning turn Monday when Moussaoui testified that he and would-be "shoe bomber" Richard Reid were assigned to crash a jet into the White House as part of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington.

Moussaoui's disclosure contradicted his earlier statements that he had nothing to do with the 9/11 plot, and that he was to have been part of a second wave of attacks. His matter-of-fact description of his life as a terror operative who met Osama bin Laden and other top al-Qaeda leaders captivated the courtroom, and seemed to undermine his attorneys' arguments that he should not be sentenced to death.

"I believe in destiny," Moussaoui told jurors in the federal trial to determine whether he is executed or gets a life sentence. "I just speak the truth. God will take care of the rest."

Testifying over his attorneys' objections, the French citizen said he came to the USA in February 2001 to take flight lessons so he could kill Americans. Asked by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Spencer whether he stood by an earlier statement in which he called a video of the smoking World Trade Center site "gorgeous," Moussaoui replied, "Indeed."

Moussaoui, the only person charged in the USA in the 9/11 plot, said that when he was arrested in Minnesota on immigration charges on Aug, 16, 2001, he knew the attack date was near but was not sure when it would be. He said he also did not know who was supposed to be on his hijacking crew — other than Reid, with whom Moussaoui said he had trained in Afghanistan. In December 2001, Reid tried to ignite explosives in his shoes on a jet flying from Paris to Miami. He was convicted of terrorism and received life in prison.

Moussaoui, 37, said he lied repeatedly to investigators to allow his al-Qaeda "brothers" to go forward with the 9/11 plot. "When I saw the World Trade Center in flames" on TV, "I immediately understood," he said.

His testimony likely will be key to the government's claim that he should be executed because his lies to U.S. agents kept them from uncovering the 9/11 plot. Moussaoui's attorneys say that the government missed many clues about the plot and that Moussaoui's lies and his silence do not warrant execution.

Moussaoui's new version of his role in al-Qaeda also raised questions about his credibility. Besides Moussaoui's previous statements in which he denied any role in the attacks, his attorneys on Monday offered written testimony from Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed. Mohammed, captured in 2003 and held at a secret location, said Moussaoui was to have been part of a "second wave" of attacks. Mohammed said that Moussaoui did not know about the timing or the targets for Sept. 11, and that if Moussaoui had, his arrest probably would have altered the plan.

Moussaoui said he met all but three of the 9/11 hijackers in Afghanistan but said he had no contact with them in the USA. That seemed to back Mohammed's statement and a theory in the 9/11 probe: that Moussaoui was rejected for a role in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Moussaoui Says He Was To Fly 5th Plane In 9/11 Attacks (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Taking the stand over his lawyers' protests, Al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui declared Monday that he and Richard Reid, later arrested as the so-called shoe bomber, were slated to hijack a fifth airplane on Sept. 11, 2001, and fly it into the White House.

But Moussaoui's bombastic testimony — seriously doubted by intelligence officials — was immediately contradicted by the words of the captured Sept. 11 mastermind, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who said in an interrogation read aloud in court that Moussaoui was too "problematic" and unreliable to join the 19 hijackers on their suicide missions.

Mohammed instead said Moussaoui was being groomed for a second wave of attacks at a later date that included targets in California, such as the largest building in the state, the Library Tower in Los Angeles, and bridges in San Francisco and San Mateo.

He also described how the Sept. 11 plot originated in strategy sessions in Malaysia and how Al Qaeda initially planned for a half-dozen commercial airplanes to be hijacked over the Pacific Ocean in the mid- to late-1990s and then crashed into structures in "California and other western states."

The high drama in the federal courthouse came as U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema advised the jury that it likely will begin deliberations as early as Wednesday to decide whether Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan ancestry, was responsible for the deaths of nearly 3,000 people in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Moussaoui took the witness stand over repeated pleas by his court-appointed defense lawyers that his testimony was a reckless gambit and would make it easy for the jury to dispatch him to death row.

If jurors believed that Moussaoui was penciled in for the Sept. 11 mission, it would be easier for them to conclude that he did bear responsibility for the deaths that day. Arrested weeks before the attacks, he presumably would have known enough about the plot to head it off by cooperating with the FBI. Prosecutors argue that would make him eligible for the death penalty.

Indeed, Moussaoui often testified with a hard-edged bravado about how Americans were his enemy and he described his glee upon hearing in a Minnesota jail that the World Trade Center was under attack.

He also told with cold efficiency that he bought short-bladed knives and was preparing to use the weapons to take down a passenger or a flight attendant or anyone else who got in his way.

"You don't have to be trained to cut the throat of somebody," Moussaoui said. "It is not difficult."

But often his words and logic made him appear what his lawyers claim he is -- mentally unstable and almost delusional in his exalted view of himself as a soldier for Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. His defense team hopes that the jurors will decide they cannot execute a man who is insane.

"I don't like the word proud. But I'm grateful to be a member of Al Qaeda," Moussaoui said at one point.

The account by Moussaoui diverged sharply from his statements when he pleaded guilty last April. That statement was consistent with Mohammed's account that he was to be part of a later wave of attacks targeting the White House, among other targets.

Moussaoui spoke in detail Monday about his duties as an Al Qaeda member in Afghanistan, where he said he met many of the hijackers in his capacity as a security officer at guesthouses for Al Qaeda recruits.

Moussaoui said he had only scant details of the overall plan when he was arrested Aug. 16, 2001. "I had knowledge that the two towers would be hit, but I didn't have the detail," Moussaoui said.

Asked by Gerald Zerkin, one of his court-appointed attorneys, if he was meant to be part of the Sept. 11 attacks, Moussaoui said: "I was supposed to pilot a plane to hit the White House."

Moussaoui said he was asked in 1999 if he wanted to be a suicide pilot in an attack on the United States, and he declined. But after two dreams, he changed his mind. He has previously described a dream in which he flew a plane into the White House.

Speaking calmly in halting English, Moussaoui said he didn't know the exact date of the planned attack but that he knew it would be soon after he was scheduled to complete his aviation training on Aug. 20. Instead, suspicious flight instructors alerted the FBI and Moussaoui was arrested.

Of his crew members on the supposed fifth plane, "one definitely was Richard Reid. As for the others, it was not definite," he said.

On Dec. 22, 2001, Reid tried to detonate a bomb in his shoe on a flight from Paris to Miami with 197 people on board. Passengers subdued him and the plane was diverted to Boston, where it landed safely.

The government and Mohammed, whose statement to interrogators was summarized in 58 pages read to the jury, agree that Moussaoui was not the so-called 20th hijacker -- the missing man on the four-hijacker plane that went down over a Pennsylvania farm field.

When Moussaoui pleaded guilty, he described himself then only obliquely as someone who was to crash a plane into the White House at a date he did not reveal. Then on Monday, facing the jury from the witness box, he filled in those details.

Dressed in his dark green prison jumpsuit and white religious cap, often stroking his long black beard and sipping from a cup of water, he refrained from the speeches and tirades that have marked his past courtroom behavior.

He concisely answered questions and often was quite polite, except when he refused to respond to the lead prosecutor who wished him a "good morning."

But the measure of the man -- the only Al Qaeda terrorist to stand trial for Sept. 11 in this country -- was also borne out by the presence of six large male deputy marshals who stood around Moussaoui as he testified, their eyes focused on his every move.

DOJ_NMG_0022512

He also declined to raise his hand and take the oath before testifying, instead simply telling the judge "yes I can" when she asked if he could tell the truth.

He testified that he knew that Mohamed Atta, the hijacker's team leader, was also in this country and that the twin towers were to be hit. But he said his role was to be different that morning.

"I was supposed to pilot a plane into the White House," he said.

Moussaoui and Reid, part of the supposed crew, had both attended the Finsbury Park mosque in London, a hotbed of Muslim extremism there. But there has been no evidence to date that Reid was in the United States in the middle of August 2001, when Moussaoui was arrested in Minnesota for overstaying his visa.

Nevertheless, Moussaoui testified that he was instructed both by Bin Laden and Atta to fly a fifth plane and to crash it into the White House. Although he said he had been given no specific date, he believed it was to be the morning of Sept. 11.

He further admitted that he lied to FBI agents when arrested in Minnesota, a key point for the government. Moussaoui said he would not cooperate because "I wanted my mission to go ahead."

"I knew it would happen after August, so I bought a radio and I was listening," he said. "On the radio they said there was a fire in the World Trade Center. Then somebody put the TV on and I saw the World Trade Center in flames.

"I immediately understood."

Moussaoui was cross-examined by lead prosecutor Robert Spencer, who asked him about his reaction to the loss of nearly 3,000 lives that day.

"You are Americans, and I consider every American to be my enemy," he said.

Spencer reminded him how he once wrote the judge in a sealed letter that he heard that one of the attendants on United Airlines Flight 93 had screamed "I don't want to die" before it crashed in western Pennsylvania.

Were you happy she died? Spencer asked.

"I didn't have any feelings," he said.

Moussaoui was ambiguous when asked whether a death sentence would make him an Al Qaeda martyr. Other juries in past terrorism cases have given defendants life rather than death for that reason.

"I'm not concerned with the death penalty. I don't believe you have, or the government, or the jury will have anything to say about my death."

He added: "I believe in destiny."

Moussaoui, Undermining Case, Now Ties Himself To 9/11 Plot (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 27 — Zacarias Moussaoui, who is facing the death penalty for the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, took the witness stand in his own defense Monday, only to bolster the government's case by unhesitatingly acknowledging the charges in the indictment against him and adding a few new, self-incriminating statements.

Mr. Moussaoui said he knew in advance of Al Qaeda's plans to fly jetliners into the World Trade Center and asserted that his role on that day was to have been to fly another plane into the White House. He said he was to have been accompanied on the suicidal mission by Richard C. Reid, the so-called shoe bomber who was convicted in a separate failed effort to blow up a plane in flight.

Although Mr. Moussaoui had said over the last few years that he was a member of Al Qaeda and was learning to fly a plane to participate in some "second wave" of terrorist attacks, until now he had always insisted that he knew little of the plot for the attacks and vowed to fight the death penalty to the last of his strength.

But when he began his long-awaited testimony on Monday, he offered a lengthy description of a far deeper involvement with Al Qaeda and its plots. Not only was he a member of the terror network, he told the jury, he also said that he knew most of the Sept. 11 hijackers, admitted that he lied to investigators about his knowledge of their plot when he was arrested on immigration violations three weeks before the attacks on New York and the Pentagon, and recounted that he was ecstatic when, behind bars, he heard the news of the attacks on a radio he had bought for that purpose.

Before the day was over, the jury also had the extraordinary experience of hearing a reading of testimony taken in a deposition from Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who is said to have organized the Sept. 11 attacks and is being held somewhere in the secret overseas detention system of the Central Intelligence Agency.

That deposition, in which Mr. Mohammed answered questions agreed to by prosecutors and defense lawyers, seemed to contradict Mr. Moussaoui's assertion that he was meant to be a pilot on Sept. 11.

Mr. Mohammed portrayed Mr. Moussaoui as a fringe figure who might have been used in a second wave of attacks if needed.

For more than an hour, Michael Nachmanoff, a public defender, recited Mr. Mohammed's answers in what resembled an oddly disembodied literary reading. Mr. Nachmanoff read out testimony that any planning for a second wave of attacks "was only in the most preliminary stages" and that targets had not even been selected.

But while that might seem to contradict Mr. Moussaoui's version of events, the defendant's first-person account, painting his own role in bold brushstrokes, was the day's main event.

When one of Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed lawyers asked if he was to have been the so-called 20th hijacker — a member of the team on the plane that crashed in Pennsylvania, with only four hijackers aboard, while the planes that hit the Pentagon and the World Trade Center had teams of five — he replied, "No, I was not to be a fifth hijacker."

But, he continued, "I was supposed to fly a plane into the White House."

In addition to the other four planes? asked his lawyer, Gerald T. Zerkin.

"That's correct," Mr. Moussaoui answered.

He also asserted, for the first time, that one of his team members was to have been Mr. Reid, a British convert to Islam who was arrested on Dec. 22, 2001, while trying to detonate an explosive device in his shoe during a flight from Paris to Miami. Previous investigations have provided no evidence of Mr. Reid's involvement in any other plots, or any efforts to enter the United States in the summer of 2001.

When Robert J. Spencer, the chief prosecutor, had his turn, Mr. Moussaoui agreed with just about every incriminating question.

Mr. Spencer asked if the reason Mr. Moussaoui had lied to the F.B.I. agent who questioned him in Minneapolis on Aug. 16 was "so you could allow the operation to go forward."

"That is correct," Mr. Moussaoui replied.

After his arrest, was he looking forward to news of the attacks?

"Yes, you could say that," Mr. Moussaoui said calmly.

He used the phrase "that is correct" dozens of times as the prosecutor led him through the facts presented in the indictment.

It was correct, Mr. Moussaoui said, that he knew hijackers were in the United States for some imminent mission that involved flying planes into buildings.

Was his reason for hoping to fly a plane into the White House to kill Americans?

"That is correct," he said.

Mr. Moussaoui, who has been truculent through proceedings in the past three years and whose outbursts have drawn rebukes from the judge, spoke calmly with a heavy French accent, leaning forward in the witness chair, sometimes casually holding out an empty cup for a marshal to fill with water.

He seemed testy only when being questioned by his own lawyer, who tried with little success to elicit replies that would help his case.

Mr. Moussaoui's testimony even undercut one of the pillars of the defense his lawyers had laid out for him, that he did not know any of the 19 hijackers who died on Sept. 11. As Mr. Spencer showed him their photos, Mr. Moussaoui said he knew 17 of them from the days he helped run a Qaeda guesthouse in Afghanistan.

Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan heritage, has already pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. The sole question before the jury here is whether he should be executed or spend the rest of his life in jail.

DOJ_NMG_0022514

The Justice Department has argued that he should pay with his life because had he not lied, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Federal Aviation Administration would have moved swiftly to thwart the plot.

The defense may complete its case by Tuesday, and Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told the jurors they might get to deliberate as early as Wednesday. Under the federal death penalty law, the jury must first consider whether Mr. Moussaoui's actions caused some deaths on Sept. 11. If they decide unanimously that his actions did, they move to another phase to consider whether the death penalty is appropriate.

Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed lawyers, with whom he does not speak, almost certainly did not want him to testify as he did. But under the law they had no power to prevent him from doing so.

Until Mr. Moussaoui took the stand, the momentum seemed to be with the defense, which had contended that he was a fringe figure in Al Qaeda whose leaders held him in low regard.

Moreover, the government's case had been plagued by problems. After the disclosure that a government transportation lawyer had improperly coached some aviation security witnesses, the testimony of two other witnesses about how the F.B.I. handled investigative leads before Sept. 11 raised as many questions over the government's performance as it did about Mr. Moussaoui's culpability.

In addition to having served as the government's star witness, Mr. Moussaoui acknowledged to Mr. Spencer the depth of his hatred of Americans before a jury that is to decide whether he lives or dies.

He agreed that he rejoiced in the death of nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11 and that in August 2002, he wrote that he described a tape recording of a female flight attendant pleading for her life aboard one of the planes as "gorgeous."

Moussaoui Says He Was To Fly 5th Plane (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

Zacarias Moussaoui took the stand at his death penalty trial yesterday and declared that he was supposed to hijack a fifth airplane on Sept. 11, 2001, and crash it into the White House in the terrorist attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people.

The al-Qaeda operative said his role was to head a five-man crew that included Richard Reid, the British citizen who later tried to set off explosives in his shoes aboard a transatlantic flight. Moussaoui said that his orders came from Osama bin Laden and that his plan was foiled by his arrest in August 2001.

"I was supposed to pilot a plane to hit the White House," Moussaoui told a riveted federal courtroom in Alexandria. "I only knew about the two planes of the World Trade Center in addition to my own plane."

His words were as stunning as the way in which he delivered them. When he pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaeda last year, Moussaoui denied involvement in Sept. 11 and insisted that he was to be part of a second wave of attacks. He then launched into one of his rambling courtroom outbursts, ending it by screaming, "God curse America!"

The familiar Moussaoui was gone yesterday. In his place was a hardened terrorist operative who spoke calmly and methodically, looking straight at his questioners as he voiced his hatred for the nation that had put him on trial for his life. "I consider every American to be my enemy," Moussaoui, 37, said as jurors leaned forward in their seats. "For me, every American is going to want my death because I want their death."

The extraordinary spectacle of an admitted al-Qaeda member testifying about the deadliest terrorist attack in American history was later matched by something equally unusual. Defense lawyers read into the record evidence gathered in the United States' secret and controversial detention system, telling jurors what Khalid Sheik Mohammed, a key planner of Sept. 11, would have said had he taken the stand.

And Mohammed's words, given to interrogators at the undisclosed location where he is being held, contradicted Moussaoui's testimony.

He said Moussaoui had been slated for a second wave of attacks that would have included targets not hit on Sept. 11, such as the White House and the Sears Tower in Chicago. Mohammed noted that the Sept. 11 attacks on the Twin Towers and the Pentagon proceeded on schedule despite Moussaoui's arrest while taking flying lessons in Minnesota.

DOJ_NMG_0022515

Even if Moussaoui's precise role is never certain, what was clear yesterday was the damage that his testimony, given over the strenuous objections of his lawyers, had done to his defense. Under cross-examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer, Moussaoui admitted to the government's primary argument for his execution -- that he lied to the FBI after his arrest to allow the Sept. 11 attacks to go forward.

Moussaoui acknowledged that he did not know the exact date of the attacks but that he knew they were to take place just after August. He learned of the attacks while listening to the radio while in jail in Minnesota, and "I immediately understood," he testified.

Moussaoui said he lied "because I wanted my mission to go ahead," adding that he "never told them anything about the operation."

"You hid that from them. You concealed it, right?" Spencer asked.

"Indeed," Moussaoui replied.

Legal experts said those admissions, combined with Moussaoui's chilling demeanor in court, probably would resonate with the jury, which is expected to begin deliberating this week on whether he is eligible for the death penalty. If jurors found him eligible, a second phase of the hearing would determine whether Moussaoui should be executed.

"It sounds like he's toast," said Eric Muller, a former federal prosecutor who teaches at the University of North Carolina. "The prosecution's best hope was to make him appear scary rather than crazy. It sounds like he was really scary."

Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert who is senior adviser to the president of the Rand Corp., said Moussaoui "has destroyed much of his defense. He has gone as far as he possibly can to make the prosecution's case."

That case had appeared troubled only days ago. Prosecutors were embarrassed by the misconduct of a government lawyer, Carla J. Martin, who improperly coached witnesses. Moussaoui's attorneys unearthed government documents that showed in new detail how the FBI had ignored repeated warnings from its own agents that Moussaoui was a terrorist who wanted to hijack an airplane.

Before Moussaoui took the stand, his attorneys, with whom he does not speak, tried to block his testimony. One, Gerald T. Zerkin, said Moussaoui does not recognize the court's authority and, "as an al-Qaeda member, he believes it is okay to lie."

But prosecutors urged U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema to let him speak. Brinkema agreed, acknowledging that Moussaoui "had expressed his disdain of the United States" but had promised to behave in court.

Asked by a court clerk to raise his right hand and promise to tell the truth, Moussaoui stood motionless. He then told Brinkema he understood that he was required to speak truthfully, and he was allowed to take the stand.

From that moment on, Moussaoui was intense but controlled, often leaning forward on both forearms so close to the microphone that his lips brushed against it. He was silent when Spencer said "good morning" but answered questions from both sides politely and even apologized for "making a speech."

In a thick French accent, he matter-of-factly explained the great pleasure he derived from the deaths of so many Americans on Sept. 11. At one point, Spencer whipped out one of the numerous handwritten motions Moussaoui had written from jail when he was representing himself earlier in the case. The motion said the 19 hijackers should be "blessed" by Allah.

"You still believe that?" Spencer asked.

"One hundred percent," Moussaoui replied.

Minutes earlier, Moussaoui testified that he had bought two small knives in Oklahoma and was prepared to use them to cut the throat of a passenger or flight attendant on the plane he hijacked. "To cut the throat of somebody is not difficult," he said, explaining that he did not need training to do it.

The French citizen even injected a bit of humor, poking fun at the perception by many Americans that he was intended to be the "20th hijacker," which refers to the fact that the hijacked plane that crashed in Pennsylvania had only four crew members instead of five. Asked by Zerkin why he had signed his guilty plea as "the 20th hijacker," Moussaoui replied: "Because everybody used to refer to me as the 20th hijacker, and it was a bit of fun." He said he was not meant to be on that plane.

Moussaoui said he initially declined to take part in the Sept. 11 plot when he was first asked by senior al-Qaeda leaders in 1999 while he was managing a guest house for bin Laden's organization in Afghanistan.

He changed his mind, he said, after dreaming about crashing a plane into the White House. He mentioned the dream to bin Laden, who sent a senior lieutenant to tell Moussaoui to get flight training in the United States.

By the summer of 2001, Moussaoui said, he knew other hijackers were in the United States, but he had no contact with them here. He identified most of the 19 hijackers when prosecutors flashed their pictures on a screen, saying he knew them from his time in Afghanistan.

His own hijacking cell, Moussaoui said, was to include Reid, who later pleaded guilty to trying to blow up a Paris-to-Miami flight by igniting his shoes. Reid, who pledged loyalty to bin Laden when he was sentenced to life in prison in 2003, once worshiped with Moussaoui at a London mosque.

Moussaoui testified repeatedly that he views himself as being at war with the United States. Asked by Zerkin whether a death sentence would make him a martyr, he said: "I believe in destiny. . . . What I'm doing now is just to speak the truth, and God will take care of the rest."

Moussaoui: White House Was My 9/11 Target (CNN)

By Phil Hirschkorn

CNN.com, March 28, 2006

Al Qaeda conspirator takes stand against his lawyers' wishes

ALEXANDRIA, Virginia (CNN) -- Al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui told a stunned courtroom Monday that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid were supposed to hijack a fifth plane on September 11, 2001, and crash it into the White House.

In a day of startling revelations, an unrepentant Moussaoui also said for the first time that he knew about al Qaeda's plot to hijack planes and fly them into the twin towers of the World Trade Center.

Under cross-examination, Moussaoui said he rejoiced at seeing the smoldering rubble and hearing a recording of a doomed flight attendant begging for her life.

Moussaoui explained to jurors why he doesn't trust his defense team: "I consider every American my enemy." (Watch details of Moussaoui's testimony -- 2:14)

Moussaoui's boldest revelations focused on the 9/11 plot, his role, and what he knew in advance of the terrorist attacks.

"I had knowledge that the two towers would be hit, but I did not have the details," Moussaoui told jurors.

Moussaoui said that while he didn't know the "precise date to the day" of the planned terrorist attacks, he knew they would come soon after his arrest in August 2001 in Minnesota. He said he made sure he had a radio in his jail cell.

When the first news reports on September 11 described a fire at the trade center, Moussaoui said, "I immediately understood.'"It is smoking good'

Three days later, as he was flown from a Minnesota jail to New York, Moussaoui said he saw the trade center ruins and told the federal marshals transporting him: "It is smoking good."

Moussaoui testified that had he not been arrested he would have tried to fly into the White House on a fifth hijacked plane.

That claim was contradicted by alleged September 11 architect Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, whose testimony was read from a written interrogation summary.

Mohammed said Moussaoui "was never slated to be a 9/11 operative" and the sequel was on the "back burner."

Moussaoui identified Reid as one of his team members. Both men lived in London in the 1990s and attended the Finsbury Park mosque, reportedly an al Qaeda recruiting hub.

Reid was subdued by passengers in December 2001 when he attempted to set off a bomb in his shoe on board an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami. The plane was diverted to Boston, where it landed safely and Reid was arrested. He is serving a life prison term.

Reid has written Moussaoui at least once during their incarceration.

The courtroom was packed and silent as Moussaoui took the stand against the wishes of his lawyers. Four 9/11 family members occupied the courtroom's third row and the jurors sat at attention, their pens and notepads poised.

DOJ_NMG_0022517

There were no dramatic outbursts and no speeches. But by the time he stepped down three hours later, Moussaoui seemed to have undone more than four years of work by his defense team. No remorse

Under cross examination, Moussaoui repeatedly expressed no remorse for what happened on September 11.

Referring to Moussaoui's glimpse of trade center rubble, prosecutor Rob Spencer asked, "You were happy that happened?"

"That's correct," Moussaoui said.

Moussaoui also said he had "rejoiced" at hearing a United Flight 93 attendant beg for her life on a recovered flight recorder.

Earlier, under questioning by one of his attorneys, Gerald Zerkin, Moussaoui dispelled the idea that he was intended to be the 20th hijacker -- the missing fifth man on Flight 93, which crashed in a Pennsylvania field.

Moussaoui admitted his "dream," sanctioned by al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, to crash a plane into the White House, when he pleaded guilty 11 months ago to joining the conspiracy. But at that time, he said the White House attack was to follow 9/11.

He testified that his knowledge of the conspiracy was compartmentalized and that he had "specific involvement only for my own plane."

Prosecutors contend that Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen of Moroccan heritage, deserves to die. Had he not lied after his arrest, they contend, investigators could have uncovered the September 11 conspiracy.

Asked by his lawyer why he lied, Moussaoui replied, "Because I am al Qaeda.'"You're allowed to lie for jihad'

"The Prophet says, 'war is deceit,' " Moussaoui later told prosecutor Robert Spencer. "You're allowed to lie for jihad. You're allowed any technique to defeat your enemy."

After Moussaoui's testimony, the defense introduced the statements from Mohammed.

Moussaoui was a "problem from the start," Mohammed said. He eventually ordered plot coordinator Ramzi Binalshibh to wire Moussaoui money for flight school and cut off ties.

Moussaoui had a hard time following instructions and was "lax with operational security," sending too many e-mails and making too many phone calls, according to Mohammed's testimony.

The potential targets for the second wave of attacks -- the White House, the Sears Tower in Chicago, Illinois, the U.S. Bank Tower in Los Angeles, California -- were not even finalized, he said.

The only question for the jury is whether Moussaoui will be put to death or spend the rest of his life in prison.

To condemn him to death, jurors must agree that he committed an act that contributed to at least one of the 2,793 deaths on September 11.

Prosecutors contend Moussaoui's lies to federal agents who arrested him in mid-August 2001 after he aroused suspicions at a Minnesota flight school furthered the conspiracy.

"I believe in destiny," Moussaoui told jurors. "I just have to speak the truth, and God will take care of the rest."

Moussaoui Testimony Stuns Court (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 28, 2006

He said he was training to fly a fifth plane into the White House. The 9/11 mastermind, however, has said Zacarias Moussaoui was never considered to be one of the pilots.

ALEXANDRIA, VA. - Testifying over his lawyers' objections, Zacarias Moussaoui calmly told a stunned courtroom Monday that he had been training to be part of the Sept. 11 operation and knew Al-Qaida planned to crash two U.S. jetliners into the World Trade Center.

The confessed Al-Qaida conspirator's nearly three hours of riveting testimony, including his acknowledgment that he was prepared, "if necessary," to slit the throat of a pilot or flight attendant, could prove pivotal as a jury decides whether he should be executed.

Moussaoui said that when he was arrested in Minnesota in August 2001, he was training to fly a fifth hijacked plane into the White House with a crew that would have included Richard Reid, a man later convicted of attempting an in-flight shoe bombing. Moussaoui admitted that he lied to interrogators so as "not to compromise" the deadliest terror attack in U.S. history.

But Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers unveiled a sharply contrasting picture of the defendant, reading into the record the first public statements by Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the admitted mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, since his capture in Pakistan three years ago.

In the declassified summary of his statements to U.S. interrogators, Sheikh Mohammed offered startling new details of the planning of the deadliest terror attack in U.S. history, describing a simple operation to "wake the American people up."

He said Moussaoui was never considered to be one of the Sept. 11 pilots and was being groomed for a follow-on attack on the West Coast that might have included flying a plane into San Francisco's Golden Gate Bridge or the San Mateo Bridge. Sheikh Mohammed repeatedly expressed doubts about Moussaoui's reliability and said he tried to cut him out altogether on at least two occasions.

It was the most dramatic day of testimony in a three-week-old trial filled with tumult. Jurors, who scribbled notes as Moussaoui further implicated himself, now must sort out the conflicting portraits in determining whether he should be put to death for what he didn't tell interrogators while jailed in Minnesota.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said she expects the first phase of the trial -- to determine whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty -- to go to the jury as early as Wednesday.

If the 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan origin is found eligible, both sides will present evidence of aggravating and mitigating factors in a second phase to determine whether he is sentenced to death or life in prison without parole.

On the witness stand

Moussaoui was granted his request to testify after defense lawyer Gerald Zerkin argued that he was incompetent to do so. Brinkema said she recognized Moussaoui's constitutional right to testify.

Moussaoui, in his green prison jump suit and white knit hat, sat hunched over in the witness chair with a phalanx of federal marshals a few feet away.

Stating his name as "Zacarias Moussaoui Ibn Omar al-Saharawi," he answered questions softly, but with precision.

During an awkward, 30-minute direct examination, Zerkin asked Moussaoui why he signed his name as "20th hijacker" in pleading guilty last year.

"Why not?" Moussaoui replied in heavily accented English. "Everybody referred to me as the 20th hijacker. It was a bit of fun, that's all."

He then told Zerkin that he was not the 20th hijacker. But when asked if he was part of the Sept. 11 operation, he responded: "I was supposed to pilot a plane into the White House."

Asked what he knew about the operation, he said, "I only knew about the two planes [hitting] the World Trade Center."

During cross examination, chief prosecutor Robert Spencer asked him: "The reason you wanted to fly the plane into the White House is to kill Americans?"

"That's correct," Moussaoui said.

Moussaoui said he knew when he was arrested that other Al-Qaida operatives were in the United States. He said he had met or seen some of the Sept. 11 hijackers in Afghanistan.

He said he spent 3½ to four years in Al-Qaida training camps in Afghanistan, where he ran a guest house, served as a driver for key operatives and mingled at times with Osama bin Laden and Al-Qaida operations chief, Muhammad Atef.

In the winter of 1999, he said, he participated in a high-level brainstorming session about why truck bombs had failed to knock down the World Trade Center.

But Moussaoui acknowledged that he got in trouble with higher ups when he traveled to Malaysia, spurned taking flight lessons at a school in Kuala Lampur and got too aggressive in urging local operatives to buy chemicals to make truck bombs and to kidnap businessmen. Moussaoui said he ultimately apologized and was reinstated.

Moussaoui said he bought a radio while in the Sherburne County jail in Minnesota so he could hear news accounts when the attack occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0022519

Asked if he stood by his comment, in a 2002 jail cell court filing, that the Sept. 11 attacks were "gorgeous," he replied: "Indeed."

Moussaoui also acknowledged that while he had trouble flying the "small planes" on which he trained in Oklahoma without getting a pilot's license, he was confident he could have flown a 747-400 jumbo jet. He was on the verge of taking his first lesson in a 747 simulator when he was arrested in the Twin Cities.

Asked repeatedly about whether he wanted to be a martyr, Moussaoui said, "I believe in destiny. I believe that ... I just have to speak the truth and God will take care of the rest."

Sheikh Mohammed's view

Sheikh Mohammed's account detailed a seven-year evolution of the Sept. 11 plot, which he traced to a 1994 plan to blow up 10 U.S. jetliners over the Pacific Ocean. Ultimately, he said, 34 Al-Qaida leaders and operatives, including Bin Laden, participated in the Sept. 11 plot targeted the Pentagon, the U.S. Capitol and the Trade Center.

He described the training of 10 of the "muscle hijackers." Each had been directed to butcher a sheep and camel with Swiss army knives "to prepare them to storm the cockpit the first time the door opened."

He said Moussaoui didn't fit into the initial wave, because he wanted all of the hijackers to be Middle Eastern in hopes he could use Europeans for the follow-on attack amid tightened security.

But Moussaoui did not follow his edicts about "operational security," Sheikh Mohammed said, violating his order not to talk about flight training by sending him an e-mail detailing his training efforts after arriving in the United States.

Sheikh Mohammed "did not want to deal with Moussaoui any longer," he said. After Moussaoui made eight phone calls to Germany-based financial conduit Ramzi Binalshibh, he told interrogators, he instructed Binalshibh "to drop contact with Moussaoui."

Moussaoui Cites 5th Jetliner Plot (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

Al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui testified yesterday that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard C. Reid were supposed to hijack a fifth airplane on September 11 and fly it into the White House.

Moussaoui's testimony on his own behalf stunned the Alexandria courtroom as his account was in stark contrast to his previous statements.

He told the court that he knew the World Trade Center attack was imminent and that he lied to investigators when arrested in August 2001 because he wanted it to happen.

"You lied because you wanted to conceal that you were a member of al Qaeda?" prosecutor Rob Spencer asked.

"That's correct," Moussaoui said.

"You lied so the plan could go forward?" Mr. Spencer asked.

"That's correct," Moussaoui said.

The exchange could be key to the government's case that the September 11 attacks might have been averted had Moussaoui been more cooperative after his arrest.

Moussaoui told the court that he knew the attacks were to occur some time after August 2001 and bought a radio so he could hear them unfold.

Specifically, he said he knew the World Trade Center was going to be attacked.

"I had knowledge that the Twin Towers would be hit," Moussaoui said. "I didn't know the details of this."

Nineteen men pulled off the attacks in New York, a Washington suburb and a Pennsylvania field in the worst act of terrorism on U.S. soil.

Asked by his attorney why he signed his guilty plea in April as "the 20th hijacker," Moussaoui replied, "Because everybody used to refer to me as the 20th hijacker, and it was a bit of fun."

Moussaoui denied he was to have been a fifth hijacker on United Airlines Flight 93, which four al Qaeda hijackers flew into a Pennsylvania field on September 11 -- the so-called missing 20th hijacker. The intended target in that attack remains a mystery.

Moussaoui said he was part of the September 11 operation and ordered to pilot a fifth jetliner into the White House. He said Reid was the only person he knew for sure would have been on that mission, but others were discussed.

On Dec. 22, 2001, Reid was subdued by passengers when he attempted to detonate a bomb in his shoe aboard an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami. He pleaded guilty in October 2002 to trying to blow up Flight 63 and was sentenced to life in prison.

But the jury also heard the mastermind of the September 11 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, now in U.S. custody, repeatedly state that Moussaoui was to be a part of a second wave of attacks unrelated to September 11. In a 58-page statement read to jurors, Mohammed said he only wanted Middle Easterners for September 11, so that Europeans like Moussaoui stood a better chance of mounting a subsequent attack after security was increased.

Moussaoui testified that at one point he was excluded from September 11 pre-hijacking operations because he had gotten in trouble with his al Qaeda superiors on a 2000 trip to Malaysia. He said it was only after he was called back to Afghanistan and talked with al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden that he was approved again for the operations.

Prosecutors argue that Moussaoui, a French citizen, thwarted a prime opportunity to track down the September 11 hijackers and possibly unravel the plot when he lied after his arrest.

Had Moussaoui confessed, the FBI could have pursued leads that would have led them to most of the hijackers, government witnesses have testified.

To win the death penalty, prosecutors must first prove that Moussaoui's actions -- specifically, his lies -- were directly responsible for at least one death on September 11. If they fail, Moussaoui would get life in prison.

Mr. Spencer tried but failed to counter one of the defense's opening day arguments. Defense attorney Edward MacMahon had told the jury that Moussaoui wanted martyrdom and that the only way he could achieve that would be if the jury gave him the death penalty.

Three times, Mr. Spencer asked Moussaoui a version of this question: "If you get the death penalty, you are not a martyr?"

"It's more complex," Moussaoui said. "It depends."

"Depends on what?" Mr. Spencer asked.

"If you have fought to the best of your ability," Moussaoui said.

Moussaoui Says He, Reid Planned To Attack White House (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Bill Arthur Nadine Elsibai

Bloomberg, March 28, 2006

March 27 (Bloomberg) -- Zacarias Moussaoui testified that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid planned to hijack a jetliner and fly it into the White House on the day of the Sept. 11 attacks.

``Before your arrest, were you scheduled to be a pilot in an operation run on Sept. 11, 2001?" defense lawyer Gerald Zerkin asked Moussaoui at his sentencing trial in Alexandria, Virginia. Moussaoui was arrested on immigration charges a month before the attacks.

``Yes, I was supposed to pilot a plane to hit the White House," Moussaoui said. He also said, ``I knew the towers would be hit," referring to the attacks on the World Trade Center in New York.

Moussaoui said he knew about the plot when he was arrested on Aug. 16, 2001, and that he lied to FBI agents because he wanted the attacks to go forward. Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last April to conspiracy charges linked to the Sept. 11 attacks. He is the only person charged in the U.S. in connection with the attacks.

Federal agents arrested Moussaoui, a French citizen of Moroccan descent, in Minnesota after FBI agents discovered he was taking lessons to become a pilot. Prosecutors said his lies to federal agents prevented them from uncovering the Sept. 11 plot and that he is responsible for the deaths of almost 3,000 people.

The jury will decide whether Moussaoui is sentenced to death or life in prison without parole. Moussaoui took the witness stand against his lawyers' advice.

Member of Crew

Under questioning by Zerkin, Moussaoui said Reid was to be a member of his crew to fly a plane into the White House on Sept. 11. Reid is serving a life prison sentence for trying to use a shoe bomb to blow up a U.S. airliner flying from Paris to Miami in December 2001.

Moussaoui said that ``in global terms, I didn't have an overall view" of the plan for the attacks or the exact date.

Prosecutor Rob Spencer asked if he had been looking forward to what would happen in the attacks.

``Yes, you can say that," Moussaoui said.

Afterward, ``you were delighted, weren't you?" Spencer asked.

``Indeed," Moussaoui said.

He said he had bought a knife with a small blade and was prepared to use it to cut the throat of someone on the plane he planned to hijack.

Osama bin Laden

Moussaoui said al-Qaeda leaders asked him in 1999 if he wanted to be a suicide pilot and he declined. He said that later, when he was in al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden's compound in Afghanistan, he told bin Laden he had dreamed of making plans to fly a plane into the White House. After that he decided to become a suicide pilot, Moussaoui said.

He said he saw eventual Sept. 11 hijacker Mohamed Atta at the compound and understood that he was ``big time."

Defense lawyer Edward McMahon asked if Moussaoui was proud to be a member of al-Qaeda.

``I'm grateful to be an al-Qaeda member," Moussaoui said.

Before Moussaoui took the stand, Zerkin argued to U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema that he shouldn't be allowed to testify because he doesn't recognize U.S. law or the authority of the court.

When Moussaoui took the stand, Brinkema told him, ``You must promise the court that you will tell the truth when you speak." He said he understood.

Jihad

Later, Zerkin asked Moussaoui whether it was ``OK to lie in court as part of jihad," or holy war.

``Yes, it is," Moussaoui said.

When he pleaded guilty last year, Moussaoui maintained that his plot to fly a plane into the White House was separate from the Sept. 11 attacks. He had said his plot was to be carried out if the U.S. didn't cooperate in freeing Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, who was sentenced to life in prison for plotting to blow up several U.S. targets including the United Nations in New York.

Sentencing in federal death penalty cases is held in two phases. First, jurors will decide if Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty. Prosecutors must prove his actions were intentional and directly led to death in the Sept. 11 attacks.

A determination that Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty would trigger a second phase of the trial, in which the jury considers factors weighing for and against a death penalty to determine whether capital punishment is the proper sentence.

After Moussaoui's testimony, jurors were read an account of U.S. authorities' questioning of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who is accused of being the al-Qaeda operations chief responsible for planning the attacks. He was captured in 2003 in Pakistan.

In the account, Mohammed said Moussaoui was never supposed to be involved in the Sept. 11 attacks and was recruited for a second wave of attacks. He said Moussaoui was chosen for his French citizenship because al-Qaeda leaders believed people with Arab passports would get more scrutiny after the first attacks.

The case is U.S. vs. Moussaoui, 01cr455, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia (Alexandria).

In The Name Of Self-Defense, A Terrorist's Grand Delusion (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

Zacarias Moussaoui proved to be about as effective a defense witness as he was a hijacker.

The 9/11 conspirator had planned to fly a hijacked airliner into the White House, but he got arrested before the attack and had to sit it out. Yesterday, fighting the death penalty in an Alexandria courtroom, he took the stand -- over his lawyers' strenuous objections -- and pretty much destroyed the defense his team had built.

He readily agreed that he was part of the 9/11 plot. "I was supposed to pilot a plane to hit the White House," he said, and he knew of the World Trade Center attacks but lied to prevent authorities from stopping them.

"You rejoiced in the fact that Americans were killed?" the prosecutor asked.

"That is correct," Moussaoui said, matter-of-factly.

You called the collapse of the twin towers "gorgeous"?

"Indeed."

You asserted that "3,000 miscreant disbelievers" burned in a "hellfire"?

"That is correct."

The terrorist's lawyers from the public defender's office knew they were undone. "All our hard work down the tubes," one of them lamented to reporters.

Moussaoui acted as if he were the villain on a TV detective show who, confronted with his crime, improbably confesses every detail of the plot -- even volunteering that in e-mails to his handlers he pretended he was writing to a girlfriend and called the attack a "bottle of champagne."

The terrorist gave the prosecutors just what they needed: evidence that his lies to investigators in August 2001 prevented them from thwarting the attack. Just as prosecution witnesses wound up aiding the defense earlier in the trial, Moussaoui was a gift to prosecutors. The Justice Department wants the death penalty; Moussaoui spoke like a man who wants martyrdom.

This led to a day-long role reversal in which Moussaoui's own lawyers tried to paint him as crazy. "I would suggest that he does not recognize the authority of the court," defense lawyer Gerald Zerkin pleaded to Judge Leonie M. Brinkema as the defendant donned an amused expression. "He would not be a competent witness."

Prosecutor Robert A. Spencer defended the accused. "It would be unfair to deny him the opportunity to testify," he argued.

In fact, Moussaoui seemed to be all too sane. He saved his outbursts -- "Victory for Moussaoui!" "God curse you, Zerkin!" -- for the moments just after the jury had left the room. When the jury was in, he was calm, looking more loser than monster.

In a green prison jumpsuit and white skullcap, Moussaoui wore an unkempt beard and several spare pounds, a look enhanced by the shock belt he must wear to prevent misbehavior. Dark circles surrounded his eyes, and two bruises colored his forehead -- likely the result of banging the floor during prayer. He carried a yellow legal pad with Post-its and a cardboard legal portfolio, and he spent the session stroking his beard and cracking his wrists. Only his refusal to stand for the judge and jury and his constant silent lip movements -- either prayer or muttering -- hinted at the anger within.

For a terrorist, Moussaoui was particular about his manners. He yawned at least 10 times, but made sure to cover his mouth. When Spencer asked if he had used an obscenity to describe America, Moussaoui replied: "Never! . . . The F-word? I never said such a thing."

He seemed to enjoy telling his war stories and explaining Islamic law. He professed that he used the alias "Shaquille" because it is a Muslim name, but also because of "Shaquille O'Neal the basketball player." He said Islam allows lying in three instances: in jihad, to bring reconciliation between Muslims, and in marriage, "if a wife asks her husband, 'Am I beautiful?' and she is 60 years old."

Brinkema, 61, smiled.

Moussaoui was intent on being heard. When his French-accented voice caused distortion in the speakers, marshals pulled the microphone away, but he invariably rolled his eyes and moved it closer. "That's too far," he protested at one point; even some of the victims' family members had to laugh.

He showed considerable modesty for a terrorist. He insisted he was "not a big shot" in al-Qaeda. He said he had trouble renewing his French passport because he had put it in a waterproof money belt that "was not so waterproof." And he admitted that his big mouth got him into trouble with al-Qaeda colleagues ("I had to meet directly with Sheik Osama").

But he spoke about his murderous intentions with chilling dispassion. Asked if he had been trained to cut a person's throat, he answered: "No, anybody can do that. . . . To cut the throat of somebody is not difficult."

The jurors, mostly a white, professional bunch, were rapt, staring at the defendant with wide eyes suggesting horror or disgust. Defense lawyers offered gallows smiles; they took few notes and raised few objections as their client spoke.

Zerkin, having little to work with, rambled on with extraneous questions about Moussaoui's past. The jury foreman yawned. One juror closed his eyes. Even Moussaoui, who had no place better to be, glanced at the clock. Spencer objected; Brinkema agreed.

"I think we're waaay beyond relevance," the judge said.

That was for certain. The relevant fact was that Moussaoui acted as though he would be pleased to die. When the prosecutor tried to get him to say that capital punishment would not constitute martyrdom, the terrorist replied: "It depends on if you fought to the best of your ability."

"So dying here would not get you to paradise?" Spencer pressed.

"I didn't say so," Moussaoui corrected.

"I believe in destiny," he added, to Zerkin's questioning. "I just have to speak the truth and God will take care of me." In the audience, family members muttered. A woman kicked the bench in front of her.

Sept. 11 Victim's Sister Watches Moussaoui (AP)

By Larry Neumeister

AP, March 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- The sister of a pilot whose hijacked plane struck the Pentagon on Sept. 11 says watching Zacarias Moussaoui's chilling testimony on Monday provided new information for families desperate for answers, yet only worsened their emotional wounds.

From a federal courthouse, Debra Burlingame watched the al-Qaida conspirator on a special video monitor set up for families of the victims of the attacks.

"This information is all new," said Burlingame, sister of American Airlines pilot Charles Burlingame.

"He's relaying incredible, incredible details which give insight into how Khalid Shaikh Mohammed was thinking, how Osama bin Laden was thinking," she said.

Mohammed was the mastermind of the plot; bin Laden is the terrorist network's leader.

Burlingame said she had read everything related to the attacks, including the footnotes in the official government report, but had never heard much of the information Moussaoui delivered from the witness stand.

Testifying at a trial to determine if he should be put to death, Moussaoui said that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid were supposed to hijack a fifth airplane and fly it into the White House during the attacks.

Sally Regenhard, whose firefighter son Christian was killed at the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, said she was not surprised by Moussaoui's testimony. "I was convinced that this man was only a heartbeat away from taking the controls of a plane," she said.

If Moussaoui had told investigators in August 2001 what he admitted in court on Monday, "at least there would have been a chance" to head off the attacks, Regenhard said.

She said she "felt very certain" that at least one of the plane attacks could have been thwarted if the work done by FBI field agents had been acted upon properly.

Burlingame shook her fists as she described testimony that the hijackers would have taken the planes into the ground if they had seen fighter planes in the air around them.

"My brother was a fighter pilot," she said.

Her voice cracked as she dwelled on a truth too painful to bear: "The cavalry never came. The cavalry never came."

Editorial: Execute Moussaoui? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022524

EVEN IF HE WAS SUPPOSED TO fly a plane into the White House on the evil morning of Sept. 11, as he testified in court Monday, Zacarias Moussaoui should not be executed. Even if he knew enough, sitting in jail on immigration charges, to have stopped the slaughter at the World Trade Center, at the Pentagon and in a Pennsylvania field, killing the 20th hijacker is actually a worse idea than executing most other murderers on death row.

Monday's dramatic testimony marked the first time Moussaoui has spoken publicly since that world-changing day when 19 hijackers used four planes to kill nearly 3,000 people in the worst attack on the continental United States. Hearing his voice was like picking a scab of a wound that will never heal. And it begs a series of what-ifs: What if the FBI had let its man in Minneapolis seek search warrants based on the French Muslim's curious desire for jumbo-jet training and his professed hatred for the U.S.? What if we could hear all of the witnesses testify, instead of suffering from their silence because a federal lawyer improperly coached many of them through their expected cross-examination?

The 19 hijackers are dead. But there is still Moussaoui. He knew. He helped. Shouldn't he die?

No, he should not. Many committed opponents of the death penalty want to carve out exceptions for mass murderers or those who attack or betray the nation writ large, such as Timothy McVeigh. But if you believe, as does this page, that the death penalty debases our society, the principle becomes all the more important when it is most tempting to ignore.

But for those who don't share that conviction, there are some more practical arguments.

Would-be suicide jihadists want to die in their struggle against us in the deluded belief that God will reward their murderous cowardice. Once they are in our custody, they lose the power to achieve that goal. Capital punishment gives them the martyrdom they crave, making them symbols of sacrifice to would-be followers rather than powerless, humiliated prisoners passing the decades alone and increasingly forgotten in a cell.

More important, if Moussaoui is indeed an important cog in a broad conspiracy, then he certainly has information that could potentially be useful both in further Sept. 11 investigations and in our fight against Al Qaeda, whether now or in 10 years. We may or may not get this information from him if he lives, although life in prison is a very long time. But we will certainly not get it from him if he dies.

And killing him would do nothing to stop future attacks or alleviate the loss of the past. That's the hard thing about the death penalty: The heart screams for retribution, but it is never enough. It is vengeance devoid of benefit.

Roberts Slams Spy Bill's Referral (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

Sen. Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican and chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, thinks that congressional officials were mistaken to send a bill on the president's program of warrantless counterterrorism surveillance to another panel.

"Chairman Roberts's strong position is that this decision was incorrect," said a senior committee staffer, who asked not to be named.

In practice, the decision will limit the input that the committee will have on the final shape of legislation.

The Senate parliamentarian, a little-known but influential official who makes decisions about the legislative procedure for Senate bills, referred Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine's Terrorist Surveillance Act of 2006 to the Senate Judiciary Committee, after much behind-the-scenes negotiations, according to other Senate aides.

The judiciary committee, which is also working on a very different bill dealing with the program drafted by its Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, plans a hearing today on the issue.

Judges from the secret court established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) will testify. Mr. Specter's proposal would give the court authority over the program, which officials have said monitors communications into and out of the United States in which one party to the call is suspected of links to al Qaeda or another terrorist group.

Observers said that because it gives the FISA court this role, the referral of Mr. Specter's bill to the Judiciary panel was a straightforward call. But the DeWine bill gives authority and oversight over the program to the intelligence panel.

"This is a piece of legislation about an intelligence activity, carried out by an intelligence agency, and where the only group of people fully briefed are members of an intelligence committee subcommittee and we didn't get referral," the intelligence committee staffer said.

The subcommittee, announced earlier this month by Mr. Roberts, has been fully briefed on the program and has visited the National Security Agency's Fort Meade headquarters, from which the program is run. The subcommittee, along with the program it was set up to oversee, would be given legislative approval by the bill, which is co-sponsored by Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina.

A spokesman for Mr. DeWine said that the referral was a matter for the parliamentarian and the Senate leadership.

"They work with the sponsors, but it is not our decision," said Mike Dawson, the senator's communications director.

The parliamentarian's office referred press inquiries to the office of the Senate secretary. No one from that office or the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, returned phone calls requesting comment.

In practice, the referral means that members and staff of the intelligence committee will have only a short time to work on whatever proposal emerges from Mr. Specter's panel -- 10 days, according to committee staff.

Justice Department Responds To Lawmakers' Wiretapping Probe (NJTD)

By Winter Casey, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, March 28, 2006

Democrat John Conyers of Michigan dismissed as evasive and unresponsive the late Friday response from the Justice Department to a House Judiciary Committee inquiry into the National Security Agency program of wiretaps without warrants.

Justice's response said the agency, through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, could have legally monitored confidential communications between doctors and patients or attorneys and their clients.

"Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception if they met" the program's criteria, the department said.

"The evasiveness of the department prevents Congress from exercising its constitutionally mandated oversight role and obstructs Congress' ability to draft meaningful legislation to provide guidelines for this activity," said Conyers, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary panel. "Some of the department's responses leave open the possibility that other surveillance programs exist with a scope far beyond this program."

In its answers to 45 separate questions posed by Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and committee Democrats, the department acknowledged that no previous administration had authorized electronic surveillance.

Marc Rotenberg, director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said there is an "obvious need for the oversight committees to pursue these requests."

Many legal rights are implicated when the administration conducts such surveillance within the United States, he said.

"The laws of the United States, both before and after FISA's enactment, have long permitted various forms of foreign intelligence surveillance, including the use of wiretaps, outside the procedures of FISA," the department said. "If the question is limited to 'electronic surveillance' as defined by FISA, however, we are unaware of such authorizations."

Justice would not reveal how many people in the United States have been wiretapped under the program. In response to inquiries by the committee, the department repeatedly characterized the information as "classified and sensitive," and said it could "not be revealed in this setting."

Robert Turner, associate director for the Center for National Security Law, said he believes "the president has an absolute right to deny national security secrets to Congress."

But the American Civil Liberties Union said it has been repeatedly frustrated by the department's refusal to answer basic questions about the wiretapping program.

"Knowing how many innocent Americans have had their privacy invaded by this lawless program is not an 'operational' secret. It's the very question a less partisan and more independent Congress asked and got answered in the 1970s," said Caroline Fredrickson, a director at the ACLU. "That's when Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to try to prevent warrant-less spying on Americans from happening again."

DOJ_NMG_0022526

On the other side of the debate, Paul Kamenar, an attorney with the Washington Legal Foundation, said, "We support the program as far as what has been publicly released."

The foundation plans to file a brief in favor of the Justice Department in a pending ACLU case on the issue.

High Court Case Tests Extent Of Presidential Powers In War (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court will hear an appeal today from a former driver for Osama bin Laden who is challenging the validity of President Bush's plan to try foreign terrorism suspects before military tribunals.

Besides testing a key part of the White House's legal strategy in the war on terrorism, the case has become an important barometer of judges' authority to review presidential actions during wartime.

Lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, who is awaiting trial by military tribunal at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, say Bush has claimed unprecedented power "to dispense life imprisonment and death through a judicial system of his own design."

Administration lawyers counter that the tribunals, first ordered by Bush two months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, reflect the president's broad authority to oversee war efforts. That authority, Bush lawyers say, is rooted largely in Congress' authorization of the use of military force within days of the attacks and includes decisions on how those captured by U.S. forces are tried.

The Hamdan dispute has been complicated by the Detainee Treatment Act, which Congress passed in December. An initial question for the justices is whether the act strips them of the power to consider Hamdan's basic claim about the validity of the tribunals that would be set up and run by the Pentagon.

The debate over presidential authority has been a persistent theme in cases arising from 9/11, as it is in court documents filed in the challenge brought by Hamdan, who is accused of terrorism conspiracy and is among 10 Guantanamo detainees who have been designated for trial by a military tribunal, or commission.

The case gives the Supreme Court its first chance to review the administration's legal war on terrorism since 2004, when the justices rejected the White House's stance that detainees' cases should be kept out of federal courts. In one case, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote that even in wartime, the Constitution "assuredly envisions a role for all three branches when individual liberties are at stake."

The court's lineup has changed since then. O'Connor, who was in the majority ruling that judges could hear detainees' cases, has retired. She was replaced by conservative Samuel Alito. John Roberts has taken over as chief justice for the late William Rehnquist, but Roberts has recused himself from the Hamdan case because he ruled on the matter — against Hamdan — as a member of a lower court.

With Roberts out of the case, there is a chance that the justices could tie 4-4. That would leave in place the lower court ruling but establish no national precedent.

"In 2004 the court said there is no such thing as unlimited executive power, even in wartime, but it left for another day the substantive rights any individuals have," says Deborah Pearlstein of the New York-based group Human Rights First. "This is really the Supreme Court's first opportunity to put meat on the bones of those rights."

Human Rights First is among dozens of groups opposing the tribunals, which have been suspended while the system is challenged in court. The groups say such a system must be explicitly authorized by Congress. Human Rights First also says the court should not allow tribunals to go forward without clarifying that evidence obtained by torture would be inadmissible.

Among those submitting briefs on the government's side were Edwin Meese, attorney general under President Reagan, and two former attorneys general who served under the first President Bush. They said the president needs a wide berth to devise a battle plan and that commissions are a matter of executive discretion in waging war, along the lines of troop strength.

Hamdan, a Yemeni, was picked up by the U.S. military in Afghanistan in late 2001 and sent to Guantanamo in 2002. Government lawyers say he delivered weapons and ammunition to al-Qaeda members and was aware that bin Laden and his associates had been involved in attacking the United States. In 2003, Bush designated Hamdan an "enemy combatant" to be tried by a military commission.

In the tribunals — the first in the USA since World War II — a detainee may not attend all proceedings or see all the evidence against him. A military prosecutor sets the rules, and the evidence used is not subject to the same procedural safeguards as in civilian or courts-martial proceedings.

Administration lawyers rely largely on Congress' resolution authorizing Bush to use “all necessary and appropriate force” against those responsible for the 9/11 attacks. They also cite parts of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the inherent powers of the president.

Hamdan's attorneys say that Congress' resolution does not cover military tribunals, and that the tribunals violate the military's Uniform Code and international rules for the treatment of prisoners. “Military commissions have served an important role in times of war,” says Georgetown University law professor Neal Katyal, Hamdan's lead attorney, but “this court has never before recognized the legitimacy of a commission except to the extent it has been specifically authorized by Congress.”

A recent Newsweek story reported on comments that Justice Antonin Scalia made in Switzerland on March 8, expressing skepticism about detainees' rights. Based on the story, a group of retired generals and admirals siding with Hamdan have asked Scalia to take himself out of the case.

It is not clear, however, that Scalia was addressing the Hamdan matter. Some of what he said echoed an opinion he wrote in 2004 in which he criticized the ruling that allowed detainees to sue in U.S. courts. Supreme Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg said Scalia had no comment.

Scalia's Recusal Sought In Key Detainee Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

On the eve of oral argument in a key Supreme Court case on the rights of alleged terrorists, a group of retired U.S. generals and admirals has asked Justice Antonin Scalia to recuse himself, arguing that his recent public comments on the subject make it impossible for him to appear impartial.

In a letter delivered to the court late yesterday, a lawyer for the retired officers cited news reports of Scalia's March 8 remarks to an audience at the University of Freiburg in Switzerland. Scalia reportedly said it was "crazy" to suggest that combatants captured fighting the United States should receive a "full jury trial," and dismissed suggestions that the Geneva Conventions might apply to detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Scalia's remarks "give rise to the unfortunate appearance that, even before briefing was complete, he had already made up his mind" about issues in the case, the lawyer, David H. Remes, wrote. Noting that Scalia reportedly had discussed the rights of accused terrorists in the context of his son Matthew's recent tour as an Army officer in Iraq, Remes wrote that this creates an appearance of "personal bias arising from his son's military service."

The case to be heard today -- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld , No. 05-184 -- is one of the most important terrorism-related cases to reach the court. It is a challenge by Osama bin Laden's former chauffeur, now being held at Guantanamo Bay, to the legality of the military commission that seeks to try him for war crimes. Military trials for terrorist suspects are a centerpiece of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism policy, but they have been criticized by human rights activists, especially in Europe.

The retired officers are Brig. Gen. David M. Brahms, Brig Gen. James P. Cullen, Vice Adm. Lee F. Gunn, Rear Adm. John D. Hutson and Rear Adm. Donald J. Guter. They have filed a friend of the court brief in the case opposing the military commissions, on the grounds that denying Geneva Conventions protections to detainees at Guantanamo Bay could result in their denial to U.S. troops by their captors abroad. Scalia's speech was first reported by Newsweek's Web site on Sunday.

Newsweek quoted Scalia as describing European reaction to Guantanamo Bay as "hypocritical."

In his letter to the court, Remes said Scalia's reported reference to the Geneva Conventions was of particular concern to the retired officers as it is directly at issue in the case. Their brief supports the view of the petitioner, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, that the conventions apply to him and could entitle him to a court-martial trial like that which U.S. soldiers receive.

Other calls for Scalia's recusal came yesterday from the Center for Constitutional Rights, a civil rights organization that supports the challenge to the military commissions, and from Rep. John D. Conyers (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee.

Court rules say that justices must recuse in cases where their impartiality "might reasonably be questioned." But it is up to each justice to make that decision. Court analysts said yesterday it is unlikely Scalia will recuse from the case.

This is the third time in recent years Scalia has faced pressure to recuse. In 2004, he recused from a case on the constitutionality of the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, after speaking out on the case at a rally in Virginia.

Last year, he faced calls for his recusal from a case involving Vice President Cheney after it became public that they had gone duck hunting together. In that case, Scalia refused to step aside.

Scalia's Remarks On Detainees Raise Recusal Questions (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 28, 2006

On the eve of landmark arguments in a case asserting the legal rights of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia was asked Monday to step aside from the case because of remarks he made earlier this month on the issue.

Authors of a major amicus curiae brief on the side of Guantanamo detainee Salim Hamdan said Scalia's remarks during a speech in Switzerland "give rise to the appearance that, even before briefing in this case was complete, the justice had made up his mind about the merits."

The letter seeking recusal was sent to Supreme Court clerk William Suter late Monday with the request that it be passed on to Scalia. According to Court custom, a request for a justice's recusal is addressed to the individual justice, not to the full Court, because it is the justice's decision alone whether or not to recuse. No immediate response from the justice was forthcoming, making it likely that Scalia's recusal decision will not be known until arguments begin Tuesday, and Scalia either remains seated or gets up and leaves the Court chamber. At a Supreme Court Historical Society event at the Court Monday night that featured Scalia, he made no comment about the controversy.

Covington & Burling partner David Remes wrote the recusal letter on behalf of five retired generals and admirals whose brief he filed in the case Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, set for argument Tuesday. The military officials argue in their brief that American soldiers will be in jeopardy if the United States does not handle Guantanamo detainees according to the Geneva conventions.

"War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts," Scalia was quoted as saying during March 8 remarks in Switzerland. "Give me a break."

Scalia's comments were first reported over the weekend on Newsweek's Web site and on Scotusblog.com. Newsweek also quoted Michael Ratner of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, as saying, "This is clearly grounds for recusal." Georgetown University Law Center professor Neal Katyal, who will argue the case Tuesday on behalf of Hamdan, has not commented on the recusal issue.

The topic of Scalia's talk was, "Does the U.S. legal system work?" and it was delivered at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland, where Scalia spent his junior year abroad nearly 50 years ago as an undergraduate at Georgetown University. Though some reports indicated it was a private talk, a university press release beforehand said the public was invited, and a videotape of the talk does not appear to have been made surreptitiously.

The remarks that veered close to the Hamdan case came during the question-and-answer period afterward.

"Foreigners, in foreign countries, have no rights under the American Constitution," Scalia was quoted as saying. "Nobody has ever thought otherwise."

Without apparently specifying to whom he was referring, Scalia also said, "If he was captured by my Army on a battlefield, that is where he belongs. I had a son on that battlefield, and they were shooting at my son. And I am not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean, it's crazy."

Scalia's son Matthew served in Iraq as an Army captain with the First Armored Division. The young Scalia, a 1995 graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, wrote about his experiences in the Oct. 25, 2004, issue of Legal Times.

Remes' letter makes reference to Scalia's family connection to the war, suggesting that Justice Scalia's remarks "create the appearance of personal bias arising from his son's military service in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0022529

Three years ago, remarks Scalia made in public got him in similar trouble, this time in a case challenging inclusion of the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance. Scalia criticized the lower court ruling that said public-school children should not be forced to recite the pledge as written. He recused himself from the case at the request of California atheist Michael Newdow, who had brought the case before the court.

Edward Whelan, a former Scalia law clerk who heads the Ethics and Public Policy Center, said in a column on National Review Online on Sunday that the two situations were different. Whereas Scalia had commented on the actual Pledge of Allegiance ruling that was being appealed to his Court, his comments about enemy combatants were more general, not focused on the specific case before him, in Whelan's view.

Top Law Firms Join Forces In Landmark Detainee Case (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 28, 2006

When the U.S. Supreme Court hears arguments today in a landmark dispute over executive power in wartime, the Bush administration will be outnumbered -- if not outgunned.

Many of the nation's top law firms have signed briefs against the government and in support of Salim Hamdan, the detainee who allegedly served as chauffeur to Osama bin Laden and who is being detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

More than three dozen briefs have been filed on Hamdan's side, largely arguing that the military tribunals established by the White House to try the detainees are illegal. By contrast, only a handful of briefs have been filed on the other side, backing the administration's expansive view of executive authority.

The briefs in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld have flooded in to such a degree that, with the approval of the Court clerk's office, their covers carry small captions summarizing the topic discussed within, an innovation aimed at helping justices and their law clerks keep them straight.

The covers also carry the names of the big-ticket New York, Washington, D.C., and other national law firms that are bringing their muscle to bear, from Cravath, Swaine & Moore to Covington & Burling to Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld to Jones Day.

"The blue-chip firms are all in this case, and it's the senior partners who are involved very often," said David Remes, the Covington partner who coordinated the amicus curiae effort for Hamdan. "This is not a tousle-haired, wild-eyed group of lawyers."

Adds New York University Law School professor Burt Neuborne, who also filed a brief for Hamdan: "This is not noblesse oblige by the big firms. It is an extraordinary no-confidence vote by the establishment bar in what the administration is trying to do here."

Neuborne said the only recent parallel was the effort 50 years ago by New York firms to help desegregate public schools.

President George W. Bush ordered the creation of the military commissions two months after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, basing the order on his powers as commander-in-chief and on the congressional authorization of military force passed after the attacks.

Hamdan was captured in Afghanistan in November 2001, then transferred to Guantanamo. In 2004 he was referred to a military commission to be tried on conspiracy charges. The administration claims Mr. Hamdan, as bin Laden's driver, delivered weapons to al Qaeda members and was aware of bin Laden's role in the 9/11 attacks.

Hamdan filed a habeas petition challenging the commission procedure, arguing it violated the Uniform Code of Military Justice and the Geneva Conventions.

A panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ruled against him.

The nearly united front among the nation's legal elite against the White House has not gone unnoticed by the administration. In remarks at a press conference at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base earlier this month, the Defense Department's chief prosecutor for the military commissions there, Air Force Colonel Moe Davis, said it was "ironic" that big law firms representing large defense contractors such as Boeing Corp. allow their lawyers to represent Guantanamo detainees pro bono.

DOJ_NMG_0022530

Miami lawyer Neal Sonnett, the American Bar Association's observer in Guantanamo, said when he heard the comment he took immediate exception, saying at a press conference that if it was meant to intimidate law firms, "it was beneath Colonel Davis' rank and status."

Sonnett, a former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, added, "These lawyers and their firms are true patriots."

Some who heard Davis' remarks thought he was referring specifically to Perkins Coie, the Seattle firm that has represented Hamdan from the beginning of his challenge to his detention in 2004. Perkins Coie is one of several law firms employed by Boeing, and one of the firm's lawyers will be at the counsel table when Georgetown University Law Center professor Neal Katyal argues Hamdan's case before the Court.

"If it was directed at us, it was out of line," said Perkins Coie partner Harry Schneider Jr., who has taken the lead in the firm's representation of Hamdan. Schneider said the firm has never heard negative feedback from any client about its representation of Hamdan.

He said when the firm first was approached to take the case, it was handled like any other pro bono proposal and was cleared with firm partners.

"It looked like a case where someone needed representation," he said.

As the case proceeded, eventually transferring from the Western District of Washington to Washington, D.C., its magnitude grew.

"It goes to the foundation of our system," said Schneider. "These people were taken into custody and hadn't been given an opportunity to defend themselves."

Remes of Covington Burling said he thinks that is why so many large firms -- or at least committed lawyers within those firms -- were drawn to the case.

"It sounds clichéd, but it's true; this case is about the rule of law," said Remes. "This is a power play by the administration to escape meaningful judicial review."

He said his firm did not hesitate about his involvement in the case and in defending Guantanamo detainees.

Remes sees a direct link to his work from that of Covington partner Charles Horsky, who represented Fred Korematsu in the 1944 Supreme Court case on the wartime internment of Japanese-Americans.

Neuborne too points to a long tradition of major law firms representing the unpopular.

"Wendell Willkie was representing communists and aliens in World War II," he said, referring to the one-time presidential candidate and partner in the New York firm now known as Willkie Farr & Gallagher.

But Neuborne sees the Guantanamo effort as different, and more widespread.

"The centrist establishment bar has rallied to this as a defining issue," he said. "The government has gone too far."

STAYING ON MESSAGE

Some lawyers on the side of the detainees caution against misinterpreting their advocacy for the detainees.

"This has nothing to do with 9/11 or supporting terrorism," said Paul Saunders, a Cravath partner who wrote a brief in Hamdan. "This case raises probably more fundamental issues of jurisprudence than any other case I can think of -- whether the president has the power to create a parallel system of courts that is self-executing."

Saunders, a former JAG officer in the Vietnam War, said the political implications of going up against the administration in Hamdan "were not an issue for us, not even considered."

Shearman & Sterling partner Thomas Wilner also asserts: "I'm not a wimp on terrorists. I think they should be hung ... if they find them."

Wilner is not directly involved in Hamdan, but he represented 12 Kuwaiti detainees who won Rasul v. Bush in 2004. He also argued on behalf of detainees before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit on March 22 over whether the new Detainee Treatment Act strips federal court jurisdiction over pending detainee cases -- a looming issue in Hamdan, as well.

Wilner said the detainees' Kuwaiti families hired his firm and wanted to pay for the representation, but the firm has donated the fees to a 9/11-related foundation. He said at first the firm took a lot of heat for its role, but that has since dissipated. "We are standing up for a basic principle -- the rule of law that has meant, since the Magna Carta, some form of independent review."

One reason for all the briefs on Hamdan's side is the myriad of issues that have come together in the litigation. There are threshold issues that could derail the case entirely, such as abstention -- that is, the proposition that federal courts should steer clear of Hamdan's case until after he actually goes through the military commission process.

Then, too, there are delicate issues of international law, including the relevance of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, which lay out rules for handling prisoners of war -- and which the administration says do not create an individually enforceable right for the detainees to challenge their captivity. Remes' brief filed on behalf of former U.S. military officials argues that if the United States ignores Geneva rules, U.S. soldiers will be at risk at the hands of enemies.

'CHARMING BETSY'

Some briefs reach back centuries to bolster Hamdan's position. In one filing, Christopher Wright of Harris, Wiltshire & Grannis in Washington focused exclusively on the 1804 case Murray v. The Schooner Charming Betsy, in which Chief Justice John Marshall first enunciated the view that federal statutes should be interpreted to comport with international law.

"The Court back then thought it was relatively uncontroversial to look at international law in construing our statutes," said Wright.

Another brief by Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe discusses how the United States, in combating Barbary pirates 200 years ago, abided by international law and custom.

But the biggest issue that has captured the attention of lawyers in the case recently is the impact of the Detainee Treatment Act, the statute argued last week in the D.C. Circuit.

Passed last fall, the law establishes a new review mechanism for detainees' status, which, according to the government, strips the Supreme Court of jurisdiction over the Hamdan case. Senator Carl Levin, D-Mich., one of the co-sponsors of the law, insists it does not apply to pending cases, but the other sponsors, Senators Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., argue otherwise.

The Court could decide that this issue, which has not yet been ruled on by any other court, needs more scrutiny and warrants sending the case back to lower courts.

Baker Botts filed a brief for Senators Graham and Kyl, one of the few private firms weighing in on the side of the administration. Partner Jeffrey Lamken said he too has been struck by the large number of firms in the case, which he describes as "a good thing."

But Lamken, a veteran of the solicitor general's office, said it is not uncommon for the government to rise before the Court with few amici at its side.

"I feel no loneliness," he said.

Bin Laden's Driver Gets Day In Court, An Opportunity Missed (USAT)

USA Today, March 28, 2006

Tuesday should be a banner day for U.S. efforts to polish its international image as a beacon of democracy and justice for all: Osama bin Laden's former driver is getting his day in court. (Related: Opposing view)

That's right. Salim Ahmed Hamdan, one-time chauffeur for the al-Qaeda zealot who inspired the 9/11 attacks, is getting his case heard. Not just by any court, but by the U.S. Supreme Court. What better example to show the world the individual rights enjoyed in America.

Unfortunately, the Bush administration, with its insistence on absolute power for the executive branch, has managed to blow this opportunity to win hearts and minds abroad. Administration lawyers will argue Tuesday that Hamdan has almost no rights. Worse, the government contends that the Supreme Court has no right to be hearing his case.

Hamdan, thought to be in his mid-30s, has become a high-profile pawn in the administration's stubborn contention that it doesn't have to answer to anyone — not Congress, not the courts and not international treaties and organizations — in its pursuit of the war on terror. The administration asserts the right to unilaterally designate individuals as "enemy combatants" and hold them prisoner indefinitely, possibly forever.

Hamdan, like nearly 500 others in this category, is still incarcerated at the prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. He is unusual in that he had a direct link to bin Laden. A former taxi driver with a fourth-grade education in his native Yemen, he is one of just 10 detainees who have actually been charged with terrorism and war crimes.

Whether he's a terrorist collaborator or a flunky who was swept off the battlefield in Afghanistan is hard to determine. The details of his supposed offenses are unknown. His lawyers say he was one of several prisoners seized by Afghan warlords in the chaos of the U.S. sweep against al-Qaeda and the Taliban in November 2001 and sold to the Americans for a $5,000 bounty.

The Supreme Court is not being asked to determine Hamdan's guilt or innocence. Rather, the major legal issue facing the high court is whether the president had the authority in the wake of 9/11 to resurrect a World War II system of military tribunals to try enemy prisoners — a setup in which the executive branch alone serves as judge, prosecutor and jury; rules of evidence are one-sided; and the accused and his lawyers don't even have the right to know what the evidence is.

The administration lost in 2004 when it failed to persuade the Supreme Court that Guantanamo prisoners have no right to challenge their detentions in U.S. courts. It now claims that the disputed language in a law passed by Congress in December effectively overturned the 2004 decision, and that the high court doesn't even have the right to intervene.

The court didn't try to tell the administration in 2004 how to handle the Guantanamo prisoners, and it didn't say they should have the same legal rights as U.S. citizens do. But it did establish the principle that, in the USA, no administration should expect to be exempt from judicial review of how it treats prisoners under its control.

The message from the Supreme Court Tuesday could have been a shining slice of the democratic ideal: the rule of law by an independent judiciary, a concept sacred to the Founding Fathers and a model for the world. Instead, Tuesday's hearing projects the image of an administration that has botched the handling of prisoner issues and given the USA a black eye internationally in the process.

Don't Forget We're At War (USAT)

By Richard Samp

USA Today, March 28, 2006

Those who have challenged the legality of the administration's policy of indefinitely detaining enemy combatants in our war against al-Qaeda have begun to face up to a harsh reality: The courts have by and large upheld the policy. They have rejected efforts aimed at closing down the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay and upheld the president's decision to convene military commissions to try some of the detainees as war criminals. (Related: Our view)

So now critics are taking a new tack. They argue that even if the administration is acting within the law, we ought to abandon the policy because it's not the right thing to do. They apparently want detainees either to be charged with crimes in our regular criminal courts or else set free.

That simply is no way to fight a war. In response to the 9/11 attacks that killed thousands of Americans, our military has rounded up hundreds of al-Qaeda fighters. By holding these enemy combatants in custody for the duration of hostilities, the military is preventing them from renewing the attack and is operating the way every army operates. Given the manner of their capture, for many of the detainees it is unlikely that the military could meet the evidentiary standards required for conviction in a regular criminal court. But armies have never been held to that standard.

Moreover, every detainee who has protested his innocence has been afforded a hearing before a military tribunal. The tribunals have ordered the release of all those for whom there was not substantial evidence demonstrating their enemy combatant status. So there is little danger that the Guantanamo detainees include non-combatants who were mistakenly taken into custody.

Military commissions to bring war crimes charges against the most dangerous detainees have a pedigree that dates back to the Revolutionary War. The need for such commissions — an alternative to regular criminal trials that both provides flexibility and protects sensitive information from unwarranted disclosure — is well illustrated by the ongoing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, who is awaiting sentencing for his part in the 9/11 plot. Proceedings in that trial have been delayed for years by the types of procedural obstacles that can be avoided in trials before military commissions.

Activists Want Ruling Open In Terror Case (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- A civil liberties group asked an appeals court on Monday to force a federal judge to unseal a ruling he made in a terrorism case regarding the government's warrantless wiretapping program.

The judge's sealing of the ruling without an explanation is unprecedented, the New York Civil Liberties Union said.

"Courts do not have authority to issue entire opinions in secret," the group said.

The group's submission to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals came in the case of two Muslims accused of supporting terrorism. The NYCLU asked to intervene three days after defense lawyers for the men asked the same appeals court to say the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret.

The two men -- Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member -- are accused of laundering money in 2003-04 for an FBI informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer.

The mosque was raided by federal agents in August 2004 following a yearlong sting aimed at Aref.

The defense lawyers argued that charges against their clients should be tossed out and evidence from wiretaps should be suppressed because illegal wiretaps may have been used.

The NYCLU noted in its papers that the judge rejected the defendants' suppression motion less than two hours after the government on March 10 submitted a secret court document opposing it.

The judge's classified ruling leaves his reasons secret, and an after-hours call to his clerk's office Monday wasn't immediately returned.

The NYCLU said the First Amendment requires U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy in Albany to make public his ruling and the government's submission or to find a narrowly tailored response to the need to protect classified national security information.

The NYCLU asked the appeals court to order the judge to release his opinion publicly with redactions only to the extent necessary to protect classified information.

"It's not a surprise that the government wants this to be secret, but it's extraordinary for a court to go along," said Chris Dunn, NYCLU associate legal director.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William C. Pericek declined to comment.

Countering Confessions Will Be Key To Defense In Lodi Terror Case (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 28, 2006

SACRAMENTO - Attorneys for a father and son charged in a federal terrorism probe will open their defense this week, and among their biggest challenges will be persuading jurors that they should not believe their own eyes.

The government's case against Umer Hayat and his son, Hamid, is built partially on separate confessions they gave to FBI agents. The statements were videotaped and played to jurors.

"Overcoming a confession in the best of circumstances is a difficult hurdle," said Steven Drizin, legal director of the Center on Wrongful Convictions at the Northwestern University School of Law.

The Hayats are charged with lying about whether the younger man attended an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan in 2003. Hamid Hayat, 23, also is charged with providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp.

The defense has pointed out that the government has no firm evidence that Hamid Hayat ever attended such a camp and is expected to say that both men confessed under pressure to something they didn't do. In doing so, the defense lawyers hope to show that the confessions are meaningless.

Johnny Griffin III, who is defending Umer Hayat, said confessions are worthless if there is no crime.

DOJ_NMG_0022534

"Say a person walks into the FBI office and says, 'I just robbed a Bank of America at 4th and G in Sacramento.' The government still has to prove, Number 1, that there is a Bank of America at 4th and G, and Number 2, that it was robbed. Only then can they say that there's a valid confession to a crime," Griffin said.

He said prosecutors have to prove that Hamid Hayat attended a specific terrorist training camp in Pakistan and that his father knew about it.

"If you can't show the (criminal) conduct took place, the case is over," he said.

Umer Hayat confessed, Griffin said, "because he was psychologically bullied and emotionally pressured." Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, offers a similar explanation for her client's confession.

The Hayats have been in federal custody since their arrest last June, shortly after Hamid Hayat returned home to the Central Valley agricultural town of Lodi after a two-year trip to Pakistan. They are being tried together before separate juries.

Hamid Hayat, who worked part time in a fruit-packing shed, faces three counts of lying to the FBI by denying he went to the camp and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver, is charged with two counts of making false statements to the FBI when he denied knowing of the training camps or that his son attended one. He faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted.

Their videotaped confessions are a central part of the government's case. Prosecutors also have introduced jihadist literature found at the Hayat home and transcripts pulled from hundreds of hours of audiotapes secretly recorded by a government informant.

The confessions came during several hours of interrogation at the FBI's regional headquarters in Sacramento. The videotapes capture parts of those sessions and show the men looking tired and providing statements that often are conflicting.

Their attorneys say the confessions actually are nothing more than both men agreeing to leading questions posed by FBI agents and were given only after they were worn down. They have said the Hayats were only telling the agents what they thought they wanted to hear.

Prosecutors are expected to rest their side of the case on Wednesday. The balancing act for the defense will be to convince jurors that the Hayats falsely confessed without reinforcing prosecutors' contention that the men are liars.

Undermining a confession means "you have to attack your own client," said Laurie Levenson, a former federal prosecutor and professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. "It's better for him to be known as a liar than a terrorist."

A juror who was removed from the case last week suggested there was hope for the defense's strategy.

Former juror Andrea Clabaugh said she believed Hamid Hayat's confession was not convincing.

"I don't find the FBI interrogation damning. I felt like the FBI was leading," said Clabaugh, 39, who heard most of the government's case before her dismissal. "Hamid was worn out and tired, and I could easily see where someone in that situation would tell (FBI agents) what they wanted to hear so they would be done."

Even so, legal experts said confessions tend to resonate with juries. Some jurors might find it difficult to believe that an innocent suspect would freely admit an association with terrorists, said William Portanova, who spent 17 years as a state and federal prosecutor.

"It is unlikely that an innocent person would just turn the facts on their heads and declare themselves to be an international terrorist and describe the locations where they trained," said Portanova, who now is a defense attorney but is not involved in the Hayat case.

The defense lawyers are likely to note that FBI agents only began videotaping the interrogations after the Hayats began cooperating, said Drizin, of Northwestern. They also could focus on the inconsistencies in the Hayats' statements, particularly where the confessions don't match reality.

Hamid Hayat's descriptions of the camp and its location varied widely during his interrogation. Umer Hayat's account of a camp that prosecutors say he toured seems fantastic. On the FBI videotape, Umer Hayat described the camp as an enormous underground basement where he witnessed hundreds of trainees twirling swords, firing automatic weapons and pole-vaulting subterranean streams.

"The hallmark of a false confession is where the confession did not fit with the knowable, verifiable facts of the crime," Drizin said.

Moreover, the Hayats' attorneys must be careful not to overemphasize that their clients were lying when they confessed, Portanova said.

"That's the conundrum here for the defense attorneys: They're charged with lying, and the defense is they're liars," Portanova said.

Workers Surveyed On Detainee Abuse (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

American soldiers, contractors and civilians who worked in the Abu Ghraib prison and at other U.S. military detention facilities have begun receiving detailed questionnaires from Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, about the use of severe interrogation tactics and the military chain of command's role in their implementation.

The move to conduct the surveys, signed by Levin, came after Democrats failed to persuade Congress to conduct its own investigation of detainee abuse in the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. Democrats and some Republicans on the Senate panel have expressed concerns about whether high-level officers have been held adequately accountable for abusive interrogation approaches.

Levin has directed the committee's minority staff to ask questions of hundreds of people who worked in detention facilities to assess where the tactics originated and how they were applied -- an approach the full committee has not endorsed.

The first wave of letters was sent in recent weeks to about 50 military intelligence and military police soldiers who were affiliated with Abu Ghraib in Iraq, including some who were implicated in the abuse, according to congressional staff members familiar with the investigation. Separate questionnaires are being developed for people who worked at detention facilities at Bagram, Afghanistan; Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and locations in Iraq, including at Qaim, where an Iraqi general was killed during an interrogation in November 2003.

"Consistent with the Senate Armed Services Committee's ongoing oversight responsibilities, an examination is being conducted into U.S. policies, practices and activities relating to the detention and interrogation of detainees in U.S. custody," the first letter reads. The investigation will look at detainees' "alleged mistreatment by U.S. personnel, the factors that may have contributed to such mistreatment, and the accountability of officials for policies, actions, or failures to act, which may have contributed to detainee abuse."

The letter poses 19 questions, including who authorized tactics such as isolation, nudity, sleep manipulation, the use of dogs, stress positions and placing detainees in female underwear. It also requests descriptions of how Army Special Forces soldiers, contractors and "other government agencies" -- usually a euphemism for the CIA -- may have ordered or directed mistreatment.

Pentagon officials said they consider such an investigation unwarranted because there have been more than a dozen inquiries into detainee abuse and several subsequent criminal prosecutions and administrative punishments for soldiers who broke the rules.

"I would hope that nobody is suggesting that they don't have the trust and confidence in our senior military officers who have conducted these investigations and of our commanders who are charged with carrying out their responsibilities under the Uniform Code of Military Justice," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman. "It would be a terrible disservice if there was a survey that neglected the thousands of dedicated service members who clearly understood their responsibilities and carried out detention and interrogation operations in a professional and humane manner."

Levin had hinted at the survey effort last month in two Senate hearings. On Feb. 15, he said he had "initiated a fact-finding effort to fill in some gaps in the investigations into detainee abuses and to examine issues of accountability for policies, practices and activities that may have contributed to such a mistreatment." He complained that a lack of accountability above the level of enlisted soldiers was "stunning" and "unacceptable" in a hearing the week before.

Levin and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, intend to call Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller, former commander at Guantanamo Bay, and Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the top military intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, to testify about their roles in using the severe tactics, according to John Ullyot, a spokesman for Warner.

Last week, in a court-martial that convicted a dog handler of using his dog to frighten detainees at Abu Ghraib, Pappas testified that he approved the use of dogs during an interrogation of a high-value detainee in late 2003. He said he learned about the tactic from an advisory group that Miller had brought to Iraq. Miller invoked his right not to testify at the court-martial.

"The examination's goal is to get information back that could be used to extend further inquiries to higher-up people," said a member of Levin's staff who spoke anonymously because he was not authorized to discuss the matter.

Gary Myers, an attorney for former staff sergeant Ivan L. "Chip" Frederick, a military police soldier sentenced to more than eight years in prison for abuse at Abu Ghraib, said his client received one of Levin's questionnaires.

"I not only welcome this, I have been encouraging an independent inquiry since April 2004," Myers said. "It's about time."

Bomber Of 1982 Flight Gets 7 Years (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

Judge Reluctantly Grants Prosecutors' Request for Leniency

Almost a quarter of a century after his bomb killed a teenager aboard a Pan Am flight bound for Honolulu, Mohammed Rashed was sentenced for the crime yesterday in federal court.

But in the complicated world of counterterrorism, saving lives is sometimes weighed against avenging deaths, and that is why Rashed, having agreed to cooperate with investigators, was ordered to spend just seven more years behind bars.

The 59-year-old Jordanian-born Palestinian has been in U.S. custody for eight years. He previously spent eight years in custody in Greece, where he was captured and tried, and two more detained in Egypt. When he is released in 2013 and deported, he will have spent about 25 years in custody.

But after listening yesterday to the words of some of the people who were aboard Flight 830, where Rashed admittedly took one life and was trying to take many more in the Aug. 11, 1982, attack, U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth was troubled by the prospect of imposing such a short sentence on a man who had scarred so many people.

Lamberth accepted Rashed's secret December 2002 guilty plea to conspiracy and murder charges, just over a year after the Sept. 11 attacks. The plea, he said yesterday in court, "was less troubling" then.

Rashed had been a member of a pro-Palestinian group that in the 1980s undertook a terrorist campaign against U.S. and Israeli interests, according to prosecutors. The group, known as the 15th of May for the date in 1948 when the first Arab-Israeli War began, was based in Iraq, with operatives around the world.

By the time Rashed was brought to the United States in 1998, he had already been in custody for a decade. But prosecutors believed he could still help them. For the past three years, with his plea under seal, Rashed has been providing significant assistance, Justice Department prosecutors Scott J. Glick and Kenneth C. Kohl told Lamberth yesterday.

They did not elaborate in court about Rashed's cooperation, but after the sentencing they said that among the investigations he has aided is one in which a foreign government was able to charge two people in connection with a bombing that killed a 4-year-old girl.

But Lamberth said he was having a hard time reconciling that aid with statements in court yesterday from people aboard the flight and the sadness of the Japanese family whose teenage son died in the bomb blast.

Toru Ozawa was sitting in seat 47K -- the seat under which Rashed had secreted a bomb during the first leg of the plane's journey, from Baghdad to Tokyo. Rashed, his companion and their child left the plane in Tokyo. Ozawa and his family, bound for a vacation in Hawaii, got on.

When the bomb exploded about 140 miles outside Honolulu, Ozawa was killed and 15 other passengers were injured. As he watched his son dying before him, Shigetsugu Ozawa wanted his own life to end, too.

"At the time, my honest emotion was to wish the plane would crash into the Hawaiian ocean as I had lost the will to live since my son was no longer alive," the father, who was too ill to travel to the United States for the sentencing, said in a written statement read by the government.

Lamberth wondered aloud about what he should do. "I'm struggling with what options the court has," he said.

It is up to the executive branch, and not the courts, to wage the war on terrorism, he said. But, Lamberth said, he still must weigh all the interests involved. Glick said the government, too, had wrestled with those issues and ultimately decided the proposed sentence was the right course of action.

After hearing from Rashed's lawyer and from Rashed, who, through a translator, said he was "very, very sorry," Lamberth agreed, "with some trepidation" to impose the sentence.

Jordanian Sentenced In 1982 Plane Bombing (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Jordanian terrorist was sentenced Friday to another seven years in prison in connection with a bombing that killed a Japanese teenager aboard a Pan Am flight in 1982.

The sentencing of Mohammed Rashed was delayed for several years because he was locked up in prisons in Greece and Africa before being turned over to the FBI.

Rashed served eight years in prison in Greece after authorities there refused to extradite him to the United States. He was tried by the Greek courts twice for murdering the teenager.

After his release, he traveled to Africa where he was taken into custody and eventually turned over to the FBI and brought to the United States.

In all, Rashed will have served 25 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth sentenced Rashed to remain locked up until March 2013 and pay $116,525 to the Japanese teenager's parents.

In a secret U.S. District Court hearing here in 2002, Rashed pleaded guilty to murder and conspiracy and promised to cooperate with U.S. authorities investigating al-Qaida and other terrorists.

Rashed was a member of the "15 May" terrorist group formed in 1979 to bring attention to Palestinian demands for a homeland in the Middle East. U.S. authorities believe the now-defunct group was responsible for five bombings in the early 1980s.

On Aug. 11, 1982, Rashed planted a bomb on Pan Am Flight 830, which was traveling from Tokyo to Honolulu. The explosion killed the Japanese teenager and injured several other passengers. Rashed's two accomplices remain fugitives.

Court On Trial As Justices Weigh Military Tribunals, A Guantanamo Tale (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

Four years ago, a Muslim convert from Chicago and another from London set out from Karachi, Pakistan, intent on terrorism in America, the U.S. government says. The two were stopped at the Karachi airport for problems with their papers. Then their paths diverged.

The Chicagoan, Jose Padilla, was arrested when he arrived at O'Hare airport, accused of plotting to explode a radioactive "dirty bomb," and jailed without charge as an "enemy combatant." The result is a civil-liberties storm that has twice reached the Supreme Court. It is a flash point in the debate over executive power, individual rights and homeland security that has smoldered since Sept. 11, 2001.

The other Muslim convert wasn't a U.S. citizen. And his path, he asserts in an account provided by one of his lawyers, has led to a Moroccan torture cell, imprisonment at Guantanamo, Cuba, and a proceeding to be held in a secretive military court created by order of President Bush after Sept. 11.

The identity of this second inmate, even his existence, largely escaped notice. The announcement of Mr. Padilla's arrest in 2002 by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft made no reference to a second man. His existence was briefly mentioned two years later at a news conference on the Padilla case, although then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey said this prisoner's name was classified.

But last November, after the Defense Department quietly listed five Guantanamo prisoners newly approved for military trials, the name of the alleged accomplice of Mr. Padilla could be pinpointed. He is Binyam Mohamed, a 27-year-old who was born in Ethiopia, lived for a time in America and moved to London in his teens. His story, which is impossible to verify, is that he was tortured and told by his captors what they wanted him to say.

The profound constitutional issues these murky events raise are now coming to the fore. The Supreme Court today will hear arguments over the validity of the military commissions set up to try prisoners at Guantanamo. Lawyers for the prisoners will argue they are illegal. The government will say the president has inherent power to create such commissions and that traditional laws of war give prisoners accused of war crimes limited rights.

Adding to the constitutional confusion, the justices face administration claims that a law known as the Graham-Levin Amendment, which provides limited legal rights to Guantanamo prisoners, strips the Supreme Court of jurisdiction over the military-commissions case. One of the amendment's authors, Democratic Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, says the law does no such thing.

Then next week, proceedings in such a commission are to begin against Mr. Mohamed. The proceedings in his case and Mr. Padilla's underscore the contrasts between traditional law and special military trials in addressing the modern scourge of terrorism.

With Mr. Padilla, the administration acknowledges it can't use some evidence because it was collected while the Chicagoan was held without charge and denied the rights to have a lawyer and avoid self-incrimination.

The military-tribunal system doesn't bar such evidence. Advocates say it may be the only way a suspect can be held to account for a plot with alleged al Qaeda ties, because a civilian trial might entitle the defendant to subpoena al Qaeda leaders the U.S. holds abroad -- exposing intelligence sources and methods. But critics say such a military proceeding comes at the cost of a fair trial, and that this cost is too high. A military-commission trial, they warn, risks countenancing evidence extracted by torture.

The commissions are panels of four or more military officers, one a lawyer, and held at Guantanamo. The public can't attend, in contrast to civilian trials, but the Pentagon flies in a handful of reporters to file accounts, unless the presiding officer deems the information too sensitive.

A five-page charge sheet accuses Mr. Mohamed of conspiring, along with Mr. Padilla, with al Qaeda leaders to commit the war crimes of "attacking civilians, attacking civilian objects, murder by an unprivileged belligerent, destruction of property by an unprivileged belligerent and terrorism." The al Qaeda leaders it cites include Osama bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahri, Khalid Sheikh Mohammad, Abu Zubayda and the late Muhammad Atef.

The sheet says that around May 2001, after a conversion to Islam, Mr. Mohamed went to an al Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan, attended a lecture by Mr. bin Laden and was sent to a 30-day "city warfare course" in Kabul. It says he trained on AK-47 assault rifles but not pistols "due to lack of ammunition." It says he went to an explosives class in Kabul also attended by Richard Reid, the so-called shoe bomber.

Then, the charge sheet says, Mr. Mohamed went to Pakistan with Abu Zubayda, a senior al Qaeda figure later captured there. Along the way, it says, Mr. Mohamed met Mr. Padilla, and in Lahore they "reviewed instructions on a computer...on how to make an improvised 'dirty bomb.' " However, the sheet says, Abu Zubayda considered a dirty bomb unfeasible, so they weighed alternatives, "such as blowing up gas tankers and spraying people with cyanide in nightclubs."

The sheet says Khalid Sheikh Mohammad -- the alleged Sept. 11 mastermind, now also in custody -- explained in Karachi that their mission would involve targeting gas stations and natural-gas-heated apartment buildings, using the gas to cause explosions. It says in April 2002 Messrs. Mohamed and Padilla were given $6,000 and $10,000, respectively, to go to the U.S. and execute the plot.

Mr. Padilla has told interrogators the two were feted the night before their departure by al Qaeda leaders including Khalid Sheikh Mohammad and Ramzi Binalshibh, according to Mr. Comey at the 2004 news conference. "That is," Mr. Comey said, they were "hosted at a farewell dinner by the mastermind of Sept. 11 and the coordinator of those attacks." (Both are now in custody.) Because of the conditions under which Mr. Padilla was being held, such a statement by him couldn't be used against him in federal court, but could at a military commission.

The two didn't get far. Passport control stopped them at the Karachi airport and held them overnight.

Mr. Padilla, under U.S. surveillance, was allowed to proceed to Chicago, where Federal Bureau of Investigation agents arrested him as a material witness in a criminal probe. A month later, just before a deadline to justify his detention, the U.S. transferred him, at President Bush's order, to a military prison.

Last November, as the Supreme Court weighed a challenge to his military detention, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced plans to return Mr. Padilla to civilian custody and prosecute him for other crimes. Instead of a dirty-bomb plot, he now is under indictment for having supported a terrorist organization during the 1990s, among other charges. These charges, the U.S. says, are based on evidence it obtained lawfully. He has pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Mohamed, meanwhile, returned to the Karachi airport a week later with a forged passport, the Pentagon's charges say, attempting to fly to London. He was arrested again. The charge sheet ends there. The Pentagon declines to elaborate about "allegations that may become the subject of litigation in Mr. Mohamed's military commission."

His attorneys filed a brief supporting today's Supreme Court challenge to the validity of the military commissions, which concerns another Guantanamo inmate. The brief asserts that Mr. Mohamed "was rendered to Morocco by United States personnel...where he underwent unspeakable torture."

Besides this brief, Mr. Mohamed's version emerges in two other places: an interview with his brother, a U.S. citizen who asked not to be named for fear of reprisal for his relationship to an accused terrorist; and an account written by one of Mr. Mohamed's attorneys, Clive Stafford Smith, which the attorney says reflects what Mr. Mohamed told him during meetings at the Guantanamo naval base. The Wall Street Journal reviewed this 26-page account but had no way to authenticate it as Mr. Mohamed's own words.

Mr. Mohamed was born in Ethiopia, says his brother, and reared for a time in Nairobi, Kenya, where their father was an engineer for Ethiopian Airlines. Although of Muslim background, the family was secular, said the brother, adding that Mr. Mohamed attended a Catholic school. With Ethiopia in turmoil, the family in the early 1990s moved to the U.S., where Mr. Mohamed's brother and two sisters received asylum. Young Binyam knew nothing of the Quran, says his brother, but he "memorized 'Police Academy' " and was always reciting dialogue from the 1984 Steve Guttenberg comedy. "It was annoying."

Their father returned to Ethiopia and Binyam stayed in the U.S., the brother says. But "my sister and I didn't want to take the responsibility of raising a 14-year-old kid," so their father placed Binyam in the care of family friends in Britain. He later moved to a London YMCA. This brother says he last saw Mr. Mohamed in 1998 but the family spoke to him weekly until July 2001, when he stopped answering his telephone.

The brother says he knew nothing of Binyam's interest in Islam or of his fate until May 2002, when two FBI agents arrived, showed a photo of Mr. Padilla and said Mr. Mohamed had been seen with him. The brother says he finally learned Binyam's whereabouts in January 2005 after the International Red Cross said he was a prisoner at Guantanamo.

According to Mr. Stafford Smith, Mr. Mohamed, after studying kickboxing and computer programming, found his Islamic faith in 2000. He was having a rough time in life because of a drug problem, the lawyer says in an interview, "and he converted because it seemed like a sanctuary." The attorney says Mr. Mohamed worked as a janitor for a London mosque and then journeyed to Afghanistan. Besides getting away from the streets, "he also wanted to see the Taliban with his own eyes, to decide whether it was a 'good Islamic country or not.' "

Mr. Stafford Smith is a Briton who was educated in the U.S. and spent 25 years here opposing capital punishment, winning honors from Queen Elizabeth II. He founded an international advocacy group called Reprieve for prisoners facing the death penalty. His name was passed around by British inmates of Guantanamo seeking a sympathetic lawyer, he says, and in January 2005 he got a postcard from Mr. Mohamed requesting his representation, sent via the International Red Cross.

He says Mr. Mohamed "dabbled with the idea of going to Chechnya" to join Islamic rebels fighting Russian rule but denies any tie to a terrorist plot against the U.S. -- or knowing Mr. Padilla.

Mr. Stafford Smith ridicules the suggestion that his client, who he says spoke no Arabic when he got to Afghanistan, and Mr. Padilla, who is not alleged to belong to al Qaeda, were feted by its leadership. "The idea of a conspiracy that involves two very minor people...and every major figure in al Qaeda except bin Laden himself seems risible," Mr. Stafford Smith wrote in a defense memorandum.

DOJ_NMG_0022540

The attorney quotes Mr. Mohamed as saying he had "never met anybody like Khalid Sheikh Mohammad." But the lawyer also says he hasn't pressed his client to say whether he encountered any of the numerous al Qaeda figures the charge sheet says he conspired with.

An attorney for Mr. Padilla declined to say whether his client admits knowing Mr. Mohamed. The Padilla attorney, Andrew Patel, said he is weighing whether to call Mr. Mohamed as a witness in Mr. Padilla's trial set for September in federal criminal court in Miami.

In what Mr. Stafford Smith says is Mr. Mohamed's account, the prisoner says his misleading of Karachi airport authorities about his identity led to 14 weeks' detention in Pakistan and questioning by British and U.S. agents. In July 2002, the account says, U.S. agents flew him to Morocco. "It was when I got to Morocco that they said that some big people in al Qaeda were talking about me. They told me that the U.S. had a story they wanted from me, and it was their job to get it. They talked about Jose Padilla and they said I was going to testify against him and big people," the account reads.

The account says that in Morocco, questions were posed by Arabs and a self-described Canadian. The account says he was shackled in painful positions and punched by guards -- and then, weeks into his detention, came harsher treatment: "They took the scalpel to my right chest. It was only a small cut. Maybe an inch....Then they cut my left chest. This time I didn't want to scream because I knew it was coming."

The account continues: "One of them took my penis in his hand and began to make cuts. He did it once, and they stood still for maybe a minute, watching my reaction. One of them said it would be better just to cut it off, as I could only breed terrorists.

"I could not take any more of this torture, and I eventually repeated what was read out to me," the account continues. "They told me to say that I had been with bin Laden five or six times," that he himself had recommended targets, and that he had known about 25 terrorist leaders. "They told me I must plead guilty. I'd have to say I was an al Qaeda operations man, an ideas man."

After his confession, the account says, "brainwashing" began. "I remember they played Meat Loaf and Aerosmith over and over. I hated that," the account says. "When I became a Muslim, I had tried to get away from this. I'd canceled all the music out of my head and now they were forcing it back."

Morocco's Embassy in Washington didn't respond to requests for comment.

In January 2004, the account says, Mr. Mohamed was flown to Afghanistan and held by the U.S. for months in a place called the "prison of darkness." It says he was chained to the floor, kept in a lightless cell for 23 hours a day and subjected to "horrible ghost laughter and Halloween sounds" or Eminem's "Slim Shady," at blasting volume.

Eventually, according to the account, U.S. soldiers said, " 'This is the story that Washington wants.' It was about a dirty bomb. I was meant to steal the parts and build it with Padilla in New York. I did not even know what a dirty bomb was." Mr. Mohamed was taken to Guantanamo in September 2004, the account says, and told he must stay until he agreed to testify against others. Mr. Mohamed is to be judged by a panel of seven military officers whose names are secret but for the presiding officer and sole lawyer, Marine Col. Ralph Kohlmann.

U.S. citizens have a right to attend their trials, confront witnesses and compel defense witnesses to testify. Guantanamo defendants, by contrast, can be barred from proceedings and denied the right to compel testimony by witnesses if the commission finds this necessary to protect national security.

The military commission has discretion to consider any evidence it deems of "probative value to a reasonable person." The Pentagon acknowledges this could include statements taken through torture. It said last week it is considering rule changes to limit such evidence.

There's an indication Col. Kohlmann has considered the question of how to treat evidence possibly received this way. In November, at his child's high school in Durham, N.C., he led a student discussion titled "Torture, Terrorism and National Security." An organizer said it wasn't recorded or transcribed. The Pentagon wouldn't make Col. Kohlmann available for an interview.

PATRIOT ACT:

Two Lawmakers Demand Bush Obey Laws (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two senior Democratic House members yesterday demanded that President Bush withdraw his assertion that he can ignore portions of the USA Patriot Act calling on him to provide periodic reports to Congress on how new law-enforcement tactics are being used.

Representatives Jane Harman of California and John Conyers of Michigan -- the ranking Democrats on the Intelligence and Judiciary Committees, respectively -- sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking that Bush follow the law.

"We ask that the administration immediately rescind this statement and abide by the law," the lawmakers wrote. "Many members who supported the final law did so based upon the guarantee of additional reporting and oversight. The administration cannot, after the fact, unilaterally repeal provisions of the law implementing such oversight."

After some lawmakers raised concerns that the Patriot Act may pose a threat to civil liberties, Congress added a series of new oversight provisions to it. The law requires the Justice Department to keep track of how the FBI is using its expanded powers to monitor suspects and seize papers during counterterrorism investigations. The law required the administration to give Congress that information by certain dates.

But after Bush signed the Patriot Act reauthorization on March 9, he issued a signing statement -- an official document in which a president lays out his understanding of the law -- asserting that he had the authority to withhold the information from Congress if he decided that disclosing it would interfere with foreign relations, national security, or executive branch operations.

The signing statement, which went largely unnoted until The Boston Globe wrote about it last week, echoed a similar dispute three months ago when Congress passed a bill outlawing the torture of any detainee in US custody. Bush signed the antitorture law, but he also issued a statement asserting that he had the power, as commander in chief, to bypass the law if he decided that using aggressive interrogation techniques was necessary to protect national security.

While previous presidents occasionally issued signing statements, Bush has done so more often, legal scholars say. The Bush White House has issued more than 100 signing statements that called into question more than 500 provisions of new laws. But unlike other presidents, Bush has never vetoed a bill.

Yesterday, Harman and Conyers accused Bush of circumventing the lawmaking process.

"The time to raise objections to laws Congress is [considering is] while they are pending," they wrote. "Once the president signs a bill, he and all of us are bound by it."

Said Brian Roehrkasse, a Gonzales spokesman: "Signing statements have been used for several administrations and this is very standard language that makes clear that the president will faithfully execute the law in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution."

Patriot Act's Fast-tracking Of Death Penalty Cases Draws Criticism (LVS)

By Matt Pordum, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, March 27, 2006

Slipped into the thick binding of the newly authorized Patriot Act is a provision designed to speed death penalty appeals.

The act, signed into law this month, allows states to ask the U.S. attorney general for so-called fast-track reviews of federal habeas corpus petitions - the last appeal of a death row inmate.

Previously federal judges made that determination, which is based on whether a state's court-appointed attorneys in death penalty appeals are able to handle them.

No state had qualified for the fast-track review, but that could change under the new law. A fast-track review limits the amount of time a prisoner has to appeal and the subject matter of the appeal.

"This is very troubling," said Allen Lichtenstein, local attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union. "It's an attempt by certain elements of government to eviscerate the very checks and balances that are in place to guard us against the abuses of government.

"Essentially it's an attack against the Bill of Rights."

DOJ_NMG_0022542

Conservative groups, long critical of the length of time it takes for appeals to wind through the system, have championed fast-track appeals.

"If the provision holds up, it should fix the problem," said Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the nonprofit California-based Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a public interest law firm dedicated to crime victims' rights.

Scheidegger said it's not unheard of for a death penalty case to take a decade to get through the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in San Francisco.

He figures fast-track reviews would cut that down to three to four years.

But critics say death penalty cases are complex and can't be rushed through the system.

"Proper review is not particularly burdensome, so there is no real need for this," Lichtenstein said. "It's like they're saying we don't need judges, we don't want any review at all."

Michael Pescetta, the federal public defender for Nevada, said the new system is "unconstitutional because it takes a judicial determination and turns it over to the attorney general."

"They want to hurry up things at the expense of justice," he said.

Pescetta, whose office handles federal death penalty appeals, said he thinks the new law will be held up by "an enormous amount of litigation."

Conrad Hafen, chief of the Nevada attorney general's criminal division, wouldn't speculate on the impact of the new system but indicated that the state will likely apply to be placed on the fast-track list.

He noted that the law allows an appeal of the U.S. attorney general's decisions to the appellate court in Washington.

"The D.C. court certainly hasn't been a pro-prosecution court over the years and they have been more than favorable to defendants and petitioners," he said.

The appellate court's decision could be appealed to the Supreme Court.

Pescetta, though, said the law takes the appeal out of the hands of the judges in the 9th Circuit, "who see Nevada cases on a regular basis and already recognize the errors occurring here are really terrible."

The key in a fast-track authorization is whether a state's requirements for a court-appointed attorney are stringent enough. The law looks not only at the lawyer's experience but also at the resources the attorney is given to conduct an appeal.

Pescetta scoffed at Nevada's requirements, saying, "All someone really needs is a bar card to be allowed to handle these cases.

"To the extent the courts are going to examine the capital post-conviction system in Nevada, they are going to find it just doesn't qualify to meet the statute," he said.

Pescetta said Nevada's guidelines have created a situation in which court appointed defense attorneys "fail to hire an investigator to look beyond the record of a case and don't even ask for discovery."

He said by the time his office receives a case - after a prisoner's state appeal has been exhausted - many issues that should have been raised to the Nevada Supreme Court haven't been.

If Nevada's system is approved, "our bad situation is only destined to become worse," Pescetta said.

There are 82 death row inmates in Nevada. Matt Pordum can be reached at 474-7406 or at pordum@lasvegassun.com.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

GAO: Ports Need Radiation Monitors Installed Pronto (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security needs to step up its installation of radiation equipment at the nation's land and sea ports, as less than 40 percent of the equipment has been deployed, according to a government report being released today.

"The deployment of portal monitors has fallen behind schedule," states the report by the Government Accountability Office.

DOJ_NMG_0022543

Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican and chairman of the Senate Governmental Affairs permanent subcommittee on investigations, said the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) must "dramatically step up" its deployment "to keep pace with the danger we are facing" there.

The subcommittee will discuss the findings at a hearing today and also will address a second GAO report that highlights problems surrounding the movement of nuclear material through ports.

In December, the GAO set up a sting operation in which teams posing as employees of fictitious private companies successfully transported nuclear material to make a dirty bomb across both the southern and northern border.

At both sites, customs officials followed protocol, radiation-detection equipment found the material, and the cars were inspected further. But both teams were allowed to enter the United States after they presented counterfeit paperwork from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC).

According to the GAO report, one of the key problems is that suppliers of radioactive materials aren't required to determine whether buyers have a legitimate use for it and don't have to ask for a valid NRC document if the buyer is purchasing a small amount.

Customs officials were cooperative after they were briefed about the incidents, but NRC officials were hesitant, saying their "concern threshold" is higher than GAO's, the report stated.

The GAO and Mr. Coleman disputed that. "This operation demonstrated that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is stuck in a pre-9/11 mind-set in a post-9/11 world and must modernize its procedures," Mr. Coleman said.

In an effort to stop terrorists from smuggling bomb-making materials, DHS is deploying radiation-detection monitors to the nation's northern and southern land ports of entry, seaports, international mail facilities, international airports and rail crossings.

As of December, 740 of 2,405 radiation portal monitors had been deployed.

The security of seaports in particular has come into sharp focus lately, after a Dubai-owned company caused an uproar by purchasing terminal operations at several key U.S. seaports. That deal has since been scuttled.

A House Homeland Security subcommittee will likely vote on a measure that would invest more money in ports security and make several changes to ports-security programs. Similar Senate legislation will likely have a hearing next week, aides said.

And the Senate Banking Committee will debate and vote later this week on legislation to reform the interagency panel that approves sales such as the Dubai deal.

The panel itself also has studied these issues and plans to release its own findings later this week at a second hearing.

Testers Slip Radioactive Materials Over Borders (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — Undercover Congressional investigators successfully smuggled into the United States enough radioactive material to make two dirty bombs, even after it set off alarms on radiation detectors installed at border checkpoints, a new report says.

The test, conducted in December by the Government Accountability Office, demonstrated the mixed progress by the Department of Homeland Security, among other federal agencies, in trying to prevent terrorists from smuggling radioactive material into the United States.

Nationally, at a cost so far of about $286 million, about 60 percent of all containerized commercial goods entering the United States by truck or ship and 77 percent of all private cars are now screened for radioactive material.

But flaws in the inspection procedures and limitations with the equipment mean that nuclear materials may still be able to be sent illegally into the country through seaports or land borders, the study found. And because the program for installing radiation detectors is far behind schedule, many border crossing points, including many seaports, still have no detection equipment, the report says.

"We suffer from a massive blind spot in our cargo security measures," Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, said in a statement that accompanied the report, which will be released Tuesday morning at a Senate hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0022544

In the test case, undercover investigators bought a small amount of radioactive material, most likely cesium. Then on Dec. 15, they drove across the border at undisclosed locations from Canada and Mexico, intentionally picking spots where the detection equipment had been installed.

The alarms went off in both locations, and the investigators were pulled aside for questioning. In both cases, they showed the agents from the Customs and Border Protection agency forged import licenses from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, based on an image of the real document they found on the Internet.

The problem, the report says, is that the border agents have no routine way to confirm the validity of import licenses. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission, it says, also improperly allows the sale of small amounts of radioactive materials without a permit, substances that can be used in industrial equipment, like a medical device, but that can also be used to create terrorist weapons.

David McIntyre, a Nuclear Regulatory Commission spokesman, disputed the claim by the Congressional investigators that the amount of material bought and taken across the border would have been enough to build a dirty bomb. (Dirty bombs can force long-term evacuation by spreading low levels of radioactivity across an area after being detonated with a conventional explosive.)

But Mr. McIntyre said he agreed that Customs officials at the borders must be able to confirm quickly the validity of import licenses.

"We are working with Customs and the Department of Homeland Security to make sure this information is available to them 24/7," he said.

The investigation, part of a three-year inquiry by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee into the nation's vulnerability to nuclear smuggling, particularly at ports, found many other weaknesses in the radiation detection campaign.

The primary radiation monitors, which look like a standard tollbooth, cannot distinguish between naturally occurring radiation, sometimes found in ceramic tile or cat litter, and radioactivity in bomb-making substances.

Yet when Customs agents use hand-held radiation devices, which are supposed to clear false alarms by isolating the specific type of radiation, the standard procedure is to walk along the exterior of the container, rather than opening it. Used that way, the hand-held devices can produce unreliable results.

Installation of the radiation screening equipment is running behind schedule, largely because of delays in appropriating federal money, problems figuring out how to use the devices to screen rail cars and disputes with ports that are worried about slowing the movement of goods, the report says.

So far, about 670 of the planned 3,034 primary radiation detection monitors are in place, and at the rate they are being installed — 22 a month on average last year — the Homeland Security Department will not meet its September 2009 goal, the report said.

The investigators predict that the project, which the department estimates will cost $1.3 billion, is going to cost much more.

GAO: Paperwork Fooled Border Patrol (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Undercover investigators bought radioactive ingredients needed to make a dirty bomb and drove them into the USA past border security agents, a government report said Monday.

The report by the Government Accountability Office, the watchdog arm of Congress, said that investigators put radioactive material in the trunks of cars and drove to Canadian and Mexican border checkpoints on Dec. 14, 2005. When Homeland Security radiation detectors went off, the investigators gave Customs and Border Protection agents fake government licenses and receipts.

Agents searched the cars, reviewed the documents and ultimately gave the undercover officers the OK to bring the material into the USA, according to the report, filed as part of a border-security probe.

DOJ_NMG_0022545

The GAO said its investigators bought the radioactive material over the phone while posing as employees of a fictitious company, then had the material shipped to Washington, D.C. Several companies sell such material to buyers who have legitimate medical and business reasons for using it.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., chairman of the Senate's Permanent Committee on Investigations, said he was "alarmed" by the border response and the apparent availability of radioactive material for commercial sale.

"The reality is that it is easier to buy low-grade radioactive material for a dirty bomb than it is to buy cold medicine that has been restricted because of the meth epidemic," Coleman said. "The operation demonstrated that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is stuck in a pre-9/11 mind-set in a post-9/11 world and must modernize its procedures."

The Homeland Security Department's equipment worked, and its agents did what they were supposed to do during the tests, according to the report. However, the GAO criticized the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for failing to require companies that sell radioactive material to verify who is buying it, saying there is no way for border agents to verify NRC licenses or other documents.

NRC spokesman David McIntyre said the GAO bought an inconsequentially small amount of radioactive material.

He said the company selling it wouldn't have been required to demand licenses from buyers because the amount of material purchased was far too small to pose a safety or security threat.

The GAO report did not say what material investigators bought, whom they bought it from or how much they bought.

U.S. Wants Own Inspectors At Bahamas Port (AP)

The Associated Press, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration will negotiate to station American customs inspectors at the largest seaport in the Bahamas, where the United States is hiring a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo, a senior customs official said Monday.

Any such agreement will require approval by the Bahamian government. Diplomatic talks are expected to begin soon to give agents from U.S. Customs and Border Protection a presence at the sprawling Freeport Container Port, just 65 miles from Florida's coast.

"We're now looking at going over there to begin discussions," Jayson Ahern, assistant customs commissioner for field operations, told The Associated Press. "It does require bilateral discussions with another country, but we're cautiously looking at being there by the fall."

A story last week by the AP described the no-bid, $6 million contract the administration is finalizing with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. in the Bahamas, and generated criticism of the contract from some U.S. lawmakers and security experts.

The administration has acknowledged the deal represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running sophisticated U.S. radiation-detection equipment at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

Ahern was expected to testify Tuesday at a Senate oversight hearing on radiation detectors in the United States. He said the Homeland Security Department originally intended to station U.S. customs inspectors in the Bahamas by spring under its port-security program, called the Container Security Initiative.

The pending diplomatic talks were confirmed by John Meredith, the group managing director for Hutchison's port subsidiary, which runs the Bahamas port.

"They are getting close to fixing up a deal between the Bahamas and the U.S.," Meredith told the AP. "If they want to put American people out there to have a look at it, that's fine. But people should respect also that you've got to have trusted partnerships, both with the private sector and with foreign governments."

The Bahamas contract is being finalized by the National Nuclear Security Administration, part of the Energy Department. It has said employees of Hutchison -- the world's largest ports operator -- will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner at the port under the direct supervision of Bahamian customs officials.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. customs officials working at an anti-terrorism center in northern Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0022546

Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner. Separately, there are no U.S. customs agents checking cargo containers in Freeport under the U.S. customs port-security program.

Last week, the senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, said he was concerned there will be inadequate oversight in the Bahamas. Citing the AP story, Thompson sought assurances from the administration over the no-bid contract and asked when U.S. customs inspectors might be dispatched there.

Hutchison Whampoa is among the shipping industry's most respected companies and was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

Court Rebuffs Times On Libel Suit Appeal (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

The United States Supreme Court refused to hear an appeal from The New York Times on Monday, allowing a libel suit by a former Army bioterrorism expert to go forward.

The suit, filed in 2003 by Steven J. Hatfill, accused Nicholas D. Kristof, an Op-Ed columnist for The Times, of implicating Dr. Hatfill in the unsolved anthrax attacks of 2001.

The suit was dismissed by a federal judge in Virginia in 2004. A divided three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, Va., reinstated the case in July, and the full court, by a 6-to-6 vote, declined to rehear it in October.

The decisions to date have been preliminary, centering on whether Mr. Kristof's statements could be considered defamatory.

Judge Dennis W. Shedd, writing for the majority in the July decision, said "a reasonable reader of Kristof's columns likely would conclude that Hatfill was responsible for the anthrax mailings in 2001." But Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III, dissenting from the October decision, said "the columns do not pin guilt on plaintiff, but instead urge the investigation of an undeniable public threat."

The trial court will now consider whether the statements were false and whether The Times was at fault for publishing them.

New York Times Loses U.S. High Court Bid To Stop Hatfill Suit (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, March 28, 2006

March 27 (Bloomberg) -- New York Times Co. lost a U.S. Supreme Court appeal to stop a libel suit by Steven J. Hatfill, the scientist the Justice Department once identified as a ``person of interest'' in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

The justices, without comment in Washington, let stand a ruling that said Hatfill can pursue his suit over a series of New York Times columns written by Nicholas Kristof. The columns criticized the slow pace of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's probe into the attacks and discussed the possibility that Hatfill was the culprit.

The company argued in its appeal that the lower court ruling, issued by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia, ``will inhibit criticism of the government and penalize speech about public matters in violation of the First Amendment.''

No one has ever been charged in connection with the attacks, in which five people died from exposure to anthrax spores sent through the mail. Hatfill, who worked until 1999 at the Fort Detrick infectious diseases research institute, said in a 2002 press conference that he ``had absolutely nothing to do with this terrible crime.''

Hatfill urged the Supreme Court not to get involved in the libel case. He said in court papers that Kristof's first four columns on the subject ``did not report investigative interest in Dr. Hatfill but rather were designed to create some.''

Creating Interest

None of those columns mentioned Hatfill by name, referring to him in places as ``Mr. Z.'' Kristof used Hatfill's name only after the scientist held a news conference to deny any involvement with the attacks.

New York Times Co., the third-largest newspaper publisher, said the columns, read in their entirety, ``took care to caution readers against drawing any conclusion of Hatfill's guilt."

In addition to libel, Hatfill accuses the New York Times of intentional infliction of emotional distress. He is filed separate lawsuits against the federal government and closely held Conde Nast Publications Inc.'s Vanity Fair magazine.

Hatfill's attorneys wouldn't disclose his age.

The case is New York Times v. Hatfill, 05-897.

High Court Lets Defamation Suit Against New York Times Proceed (LAW/AP)

By Gina Holland, The Associated Press

AP, March 28, 2006

The Supreme Court refused Monday to block a defamation lawsuit against The New York Times over columns that linked a former Army scientist to the 2001 anthrax killings.

Authorities have never solved the mysterious mailing of anthrax-laced letters that killed five people and sickened 17 not long after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Steven Hatfill, a physician and bioterrorism expert, was labeled a "person of interest" by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, although he was never charged and has since sued Ashcroft and others.

A federal judge had thrown out Hatfill's lawsuit against The New York Times over 2002 columns by writer Nicholas Kristof that faulted the FBI for failing to thoroughly investigate Hatfill. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstated the suit, and the Supreme Court declined without comment to take up the case.

New York attorney David Schulz, who represented the newspaper, said the appeals court decision undermines free-speech protections for reporters and invites more lawsuits over legitimate news reporting.

The Associated Press and some 30 other news organizations urged the Court to use the case to clarify reporters' free-speech protections.

"Reporting on government investigations is critical to the public's ability to evaluate how their elected and appointed officials are executing the responsibility of enforcing the laws and protecting the peace," Washington lawyer Paul M. Smith wrote in the groups' filing.

Hatfill's attorney, Christopher Wright, said that the reporting by Kristof was reckless, with multiple errors, including the claim that Hatfill had failed three polygraph tests.

The Supreme Court itself was touched by the anthrax scare. Traces of anthrax were found in the Court's mailroom, forcing the building's closure for a week in October 2001.

The case returns to federal court in Alexandria, Va., where Hatfill sued in 2004 claiming defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. In its ruling, the appeals court said that the newspaper columns, taken as a whole, might be considered defamatory.

One of the dissenting judges said that The New York Times appeared only to be trying to reveal flaws in the FBI investigation, not to accuse Hatfill of the murders.

The case is The New York Times v. Hatfill, 05-897.

Palm Beach County Jail Inmate Charged In Anthrax Hoax (FLSUNSEN)

By John Coté, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, March 28, 2006

An anthrax letter hoax that shut down parts of the West Palm Beach courthouse this week could tack another 15 years onto a jail inmate's 40-year prison sentence.

Federal prosecutors on Thursday announced they charged Anthony Vassalotti, 40, with the federal crime of mailing a hoax anthrax threat.

Vassalotti allegedly sent three letters containing white powder and words such as "breathe these anthrax spores and die die die!" to the prosecutor on his case, the Circuit Court judge who sentenced him and the Palm Beach County court clerk, according to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0022548

Vassalotti was angry after being sentenced on March 16 to 40 years in prison for aggravated battery with a firearm and possession of a short-barreled shotgun, an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force investigator wrote in an affidavit.

A jury convicted him March 8 of shooting his former live-in girlfriend, Dana Brooker, outside their mobile home west of West Palm Beach.

Vassalotti mailed letters to prosecutor Kirk Volker, Circuit Judge Stephen Rapp and the court clerk's office, according to the affidavit. Two of the letters were received Monday. The third was found Tuesday. They contained a powder that West Palm Beach Fire-Rescue's biohazard team determined wasn't toxic.

Vassalotti printed his name on the letters and envelopes and confessed when questioned at the Palm Beach County Jail, wrote James Moore, a West Palm Beach police officer and member of the anti-terrorism task force.

"Vassalotti explained how he wrote three letters and enclosed baby powder in each, which he referred to in the letters as anthrax," Moore wrote. "Additionally, he described his motivation for sending the letters as including a desire to serve his sentence in a federal rather than a state facility."

If convicted, Vassalotti faces up to five years in a federal prison for each letter mailed. That would be separate from the 40-year state sentence.

Jail Inmate Charged In Federal Anthrax Hoax Case (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

Palm Beach County jail inmate has been charged with making fake anthrax threats after sending letters containing a powdery substance to the courthouse and state attorney's office, authorities said Thursday.

Anthony Vassalotti, 40, sent the letters to an assistant state attorney who had recently prosecuted him, to the judge who presided over the case, and to the court clerk, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida.

The letters, which also included Vassalotti's name and return address, were received Monday. The powder was later found to be harmless.

Vassalotti was convicted March 8 of aggravated battery with a firearm, among other charges, and was sentenced to 40 years in prison.

If convicted in the anthrax hoax case, he faces up to 15 years in federal prison.

WAR NEWS:

Afghan Convert Seeks Asylum Abroad (WP)

By Daniel Cooney

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 27 -- An Afghan man who faced the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity has appealed for asylum in another country, the United Nations said Monday.

U.N. spokesman Adrian Edwards said the world body was working with the Afghan government to meet the request by Abdul Rahman, 41.

"Mr. Rahman has asked for asylum outside Afghanistan," he said. "We expect this will be provided by one of the countries interested in a peaceful solution to this case."

Earlier, hundreds of people protested a court's decision Sunday to drop the case against Rahman, and an official said discussions were underway to determine when he would be released.

Officials said the case was dropped partially because of concerns that Rahman is mentally unfit to face trial. The move also followed strong pressure from Western governments.

Prosecutors have said they want doctors to examine Rahman, but they have not confirmed that he will be released. Prosecutor Sarinwal Zamari said state attorneys were working on the case on Monday.

An Afghan official closely involved with the case said Rahman would be released, but authorities were debating how and when that would happen.

DOJ_NMG_0022549

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case, said earlier that Rahman would not have to remain in jail while prosecutors investigated whether to bring another case against him.

Rahman is being held at the notorious, high-security Policharki Prison outside Kabul. He was moved there Friday after inmates at a police detention facility reportedly threatened him.

A warden at Policharki said Rahman was still at the prison Monday, being held in a concrete cell by himself.

Muslim clerics have threatened to incite Afghans to kill Rahman if he is freed, saying he is guilty of apostasy. They have also said Rahman violated sharia , or Islamic law, by rejecting Islam.

Monday's protest ended peacefully about two hours after it started in the northern city of Mazar-e Sharif, said police commander Nasruddin Hamdrad. The protesters chanted "Death to Bush!" and other anti-Western slogans while police officers stood guard.

Afghan Convert To Christianity Is To Be Freed, Officials Say (NYT)

By Sultan M. Munadi And Christine Hauser

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 27 — The attorney general of Afghanistan has told the Justice Ministry to release a jailed Afghan man who faced the death penalty for converting to Christianity, a prosecutor in the case said Monday.

Abdul Rahman, who has been accused of apostasy for abandoning Islam, has been in custody for weeks but has not been formally charged. During his detention, prosecutors have tried to build a case against him but have run up against the one-month limit that a person can be held without being charged under Afghan law.

"That was the main reason that the attorney general decided to release him," said the prosecutor, Abdul Wasei.

Mr. Wasei said prosecutors had completed their initial investigation on time.

But then the court sent the case back to them on Sunday to resolve questions about Mr. Rahman's mental health and nationality, pushing the investigation past the time limit, Mr. Wasei said.

He did not offer any other reason for Mr. Rahman's release, nor did he elaborate on its timing. But the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan said Monday that Mr. Rahman had asked for asylum outside Afghanistan.

"We expect that this will be provided by one of the countries interested in a peaceful solution to this case," the mission's statement said.

Mr. Rahman's case has created an international uproar and has become a flash point in the Afghan government's attempt to balance democratic freedoms with Islamic religious law, both of which are enshrined in the new Constitution.

The Bush administration has pressed President Hamid Karzai to resolve the case, but Mr. Karzai has resisted, citing separation of executive and judicial powers. Meanwhile, preachers have used prayer services to call for Mr. Rahman's execution. On Sunday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States had made it clear to the Afghan government that it expected to see a "favorable resolution."

"But this is also a young democracy, and we have to recognize that unlike the Taliban, it actually has a Constitution to which one can appeal about the Universal Declaration of Human Rights," she said on the CNN program "Late Edition."

On Monday a State Department spokesman said in Washington that Mr. Rahman would be released.

"We do understand that he will be released, that the Afghan government has found that there were substantial evidentiary problems with the case and that the case has been referred back to the Ministry of Justice," said the spokesman, Sean McCormack.

"We're pleased by that," Mr. McCormack added. He said the details of Mr. Rahman's release and his further travel were being handled as a "private matter."

The case was returned to prosecutors because of what the court called "investigative gaps."

Specifically, court officials said that Mr. Rahman's mental health would be evaluated, and that the question of whether he held dual nationality after living abroad in Germany, Greece and Belgium would be pursued.

A prosecutor affiliated with the case who spoke only on condition of anonymity said there were fears that Mr. Rahman might be attacked if he was sent to an Afghan hospital for a mental health evaluation.

DOJ_NMG_0022550

"He would be killed immediately if they release him," the prosecutor said.

Clerics led hundreds of people in a demonstration in the northern city of Mazar-i-Sharif on Monday, demanding that Mr. Rahman be tried under Islamic law and executed.

A witness named Shaahed said people at the demonstration had shouted slogans against President Bush and Zalmay Khalilzad, who is originally from Balkh Province in the north and is now the American ambassador to Iraq.

"They were shouting: "Death to Bush! Death to Khalilzad! Death to America!" said Mr. Shaahed, who like many Afghans uses only one name. He said the police there had controlled the protest, which was peaceful.

"They were also shouting: 'Abdul Rahman must be executed! We don't want any country to interfere in our Islamic affairs,' " Mr. Shaahed said of the protesters.

A spokesman for the Supreme Court, Abdul Wakil Omari, said Sunday that two of Mr. Rahman's relatives, a daughter and a cousin, had told the court that Mr. Rahman had mental problems.

"Also, during his preliminary court hearing, he had said that he was hearing strange voices and that he was not feeling well spiritually," Mr. Omari said.

He said the court had also raised questions about Mr. Rahman's nationality after living abroad. If he had acquired dual nationality, the status of his case could have changed, Mr. Omari said.

The issue began as a private matter between Mr. Rahman and his family. When he tried to regain custody of his two daughters, family members told the authorities that Mr. Rahman had converted to Christianity about 15 years ago.

Afghanistan's Constitution ensures citizens' religious freedom, but it also states that Islam is the supreme law. While the criminal code does not specify that converting from Islam to Christianity is forbidden, Islamic law considers it a sin punishable by death, according to conservative clerics and the prosecution in this case.

Afghan Christian To Be Released: US (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 27, 2006

An Afghan facing the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity is to be released, a US State Department spokesman said.

"We do understand that he will be released, that the Afghan government has found that there were substantial evidentiary problems with the case and that the case would -- and has been referred back to the ministry of justice and that he will be released. We're pleased by that," Scott McCormack told reporters.

Abdul Rahman was arrested about two weeks ago under Afghanistan's interpretation of Islamic Sharia law, which says he should be sentenced to death unless he reverts to Islam.

Rahman has asked for asylum outside Afghanistan, said the United Nations spokesman in Kabul, Adrian Edwards.

"In terms of where he might go after that, that is going to be up to Mr. Rahman," McCormack said. "And I understand now that the details of his release and his -- any potential onward travel are being handled as a private matter."

The case has met with severe criticism from Afghanistan's Western allies while religious circles within Afghanistan insist Sharia law, on which the constitution is partly based, should be upheld.

Rahman, 41, meanwhile underwent tests Monday to assess his ability to face trial after a court Sunday dropped its case against him amid doubts over his mental health, a prosecutor said.

McCormack said he did not believe US officials had had any direct contact with him.

Afghan Convert Released From Jail (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

An Afghan man who faced a death sentence for converting to Christianity was released late last night from jail in Kabul. U.S. and U.N. officials had said earlier they expected he would seek asylum abroad.

Abdul Rahman was released from the high-security Policharki prison on the outskirts of Kabul, Deputy Attorney General Mohammed Eshak Aloko told the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0022551

"We issued a letter saying he was mentally unfit to stand trial, so he has been released," he said. "I don't know where he is now."

A Christian monitoring group reported that there have been new fundamentalist Muslim attacks on Christians in Afghanistan in the wake of the international uproar over the case of Abdul Rahman, who was arrested last month for apostasy for leaving Islam for Christianity 16 years ago.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack had said earlier that the U.S. Embassy in Kabul had been told that Mr. Rahman would be released after the Afghan government found "substantial evidentiary problems" with the prosecution's case.

"We look forward to his release, and certainly his physical well-being is an important issue to us," he said.

But the decision to drop the case sparked at least one protest in the northern city of Mazar-e-Sharif, and Mr. Rahman has been held since late last week in a maximum-security prison because officials feared for his safety at a more exposed location.

U.N. spokesman Adrian Edwards told reporters in Kabul that Mr. Rahman had already appealed for asylum in an unnamed country. The United Nations had been working with the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai to ease the standoff.

"Mr. Rahman has asked for asylum outside the country," Mr. Edwards said. "We expect this will be provided by one of the countries interested in a peaceful solution to this case."

The United States, Germany, Italy, Australia and the Vatican were among those appealing for Mr. Rahman in recent days.

Despite a long tradition in Islam of harsh treatment for those who leave the faith, Muslim scholars said they did not expect a wave of similar apostasy cases in light of the uproar over Mr. Rahman. Mr. Rahman was only charged after he told investigators he was a Christian in the middle of a legal battle with his ex-wife over the custody of their two daughters.

But Compass, a California-based news service that tracks persecution of Christians around the world, reported that two other Afghan Christians had been arrested in recent days, while others had been subjected to beatings and police raids.

The prosecution posed an excruciating problem for the fledgling Karzai government, which is dependent on foreign troops and foreign aid to survive. But Islamic hard-liners in the overwhelmingly Muslim country argued that Islamic tradition demands a harsh penalty for apostasy.

The Afghan Constitution shows the balancing act facing Mr. Karzai, whose own oath of office calls on him to "obey and protect the holy religion of Islam."

The constitution's preamble calls for the government to adhere to Islam, while also observing U.N. and international human rights declarations guaranteeing freedom of religion.

The State Department declined comment on whether Mr. Rahman might apply for asylum in the United States. Mr. McCormack said that "any potential onward travel" for the defendant was "being handled as a private matter."

The case has sparked a heated debate among Muslim scholars, with both sides citing Koran verses to support their position.

On the Qatar-based Web site Islam Online, leading Islamic theologian Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi said that all leading Islamic traditions agree that "the apostate is to be punished."

But, he added, "they differ regarding the punishment itself. The majority of them go for killing, meaning that an apostate is to be sentenced to death."

Because Allah is considered by many Muslims to be the principal source of all authority, including political legitimacy, rejecting Islam can be seen as analogous to treason in a modern Western state.

But Abed Jlelati, a member of the board of the U.S.-based Free Muslim Coalition, said the Rahman death sentence was "absurd and disgusting," insisting the hard-line interpretation contradicts the prophet Muhammad's edict that "there shall be no compulsion in religion."

Unfathomable Zealotry (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

What strikes me about the threat to execute Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who converted to Christianity, is not that Afghanistan remains deeply medieval and not even remotely the democracy that George W. Bush would like it to be, but that with the exception of the (largely) Christian West, the rest of the world has been mostly silent. The Americans have protested, the Brits have protested, the Vatican has protested and so (I assume) have some others. But if there has been a holler of protest from anywhere in the Muslim world, it has not reached my ears. That is appalling.

The murder of a person for his religious belief ought to be inconceivable. It is something we in the West stopped accepting hundreds of years ago, and while Americans and others continued to kill on account of race deep into the past century, the right of the government to take a life on account of religion has not even been argued in the longest time. We are way beyond that.

Afghanistan was once under Soviet occupation, and it may have learned something from those days. Just as the Soviets sometimes pronounced political dissidents to be insane (why else would they question a perfect system?) so have Afghans decided that Rahman is nuts. (Why else would a Muslim choose Christianity?) Now that the case has been dropped and he has been placed in solitary confinement for his own protection, he will probably be spirited out of the country. To remain in Afghanistan is to remain in grave peril of death.

Rahman's troubles began, as they do for so many, with a divorce. In contesting his attempt to gain custody of his children, his wife told the court that Rahman would be an unfit father because he had converted to Christianity about 16 years earlier. This is what's known in football as a late hit. Nonetheless, when the prosecutor heard of the conversion, he promptly charged Rahman with apostasy, which is punishable by death. Rahman's choices were once to repudiate his conversion or plead insanity. The latter would have been the more sane choice.

"The world is too much with us," Wordsworth once wrote. This is certainly the way I feel. To be confronted on an almost daily basis with the horrors of Iraq is profoundly disturbing. The torture and decapitation of huge numbers of people, the casual homicides, the constant suicide bombings -- all of this makes you wonder about your fellow man. It is no longer possible, as it once was, to see the world only from your front porch, being disturbed only by the ringing of the bell on some passing ice cream truck. In Africa, Asia, too much of the world -- it is Joseph Conrad much of the time: "The horror! The horror!"

But you can say that these horrors are usually being inflicted by a minority. You say it is a few crazed terrorists of Iraq who are doing the killing. It is not most Iraqis. You can say the same about suicide bombers and torturers and rogue governments, like the one Saddam Hussein once headed. You can take solace in numbers. Most people are like us.

Then comes the Rahman case and it is not a solitary crazy prosecutor who brings the charge of apostasy but an entire society. It is not a single judge who would condemn the man but a culture. The Taliban are gone at gunpoint, their atrocities supposedly a thing of the past. In our boundless optimism, we consign them to the "too hard" file of horrors we cannot figure out: the Khmer Rouge, the Nazis, the communists of the Stalin period. Now, though, this awful thing returns and it is not just a single country that would kill a man for his beliefs but a huge swath of the world that would not protest. There can be only one conclusion: They were in agreement.

The groupthink of the Muslim world is frightening. I know there are exceptions -- many exceptions. But still it seems that a man could be killed for his religious beliefs and no one would say anything in protest. It is also frightening to confront how differently we in the West think about such matters and why the word "culture" is not always a mask for bigotry, but an honest statement of how things are. It is sometimes a bridge too far -- the leap that cannot be made. I can embrace an Afghan for his children, his work, even his piety -- all he shares with much of humanity. But when he insists that a convert must die, I am stunned into disbelief: Is this my fellow man?

Rumsfeld Grades U.S. Poor In Global Debate (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 27, 2006

The United States is faring poorly in its effort to counter ideological support for terrorism, in part because the government does not communicate effectively, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday.

Rumsfeld made the remark in response to a question from a member of his audience at the Army War College, where he delivered a speech on the challenges facing the country in fighting a global war on terrorism.

"If I were grading I would say we probably deserve a `D' or a `D-plus' as a country as to how well we're doing in the battle of ideas that's taking place in the world today," Rumsfeld told his questioner. "I'm not going to suggest that it's easy, but we have not found the formula as a country" for countering the extremists' message.

DOJ_NMG_0022553

Rumsfeld's audience consisted of more than 300 war college students and faculty members.

He said the al-Qaida terrorist network and affiliated Islamic extremists are the most brutal enemies the United States has ever seen.

Rumsfeld cited several examples of vicious terrorist assaults, including the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, and warned that unless the terrorists are stopped they will continue to seek the means to launch even deadlier attacks on the West in the years ahead.

"The enemy we face may be the most brutal in our history," Rumsfeld said. "They currently lack only the means — not the desire — to kill, murder millions of innocent people with weapons vastly more powerful than boarding passes and box cutters," he added, referring to the terrorists who hijacked the airliners Sept. 11.

It was Rumsfeld's first visit to the war college in his more than five years as secretary of defense.

Earlier in the day he stopped at Shanksville, Pa., to see for the first time the place where hijacked United Airlines Flight 93 crashed in a field on Sept. 11, killing all 40 passengers and crew shortly after hijacked planes crashed into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The government's Sept. 11 Commission report said the hijackers crashed the plane as passengers tried to take control of the cockpit.

On a walking tour of the site among rolling hills and meadows, Rumsfeld paused in front of several rows of angel-shaped figures on rods that bear the names of the passengers and crew who died aboard the airliner. In brief remarks, Rumsfeld said he wanted to pay his respects at "the place where America really started to fight back."

At the spot where Flight 93 plowed into the earth, Rumsfeld laid a wreath and bowed his head for a moment.

In his speech at the war college , Rumsfeld described the Shanksville site as a place where "a group of ordinary airline passengers gave their lives in extraordinary defiance of foreign hijackers and in defense of our country's capital."

Rumsfeld said progress is being made in the global war on terror, particularly in making it more difficult for terrorist groups to recruit, train, raise money, establish sanctuaries and acquire weapons. But he stressed that more needs to be done.

"The strategy must do a great deal more to reduce the lure of the extremist ideology by standing with those moderate Muslims advocating peaceful change, freedom and tolerance," he said.

Rumsfeld noted that his audience included an Afghan military officer and one from Iraq.

"We welcome you and are proud to stand with you in the cause of freedom," the defense secretary said.

Rumsfeld Sees No Victims In Al Qaeda (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld delivered harsh words to war critics yesterday, saying some view al Qaeda operatives as victims, not the enemy that has killed Americans repeatedly.

In a speech to military officers at the Army War College in Carlisle, Pa., he also criticized previous administrations -- without naming them -- for failing to take on Islamic terrorists despite a series of attacks, including the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

"Before September 11, 2001, there was somewhat of a misunderstanding in America about terrorists, and in some circles, I suppose, there really is today," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "Even today, some folks view terrorists as criminals, not as combatants. Some even consider them victims."

He said that during the 1980s and '90s, "the West was ambivalent how to counter extremist ideology and that type of aggression, and as a result, terrorists became increasingly emboldened. We should have learned the timeless truth that weakness is provocative."

Mr. Rumsfeld then listed the history of terrorist attacks on Americans, most occurring during the Clinton administration. The report submitted by the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States chronicled deep disagreements among the CIA, White House and Pentagon on how to deal with al Qaeda.

The Clinton national security team never agreed on any attack plan, and not one military operation was initiated against al Qaeda or Osama bin Laden, the commission said. The Pentagon's updated defense strategy paper, released a few weeks before Mr. Bush took office, did not list al Qaeda as a stand-alone threat. It lumped terrorism into a group of threats along with illegal drugs and piracy.

In President Bush's first eight months in office before September 11, Mr. Rumsfeld focused on organizing his staff and transforming the armed forces. The administration had no immediate plan to attack al Qaeda. During Mr. Rumsfeld's Senate confirmation hearing, neither al Qaeda nor Afghanistan was mentioned.

Without naming the Bush administration's political critics, the defense secretary said some blame the United States for terrorists' atrocities.

"From time to time, one hears the claim that terrorist acts are reactions to particular American policies. That's not so," he said. "Their violence preceded by many years' operations in Afghanistan and Iraq, and their violence will not stop until their ideology is confronted."

Filmmaker Michael Moore is among the more prominent critics on the Left who said al Qaeda's September 11 attacks were the result of past U.S. actions around the world. Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, a decorated Marine war veteran who is the most prominent Democrat to call for an immediate troop pullout from Iraq, has said the U.S. presence there is "fueling terrorism, not eliminating it."

Mr. Rumsfeld told the war college audience, "They say that a retreat from Iraq would provide an American escape from the violence. However, we know that any reprieve would be short-lived. ... The war that the terrorists began would continue, and free people would continue to be their targets."

U.S. Raid Irks Shiites; Bombing Kills 40 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, March 27, 2006

Shiite politicians raged at the United States and halted negotiations on a new government Monday after a military assault killed at least 16 people in what Iraqis claim was a mosque. Fresh violence erupted in the north, with 40 killed in a suicide bombing.

The firestorm of recrimination over Sunday's raid in northeast Baghdad will likely make it harder for Shiite politicians to keep a lid on their more angry followers as sectarian violence boils over, with at least 151 dead over the two-day period. A unity government involving Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds is a benchmark for American hopes of starting to withdraw troops this summer.

There were numerous conflicting statements from Iraqis and the Americans about the raid. Iraqi police, Shiite militia officials and major politicians have all said the structure attacked was the al-Mustafa mosque. But the U.S. military disputed this, saying no mosques were entered and that the raid targeted a building used by "insurgents responsible for kidnapping and execution activities."

In a conference call with reporters early Tuesday, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, deputy commander in Iraq, and Maj. Gen. J.D. Thurman, commander of the 4th Infantry Division, which is in control of Baghdad, said 25 U.S. forces were in a backup role to 50 Iraqi Special Operations troops.

The mission, the generals said, was developed by the Iraqis on their intelligence that an Iraqi dental technician, kidnapped 12 hours earlier because he could not come up with $20,000, was being held in what they called an office complex.

"It's important to remember we had an Iraqi unit with us, an Iraqi unit of 50 folks and they told us point blank that this was not a mosque," Chiarelli said. "It's not Mustafa mosque. Mustafa mosque is located six blocks north on our maps of this location."

Associated Press reporters who visited the scene of the raid identified it as a neighborhood Shiite mosque complex. Television footage taken Monday showed crumbling walls and disarray in a compound used as a gathering place for prayer. It was filled with religious posters and strung with banners denouncing the attack.

In an earlier statement, the military said the building had been under U.S. observation for some time.

DOJ_NMG_0022555

The statement said gunmen opened fire as Iraqi special operations troops closed in. It said the troops then killed 16 insurgents and wounded three "during a house-to-house search," detained 18 men, found a significant weapons cache and freed the hostage.

"In our observation of the place and the activities that were going on, it's difficult for us to consider this a place of prayer," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman.

For their part, Iraqi police said gunmen fired on the joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol from a position in the neighborhood but not from the mosque.

Police and representatives of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who holds great sway among poor Shiites in eastern Baghdad, said all those killed were in the complex for evening prayers and none was a gunman. Police put the death toll at 17 — seven members of al-Sadr's militia, seven civilians and three Shiite political activists.

Video from Sunday night showed male bodies with gunshot wounds on the floor of what was said by the cameraman to be the imam's living quarters, attached to mosque itself. The compound, once used by Saddam Hussein's government, consists of a political party office, the mosque and quarters for the imam.

The video also showed 5.56 mm shell casings scattered on the floor. U.S. forces use that caliber ammunition and have provided it to Iraqi special operations troops.

But Chiarelli said someone had gone into the scene of the raid to make it look as though there had been an assault without cause.

"After the fact someone went in and made the scene look different than it was," Chiarelli said.

Neither general would say who might have carried out such a charade. Nor would they say what they had learned about the men detained in the operation, citing intelligence strictures.

Interior Minister Bayan Jabr angrily rejected the U.S. account and demanded a "clear explanation."

"Entering the Mustafa Shiite mosque and killing worshippers was unjustified and a horrible violation from my point of view," Jabr said on the Al-Arabiya TV network. "Innocent people inside the mosque offering prayer at sunset were killed."

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, said he called U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and that they decided to form an Iraqi-U.S. committee to investigate.

"I will personally supervise, and we will learn who was responsible. Those who are behind this attack must be brought to the justice and punished," Talabani said.

The United Iraqi Alliance, the largest Shiite bloc in parliament, canceled Monday's session of negotiations to form a new government because of the raid, said lawmaker Jawad al-Maliki.

"We suspended today's meetings to discuss the formation of the government because of what happened at the al-Moustafa mosque," al-Maliki said, adding that the alliance was expected to decide Tuesday when to resume the talks.

The Baghdad governor said he cut ties with U.S. forces and diplomats. And all 37 members of the Baghdad provincial council suspended cooperation with the United States in reconstruction projects planned for the remainder of the year, as well as political and security coordination, said council chairman Moeen al-Khadimi.

He said the local government would try to rely instead on the budget allocated to it by the Finance Ministry and on the money that comes from donor countries.

The U.S. statement describing the kidnappers and killers they were targeting as "insurgents" was unusual because the operation took place at a Shiite facility. The insurgents who have been carrying out nearly daily bombings are Sunnis, while those believed responsible for execution-style slayings are primarily Shiite militias or death squads working inside the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, which runs the police.

"We don't know who they were," Chiarelli said. "They were terrorists, insurgents, you can call them what you will."

Monday's major suicide bombing took place at an Iraqi army recruiting office near the gate of a U.S.-Iraq military base about 20 miles east of Tal Afar, an ancient city not far from the Syrian border.

The bomber, wearing an explosives vest, struck shortly after noon, killing at least 40 Iraqis and wounding 30 others, the Iraqi Defense Ministry said.

DOJ_NMG_0022556

In yet one more gruesome discovery — a nearly daily occurrence since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra — 29 more bodies were found, nine with a noose around their necks.

The country's senior Shiite politician, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, told CNN that the shrine bombing "was similar to what happened on 9/11 in the U.S."

He said it's now much more difficult to control the streets, and that Shiites had earlier exercised restraint in the wake of attacks by Sunni insurgents.

"For three years we've been burying the slaughtering, killing, explosions, attacking of our scholars, our mosques, our facilities, our pilgrims, our barbers, our bakers, our innocents," al-Hakim said. "We are always speaking to people to restrain themselves and calm down."

Shiite Leaders In Iraq Denounce U.S. (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Top Shiite political leaders condemned U.S. forces on Monday for raiding a suspected Shiite terrorist cell in what they said was a mosque and killing more than a dozen people, exposing the growing schism between the country's largest and most powerful sect and U.S. officials.

Shiite leaders charged that Sunday's raid in northeast Baghdad was an attempt by the Americans to distance themselves from the sect. They claimed that U.S. officials were trying to give Sunnis more power than they won in the Dec. 15 election because they feared that Iraq would be controlled exclusively by Shiites, rather than shared with the Sunnis. Shiites represent 60 percent of Iraq's population and won a near-majority of seats in the parliament.

A widespread loss of support from the Shiites could make Iraq almost impossible to govern and could put U.S. forces stationed in Iraq in a precarious position.

"There is a policy by the American administration and its ambassador in Iraq to regain balance (between opposing Shiite and Sunni forces) by creating combating fronts," said Salam al-Maliki, the minister of transportation and a member of firebrand Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's party.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, commander of the Multinational Corps Iraq, said Sunday's raid didn't involve a mosque but an office complex that held terrorists and an Iraqi hostage.

He said about 50 Iraqi special forces members led the attack and were fired upon by insurgents protecting the compound, prompting them to return fire.

"They didn't go in guns blazing," Chiarelli said.

About 25 U.S. military troops supported the Iraqi forces, but they didn't kill anyone in the complex, U.S. military officials said.

Identifying a mosque isn't always easy for non-Arabic speakers, since some mosques don't have the characteristic domes and minarets. Many Shiites, who were forbidden from building mosques during Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's regime, converted ordinary neighborhood buildings into places of worship after the U.S. invasion. The site of the Sunday's raid had been recently converted into a mosque, Shiite leaders said.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a coalition spokesman, said the complex had three buildings and that military officials determined that two were off-limits. The third, which they entered, was under constant guard, he said.

Members of the major Shiite slate, the United Iraqi Alliance, warned U.S. officials against fighting Shiite forces.

"I warn them (the U.S.) that a battle with the calm giant Shiite means they are falling into a dangerous swamp," said Kuthair al-Khuzaie, a spokesman of the Shiite Dawa party, at a press conference. "The U.S. is making things more complicated and losing their credibility among the Iraqis."

The raid targeted Shiites, some of whom were affiliated with al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia, U.S. officials said. Al-Sadr has called for his followers to remain calm.

Since the December election - in which the United Iraqi Alliance won 10 seats short of the majority - the U.S. envoy in Iraq has hinted that American support for the Shiites isn't ironclad. U.S. officials have pushed the government to rein in militias, most of which are run by Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0022557

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, has said that Shiite-dominated militias must be integrated into government forces. On Saturday, he said that Shiite-led militias are creating more violence than the Sunni-led insurgency, a charge not heard before the election.

Although Shiite leaders say they want a national unity government, many aren't willing to dismantle their militias, saying their armed factions will protect them if their party - or the government - falls apart. They've dismissed suggestions that the militias are contributing to the sectarian violence and instead charge that the Iraqi police and military have been infiltrated by enemy elements who are stirring up trouble.

"These militias have an honorable history in fighting the tyrant (Saddam) and supporting the political process," al-Maliki said.

U.S. officials believe that as long as militias remain an unchecked security faction, sectarian violence will increase, delaying the drawdown of U.S. forces.

Since the Feb. 22 bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in the Sunni-dominated city of Samarra, retaliatory killings have surged. Dozens of bodies, mostly Sunnis, have been dumped in fields and side streets, many showing signs of torture. U.S. officials believe members of the Mahdi Army have been behind much of the violence.

The split between the Shiites and the United States emerged after the election, when the two sides strongly disagreed over how the new Iraq should take shape, said James Denselow, an Iraq specialist at the London-based Chatham House, a foreign-policy research group.

Since the December election, "the U.S. no longer directly influences the process," he said. "They are battling the idea of a national unity government against the reality of a severely fractured state along sectarian lines."

The U.S. Embassy declined to comment on Monday.

Top leaders have been haggling over the government since the election, but Shiite leaders said they suspended negotiations after the raid.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani announced that he would lead an investigation, a common practice after major events. Iraqi officials don't publicly release the results of their investigations.

Shiite Leaders Suspend Talks Over Government (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 27 — Frayed relations between Iraq's Shiite leadership and the American authorities came under increased strain on Monday as Shiite leaders angrily denounced a joint American-Iraqi raid on a Shiite compound and suspended negotiations over a new government.

The raid on Sunday evening, which killed at least 16 people, also prompted the governor of Baghdad to announce a halt in cooperation with the American authorities, and Shiite militiamen to brandish their weapons in the streets of eastern Baghdad and declare their readiness to retaliate against American troops.

The suspension of the difficult talks over the formation of a full four-year government prolonged a power vacuum that American and Iraqi officials said had created a fertile environment for a recent surge in lawlessness and sectarian violence.

In the village of Kasak, between Mosul and Tal Afar, a man wrapped in explosives detonated himself at an army recruitment center on Monday, killing at least 40 people and wounding at least 30, an official at the Interior Ministry said. The center is situated in front of a joint American-Iraqi base, though the American military said that no American troops had been wounded.

President Jalal Talabani said he would lead a joint Iraqi-American committee to investigate the Sunday evening raid, as American and Iraqi authorities continued to offer wildly conflicting accounts of it. Shiites said the victims were civilians gathered in a mosque, while the Americans said they were insurgents holed up in a guerrilla headquarters. Iraqi leaders said they would reassess the pause in political talks on a day-by-day basis.

DOJ_NMG_0022558

The tension between the American authorities and the Shiite political leadership has many sources. The United States ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, has been pressing the government of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, to crack down on Shiite militias and rid the Interior Ministry of militia influence.

The militias, and their fighters working within the government's security forces, have been accused of conducting a dirty war against Sunni Arabs through kidnappings and executions, and thereby helping to push the country toward all-out civil war.

In addition, Mr. Khalilzad has been urging the Shiite leaders to be more politically accommodating to Sunni Arabs. In the aftermath of the bombing of a major Shiite shrine last month, Shiite leaders began to lash out at the ambassador for his insistence on working with the Sunnis and defended their use of militias for self-defense.

Some Shiite leaders warned that the raid had been widely interpreted among their constituents as a strong-arm tactic to cow them into making political concessions, including forcing the largest Shiite bloc to drop Mr. Jaafari as its nominee for prime minister in the new government. They demanded that the American authorities give a public and transparent accounting of the raid. "There was something tragically wrong, and it's got to be explained or it's going to be seen by many to be a crackdown on certain political factions in Iraqi politics," said Haydar al-Abadi, a top adviser to Mr. Jaafari. "We are facing a crisis."

President Talabani said at a news conference that Gen. George W. Casey Jr. agreed to the formation of the joint investigative committee, which was confirmed by a spokeswoman for the American Embassy. "I will personally supervise, and we will learn who was responsible," the president said. "Those who are behind this attack must be brought to justice and punished."

The governor of Baghdad, Hussein al-Tahaan, said he was suspending cooperation with the American authorities "due to the aggression that the innocent people and worshipers were subjected to." The practical effects of the move remained unclear, though it would likely have symbolic resonance.

The raid on Sunday happened at the Mustafa husayniyah, a small Shiite community center and mosque in Ur, a predominantly Shiite neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad.

The mosque, with a small minaret, is built around a central open-air courtyard and was frequented by followers of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia. Mr. Sadr led two major armed uprisings against American troops in 2004 and has become one of the most powerful political forces in the country.

An imam at the mosque, Sheikh Safaa al-Tamimi, said he fled the building when the troops arrived Sunday evening, but returned after the shooting was over and saw bodies in several different rooms. Adel Abu al-Hassan, 34, the supervisor of the mosque and a prayer caller, was outside the mosque during the siege but said he, too, returned to find bodies scattered around the complex.

On Sunday, the Interior Ministry reported that an 80-year-old imam had been among those killed at the compound.

A reporter visiting the mosque on Monday saw blood stains in rooms and on rugs that had been hauled into the courtyard, bullet-pocked walls and even a piece of human brain in a pool of blood on the tile floor of an office used by a Shiite political party, the Iraq Branch of the Islamic Dawa Party.

In a conference call with reporters in Baghdad late Monday, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, commander of the day-to-day operations of the multinational forces in Iraq, said the building was "an office complex," and not a mosque. He said the raid, which involved about 50 troops from the Iraqi Special Forces, assisted by about 25 American advisers, explosives technicians and medical personnel, singled out an insurgent group that was using the building as a base of operations for conducting kidnappings and executions.

General Chiarelli said that as the troops approached the complex, they came under fire from "several buildings" in the area. The troops killed 16 insurgents, wounded three, detained 18 other people, discovered a weapons stockpile and freed a dental technician who was being held hostage there, he said.

The soldiers were met with gunfire from many rooms in the building, American commanders said. "The Iraqi forces did the fighting, make no bones about it," the general said, adding that the dead were all killed by Iraqi troops.

General Chiarelli said he did not know which organization the insurgents represented. "What I know is that we had a terrorist organization that's involved in executions and murders and was holding a hostage," he stated.

The general said he believed that the scene was disrupted after the raid to make the building look like something other than a terrorist headquarters, although he did not give details on how it was done. "After the fact someone went in and made the scene look different than it was, for whatever purposes," he said.

But Iraqi government officials and political leaders vociferously disputed the American command's version of events, insisting that Iraqi and American troops had raided a mosque, not a fortified office complex, as a political party meeting was under way and unarmed worshipers gathered for evening prayer.

Khudair al-Khuzaie, the spokesman for the Iraq Branch of the Islamic Dawa Party, said he knew of 16 victims, all of whom had been attending a meeting in the party's office at the time of the raid. The office is accessible through a doorway from the mosque's courtyard. Of the victims, he said, 13 were party members and 3 were civilians.

Jawad al-Maliki, a deputy to Prime Minister Jaafari's Dawa Party, accused the American command of committing "an ugly crime" that "has dangerous political and security dimensions intended to ignite the fire of civil war."

In the hours after the attack, an official in the office of Mr. Sadr claimed that members of his Mahdi Army were among the victims. But on Monday, another Sadr representative said no Mahdi Army fighters died in the raid.

Mahdi fighters brandishing weapons took to the streets in Ur and Sadr City in a show of force and warned they were prepared to attack American troops. Many accompanied a solemn and tense funeral cortege for the victims through the streets of Ur.

But Shiite leaders, including Mr. Sadr, urged calm.

"We are ready to resist the Americans and strike their bases," vowed Katheer Abdul-Ridha, 22, a member of the Mahdi Army, who was guarding a roadblock in Sadr City. "The Sunnis have nothing to do with this, and we shouldn't accuse them of everything that's going on."

Mr. Khalilzad has been pressuring Iraqi leaders to rein in the militias. On Saturday, he declared that more Iraqis were dying from militia violence than from the insurgency.

In the carnage at the northern recruitment center, Gen. Muhammad al-Dosaki, deputy commander of the Third Division of the Iraqi Army, said the suicide bomber waded into a crowd of about 70 applicants who had gathered outside the center and detonated a vest of explosives.

And in Baghdad, Iraqi police recruits stumbled across nine bodies, all garroted, an official in the Interior Ministry said. At least 267 bodies showing signs of execution-style killings have been recovered in Baghdad in the past three weeks.

In southern Baghdad, a missile hit a building containing two offices of the Shiite-led Fadhila and Dawa parties, killing 6 people and wounding 12, an Iraqi police official in Zafaraniya said.

U.S. And Iraq's Shiite Leadership Differ Sharply In Accounts Of Raid (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Iraq's leaders reacted angrily to the U.S.-backed raid that they claimed killed civilians in a Shiite mosque Sunday night, while top U.S. commanders said the operation broke up a ruthless terrorist cell. The dispute will further complicate efforts to form a unity government and could lead to more reprisal attacks by Shiite militias.

The U.S. and the Shiite leadership differed sharply in their accounts of the raid, which took place at sunset in Eastern Baghdad. The U.S. says the operation targeted a cell of well-armed insurgents who were making explosives and had taken hostage an Iraqi dental technician whom they were beating and threatening to torture. They showed the hostage a photo of his daughter and said she would be killed unless he came up with $25,000 the next day, said Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq.

As Iraqi soldiers supported by U.S. special operations troops scoured the area, they came under fire. In the ensuing fight, 16 gunmen were killed, 18 were detained, a weapons cache was found and destroyed, and the hostage was rescued. U.S. commanders described the targeted compound as "an office complex," and not a mosque.

The Shiite leaders say the raid killed scores of worshippers in a neighborhood mosque. "There were people gathering to perform their sunset prayers," says Nasir al-Sayidi, a member of parliament loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose militia, the Mehdi army, has fought two rebellions against U.S. forces. Top U.S. commanders rejected claims of innocent deaths and suggested someone deliberately tampered with the scene after the raid, making it look on some video footage as if innocent civilians had been killed. The raid was conducted by an Iraqi special-forces unit accompanied by U.S. advisors who didn't fire any shots. A U.S. military spokesman said the soldiers were pursuing a militant linked to the Mehdi army.

In protest, the Shiite coalition, which dominates Iraq's Parliament and holds the keys to the formation of a new cabinet, withdrew from government negotiations yesterday, delaying the process that has dragged on for weeks without results. "We suspended the meetings to discuss the formation of the government because of what happened at the mosque," said Jawad al-Maliki, a member of the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite parliamentary bloc.

Washington hopes a more inclusive government could help quell sectarian violence that has engulfed Iraq after last month's bombing of a landmark Shiite shrine in Samarra. In response, shadowy Shiite militias have embarked on a spree of retaliatory killings and torture targeting Sunnis.

The outcry over the Sunday raid went beyond the Shiite political bloc. President Jalal Talabani, an ethnic Kurd, said he called U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to urge a joint U.S.-Iraqi investigation into the incident. "Those who are behind this attack must be brought to justice and punished," Mr. Talabani said. The U.S. embassy said it supports the idea of a joint inquiry but declined to comment further.

In a separate incident yesterday, a suicide bomber killed some 40 people at an army recruitment center in northern Iraq.

The fallout from the Sunday raid points to the gulf that has been steadily widening between U.S. policy makers and the Shiite forces that have come to dominate much of Iraq's political life. The Shiite Arabs, along with the Kurds, were the major beneficiaries of the U.S. overthrow of Saddam Hussein. Two rounds of national elections held last year propelled the Shiites to the pinnacle of power, long a preserve of the Sunni Arab minority. As the Sunni-driven insurgency targeting Shiites picked up steam, Shiite militias infiltrated the country's interior ministry and began harassing and killing Sunnis, often for no reason other than their sectarian differences.

That violence intensified after the bombing of the Askariya mosque in Samarra, one of Shiite Islam's holiest shrines, prompting U.S. officials to cast Shiite militias as the gravest dangers facing Iraq. The perception, voiced repeatedly by Mr. Khalilzad, drew sharp rebukes from Shiite leaders, who now suspect the U.S. is turning on Shiites and trying to weaken their power in order to win over the disenfranchised Sunni community that feeds the bulk of the insurgency.

"The U.S. thinks that the biggest problem of Iraq is in the militias, but the real problem is terrorism," says Qusai Abdul Wahab, a member of parliament from the Sadr movement. Much of the criticism of the Sunday raid has been spearheaded by Sadr officials. Mr. Sadr has joined the political process and now has deputies in the national assembly. But he remains stridently anti-American, and his militia has retained much of its capability, prompting fears of new conflicts.

U.S. Officials Defend Raid Following Shiite Backlash (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 27 -- Facing a scathing backlash from Shiite Muslim leaders a day after a deadly U.S.-Iraqi raid in Baghdad, top U.S. military officials defended the mission Monday, saying it was a "hugely successful" operation against an insurgent hideout packed with weapons used against soldiers and civilians.

Lt. Col. Sean Swindell, whose unit participated in the raid, said the mission was led by Iraqi soldiers and targeted an insurgent group based at a compound in northern Baghdad. Sixteen Iraqis were killed, all combatants, U.S. officials have said.

Their version of events differed sharply from that of Shiite officials and Baghdad residents near the site of the raid, who for a second day voiced anger over the operation, saying U.S. and Iraqi troops targeted a Shiite mosque and gunned down innocent worshipers in the half-light of evening prayers.

"There was no resistance at all from the mosque. There were no weapons during prayers," said Muhammad Ridha, 39, who works at the complex in Baghdad's Shaab neighborhood. "The purpose of the raid was to kill Shiites."

DOJ_NMG_0022561

The rejection of such characterizations by Swindell, commander of the 2nd Battalion, 10th Special Forces Group, and other U.S. officers came in a series of television appearances and late-night conversations with reporters aimed at bolstering the U.S. version of events. American officials had been publicly silent about the raid for more than 24 hours.

Their comments also came as the American presence in Iraq -- long hailed, or at least tolerated, by Iraqi Shiites as a bulwark against factional violence -- faced its most precarious moment in months, according to U.S. diplomats and military officers, political analysts and Iraqi officials.

On Monday, political leaders canceled a round of negotiations over the formation of a new government and instead huddled with American diplomats in an attempt to rein in the burgeoning crisis. Meanwhile, the Shiite-led provincial government in Baghdad suspended all cooperation with U.S.-led forces until an investigation into the Sunday raid is conducted.

The rancorous standoff coincided with yet another devastating day of violence, with as many as 60 people killed across Iraq, including dozens of military recruits in a bombing in the northern city of Mosul.

"I certainly don't see any easy way out of this mess," said Peter Galbraith, a former U.S. diplomat who serves as a consultant to Iraq's Kurdish parties.

Further complicating U.S. efforts is the fact that those killed Sunday are believed to have been followers of the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Once a renegade distrusted by the Iraqi government, Sadr has spent the past year cementing his status as a political insider, incorporating members of his Mahdi Army militia into the Iraqi police force. More than 30 of his followers won seats in the new parliament.

"I was more surprised that the U.S. took on the Mahdi militia as it did," said Michael O'Hanlon, an analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington. "We handled Sadr's forces very well in 2004 with a mix of carrots and sticks, and we have to be prepared to fight him again, but any time you fight him or someone associated with him, you run the risk of taking on all his legions, and that would be a huge negative."

While the enmity between U.S. and Shiite leaders may have peaked as a result of the raid, relations have been souring for the past several months. In late December, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad -- long praised as an evenhanded broker by all of Iraq's factions -- began warning political leaders forming a new government to put the security apparatus outside the control of Shiite militia leaders.

The pointed public request was a thinly veiled swipe at Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, who has ties to the Badr Organization, a Shiite group. On Monday, Jabr condemned the Sunday raid, telling al-Arabiya television that "innocent people inside the mosque offering prayer at sunset were killed," according to news services.

Jawad Maliki, an official with the Shiite Dawa party led by Shiite Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari, said the raid was "aimed to provoke a civil war for political purposes during a critical political period of the process of forming a government."

Maliki also accused U.S. forces of "killing this number of people after handcuffing and torturing them." Witnesses said U.S. and Iraqi forces stormed the building at about 6 p.m., just as evening prayers were beginning, and shot several unarmed worshipers and officer workers. No evidence was provided to substantiate those claims.

A visit on Monday to the site of the raid -- which local residents said was a former office complex converted into a community center, with a mosque, a school and an office of the Dawa party -- revealed inner and outer walls pockmarked by bullet holes.

Photographs of Sadr were plastered on walls. The floor was caked with dried blood. In one room a small crater pocked the floor, a sign of what witnesses described as a sound grenade.

Residents carried at least 21 coffins from the mosque at 11 a.m., some draped in Iraqi flags or black mourning banners, and loaded them into the backs of pickup trucks escorted by armed men chanting anti-American slogans. The coffins were said to be bound for the Shiite holy city of Najaf for burial.

Unlike the Shiite leaders, U.S. military and civilian officials kept a low profile Monday, leaving some commanders and diplomats, and their Iraqi supporters, frustrated that their version of events was not being disseminated.

"Someone should have said something. The other side is talking, and the American side is silent," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish politician who works closely with U.S. officials. "To be silent here means you are on the weak side."

DOJ_NMG_0022562

When they finally spoke out Monday night, U.S. commanders said that shots were fired from inside the compound and from surrounding buildings as soon as the soldiers arrived and that the Americans played mostly an advisory role. The lead unit, they said, was a special forces battalion known as the Iraqi counter-terrorism force.

"They were the drivers and the machine-gunners and the breachers," said Swindell, the lieutenant colonel.

He said the insurgent group based at the complex had been tracked for at least a month. He said he did not know if the group had a name, or what its religious affiliation was, but that members were believed to have tortured and killed at least three men belonging to the Iraqi counter-terrorism force.

About 50 Iraqi and 20 U.S. soldiers conducted the raid, Swindell said, adding that all but one or two of the slain insurgents were killed by Iraqi troops.

"There was nobody praying when we hit the objective, they were firing weapons at us," he said. "We had resistance the whole time, for about 45 minutes."

In a statement Monday, the U.S. military said 18 suspected insurgents were detained in the assault and three were wounded. The military also cataloged a large number of weapons found inside the compound, including 32 AK-47 assault rifles, two rocket-propelled grenade launchers and 12 "crush switch indicators" used to make bombs.

In a conference call Tuesday night, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq , said the Iraqi soldiers had told U.S. troops the targeted building was not a mosque. He also said that footage aired on Iraqi television Sunday and Monday showing unarmed men lying dead and Korans scattered at the scene of the attack had been staged.

"After the fact, someone went in and made the scene look different from what it was," he said.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, an ethnic Kurd, said Monday he would lead a committee charged with reconciling the widely divergent accounts of the raid. If wrongdoing is discovered, he said, "We will take them before a court, whoever they are. Everyone who commits a crime should be punished."

Shi'ites Cease Government Talks After Gunbattle (WT)

By From combined dispatches

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Shi'ite politicians yesterday halted talks on a new government and threatened to break off cooperation with the United States on security and reconstruction after a military assault that killed at least 16 persons in what Iraqis claim was a mosque.

The victims were identified as followers of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a principal backer of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and a key player in long-running talks aimed at forming a government.

U.S. and Iraqi officials offered wildly conflicting accounts of the Sunday night gunbattle, but the recriminations clearly were undermining fragile trust between the Americans and Iraqis. President Jalal Talabani said he and U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad had agreed to form an Iraqi-U.S. committee to investigate.

Sectarian tensions were inflamed further by a suicide bombing that killed at least 40 persons north of Baghdad yesterday, bringing the death toll to at least 150 over two days. About 20 bodies were discovered, most with nooses around their necks, a day after 40 bodies were found, most of which were beheaded.

Iraq's security minister, in the most inflammatory account of Sunday's battle, accused U.S. and Iraqi forces of entering a mosque and killing 37 unarmed civilians after tying them up. Residents and police -- who put the death toll at about 20 -- spoke of a fierce battle between the soldiers and gunmen from Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia, whose followers ran the mosque.

The U.S. military said the raid targeted a building used by "insurgents responsible for kidnapping and execution activities" and that "no mosques were entered or damaged during this operation."

The military said the building had been under observation for some time and that gunmen opened fire when Iraqi special-operations troops closed in, with U.S. forces in a backup role. The military said the troops killed 16 insurgents and wounded three "during a house-to-house search," detained 18, found a significant weapons cache and secured the release of an Iraqi hostage.

DOJ_NMG_0022563

"In our observation of the place and the activities that were going on, it's difficult for us to consider this a place of prayer," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman. "It was not identified by us as a mosque, though we certainly recognized it as a community gathering center. I think this is, frankly, a matter of perception."

Associated Press reporters who visited the scene yesterday said the site clearly was a neighborhood Shi'ite mosque complex. Television footage showed a compound used as a gathering place for prayer, filled with religious posters and strung with banners denouncing the attack.

Some confusion may result from the fact that the site was not a traditional religious building but a compound of former Ba'ath Party offices converted into a mosque by Sheik al-Sadr's followers.

Police and representatives of Sheik al-Sadr said all those killed were in the complex for evening prayers and none was a gunman. Police put the death toll at 17 -- seven members of Sheik al-Sadr's militia, seven civilians and three Shi'ite political activists.

Interior Minister Bayan Jabr angrily rejected the U.S. account and demanded a "clear explanation."

"Entering the Mustafa Shi'ite mosque and killing worshippers was unjustified and a horrible violation, from my point of view," Mr. Jabr said on the Al Arabiya TV network. "Innocent people inside the mosque offering prayer at sunset were killed."

The United Iraqi Alliance (UIA), the largest Shi'ite bloc in parliament, canceled yesterday's session of negotiations to form a new government because of the raid, said lawmaker Jawad al-Maliki. He said the alliance likely would decide today when to resume the talks.

Mr. al-Maliki, an ally of Mr. al-Jaafari, also said the UIA "calls for a rapid restoration of [control of] security matters to the Iraqi government" and away from the Americans.

The Baghdad governor said he had cut ties with U.S. forces and diplomats, while all 37 members of the Baghdad provincial council suspended cooperation with the United States in reconstruction projects planned for the remainder of the year.

Angered By Fatal Raid, Shiites Exit Unity Talks (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux And Zainab Hussein

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — As coffins of shooting victims rolled past wailing mourners, Iraq's dominant Shiite Muslim political alliance Monday condemned the United States for a weekend raid that left at least 16 people dead in a Shiite neighborhood and said it was for now dropping out of U.S.-guided talks aimed at forming a unity government.

Shiite political leaders and U.S. military commanders gave wildly contradictory accounts of the Sunday evening raid in northeast Baghdad, evidence of a growing rift between the United States and the Shiite-led government that came to power after the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein.

The raid also widened a split between the Sunni Arab-led Defense Ministry, which oversees the Iraqi troops who took part in the operation, and the Shiite-dominated police force. Rivalry between the two security forces has fueled apprehension that the sectarian violence could drag them into a civil war.

The Shiites said that the target of the military operation was a Shiite mosque and that many of the victims were unarmed worshipers.

U.S. commanders said the raid, conducted by Iraqi special forces with American advisors, occurred six blocks away at an office complex where kidnappers were holding a hostage and a hidden cache of weapons. The hostage, an Iraqi dental technician, was freed and 16 militants were killed in an ensuing battle, they said.

"After the fact, someone went in and made the scene look different than it was," Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, told reporters in a conference call, suggesting that widely televised images purporting to depict a massacre at a mosque were propaganda tricks by unnamed parties. He did not elaborate.

Four witnesses standing separately outside the mosque, in the capital's Ur district, on Monday described an invasion of their streets by Iraqi and U.S. troops the night before. They said helicopters had flown overhead as Humvees surrounded the area around the Mustafa mosque and an adjacent office of Dawa, a Shiite party.

One witness said that what he saw inside the mosque was ghastly.

DOJ_NMG_0022564

"There were bullet casings and trails of blood on the floor of the prayer hall," said Hamid Jabar, a 61-year-old pensioner who lives across the street and said he entered the mosque shortly after troops left. "It looked like the men had been executed and dragged to the smaller rooms.

"Some were shot in the head and others in the chest," he said. "Some of the bodies were ripped open with knives."

Jabar and other witnesses said the Iraqi forces had fired their way into the Shiite party office and then burst into the mosque during evening prayers, handcuffing, blindfolding and shooting worshipers.

Two hours later, when quiet returned, residents who had cowered in nearby homes ventured into the compound and found bodies slumped in the party office and piled into two small rooms off the prayer hall, Jabar said.

He said there were 18 dead, all males — three in their 60s and one in his teens. At least 13, including a guard, were identified as members of Dawa, the party of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari.

The facade of the party office and several houses on the street were pocked with bullet holes. The three-story building where Jabar lives was partly burned by what residents called a rocket or grenade attack by the invading troops.

"My shop was full of people trying to escape the shooting," said Sayaid Thamir, a 50-year-old merchant who works across the street from the mosque. "Soldiers were shooting randomly everywhere. Cars were not allowed to move.

"What happened was terrifying," he said. "If they were looking for terrorists, why couldn't they do it quietly?"

No gunfire came from the mosque, several witnesses said.

"The Americans started the raid without giving us a chance to negotiate or to find out what they wanted," Sheik Safa Timimi, the imam of the mosque, said in an interview Monday on Iraqi radio. "Some young men tried to approach them but were shot at."

An Iraqi reporter for The Times who interviewed the four witnesses was unable to look inside the rooms of the mosque or the party office, which were locked Monday.

The explanation offered later by Chiarelli, in a post-midnight conference call, was also impossible to verify. An overnight curfew prevented reporters from going to the office complex, which the general said was the only target of the raid.

Whichever story is true, the killings threw Iraq's delicately balanced leadership into a crisis as it struggled to contain rising sectarian violence between majority Shiites and the country's Sunni minority. Weeks of intense negotiations to form a government with the Shiite, Sunni, Kurdish and secular blocs elected to parliament in December came to a halt, as Shiite representatives Monday failed to show up for talks on forming the government.

Shiite leaders said they were discussing the fallout from the killings and would not return to the multiparty talks until Wednesday at the earliest.

Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, a Shiite who heads Iraq's police forces, called the raid "an unjustified and horrible violation."

He said U.S. forces and the Iraqi army controlled the area of operation and barred police from entering.

In an unusually harsh condemnation of the United States, the United Iraqi Alliance called the raid a "serious crime" aimed at trying to weaken it politically against the Sunni-led insurgency.

"The government must find out the truth about these special units of the Iraqi army that function outside government control and perpetuate massacres with the support of the U.S. Army," said the statement by the Alliance, the Shiite coalition that leads the interim government.

U.S. officials and Iraqi critics of the government have blamed Jabr's ministry for sectarian killings, saying many have been carried out by Shiite militiamen who joined the police force but in fact operate as sectarian death squads.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has demanded that Jabr be replaced by someone not strongly identified with a particular sect.

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, said after speaking to Khalilzad on Monday that he would supervise a joint U.S.-Iraqi commission to investigate Sunday's incident.

"Those who are behind this attack must be brought to justice and punished," Talabani said in a brief televised address.

Anti-American sentiment stirred up by the killings filled the airwaves of Al Iraqiya, the state-run television network, and other broadcast media for a second day Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0022565

It spilled into the working-class streets of Ur as seven pickup trucks and other vehicles bore 16 wooden coffins in a slow cortege, followed by hundreds of mourners on foot. Residents said two other bodies had been sent away earlier for burial.

"No, no to America!" chanted a man identified only as Sheik Jalel, standing in the back of the lead truck. "No, no to the devil! No, no to Israel!"

The procession and its police escort wound past the crumbling white walls of the mosque compound, which bore banners denouncing the attack.

People spilled out of nearby shops and modest homes to march with the coffins. Others watched and wept from behind iron gates.

Chiarelli, the U.S. commander, declined to comment on possible involvement by the militia of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose political movement joined in condemning the raid.

"I think the backlash has been caused by the folks who set the scene up," the general said.

Neighbors of the mosque said Sadr's militia did not show up and confront the U.S. and Iraqi forces, dismissing early reports of a clash.

The conference call by Chiarelli and Army Maj. Gen. J.D. Thurman, the commander of Multinational Division Baghdad, was the first U.S. military briefing on Sunday's operation. Iraq's Defense Ministry has not commented on the operation.

Chiarelli said 50 Iraqi special forces troops arrived to raid the office complex at dusk Sunday, backed by 25 U.S. advisors, and came under fire from three sides as they neared the building. He said he did not know the affiliation of the insurgents.

The troops went in and "cleared the compound," he said, killing 16 and capturing three wounded militants along with 18 other suspects.

"It was the Iraqi forces who did the fighting," he added. "There was gunfire from every room."

The general said the freed dental technician had been taken hostage earlier in the day, "shown a picture of his daughter and told if he didn't pay $20,000 he was going to be dead the next day."

Thurman, whose division controls Baghdad, said the raid netted 34 assault rifles and some rocket-propelled grenades.

Asked about the Shiite alliance's condemnation of the raid, Chiarelli said: "It was coordinated through military channels. Not every operation we run is coordinated with every politician in Iraq."

General Addresses War Concerns (WT/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

ISTANBUL -- In the troubled region surrounding Iraq, a frequent question posed to the top U.S. military officer visiting the area was not when his troops will pull out of Iraq, but how long they will stay.

From the glittery king's palace in Saudi Arabia to the devastated slopes of the Pakistani mountainside and a staid Turkish symposium, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sought last week to ease concerns about whether opposition to the war at home could pressure U.S. forces to leave Iraq before it is stable.

"I think it's fair to say that in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, there is a clear desire for the U.S. to stay with it until the job is done -- which, coincidentally, is how we look at it," Gen. Pace said Sunday as he left Istanbul for Washington.

On his first diplomatic-oriented trip since the fall, Gen. Pace traveled to three countries whose leaders are worried about the U.S. commitment to the Iraq war and the global war on terror. Failure to secure Iraq could inspire insurgencies in their countries and instability in the region, where terrorism is a familiar threat.

Their fears are stoked by the American public's growing impatience with a war that has claimed the lives of more than 2,300 U.S. troops and the persistent calls from members of Congress for an exit strategy.

"I told them that from the U.S. military's viewpoint, we would stay with the mission until we got the job done," Gen. Pace said.

Those interests also at times conflict with strong anti-American sentiment in these Muslim countries, including Pakistan, where thousands protested the war during a recent visit by President Bush. Protesters were not evident during Gen. Pace's visit, but he often faced blunt questions about U.S. Middle East policies and progress in Iraq from both officials and the local press.

DOJ_NMG_0022566

Gen. Pace said people in the countries wanted to know what the United States' plans are for Iraq and Afghanistan, for dealing with Iran's nuclear program and for aiding the fight against guerrillas of the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or PKK, in northern Iraq and Turkey.

Turks worry that if U.S. troops leave Iraq too soon, the country could crumble and allow Kurdish rebels in the north to create an independent state along the Turkish border.

The Saudis, meanwhile, are concerned that sectarian violence in Iraq will expand into Saudi Arabia, and that a weakened Iraq will allow Iran to gain a foothold there, said Rachel Bronson, a Middle East specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations.

In Pakistan, there are ongoing efforts to ferret out terrorists traveling back and forth across the mountainous Afghan border, where some think Osama bin Laden may be hiding and directing his al Qaeda network.

"These are three countries where it is easy to have misunderstandings just because of cultural differences ... language and interpretations of what is being said," Gen. Pace said. "So, I was really pleased to have the opportunity to go face to face with my counterparts."

Arabs Discuss Wider Presence In Baghdad To Bolster Government (NYT)

By Abeer Allam

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, March 27 — Arab foreign ministers who gathered here over the weekend to prepare for a summit meeting agreed on a proposal to increase their diplomatic presence in Iraq.

The draft resolution, which does not offer a timetable, is expected to be approved by the 22 members of the Arab League meeting here on Tuesday and Wednesday.

The Bush administration has urged Arab nations to open diplomatic missions and embassies in Iraq to help give the new government legitimacy. But the ministers appeared to be less concerned about pleasing the United States than staving off the growing influence of Iran.

In particular, the agreement this month for the United States and Iran to hold talks about the future of Iraq was viewed with alarm.

"Who are they to decide on the future of a third country in the absence of Iraqis and the absence of the Arab world and the absence of everybody?" asked Hisham Yousef, chief of staff of the Arab League. But Mr. Yousef said such discussions, in the context of trying to help the Iraqis overcome their problems, would be appropriate.

The Iraqi foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, criticized the Arab countries for failing to support Iraq by providing full diplomatic presence and debt forgiveness.

"Why are you complaining about the Iranian role in Iraq when the Iranians are there and you are not?" Mr. Zebari said. "We have been asking for you to play a role for the past three years and you have not responded."

Arab diplomatic missions have maintained minimal staffs in Iraq since the American-led invasion in 2003 and particularly after two Algerian diplomats and an Egyptian envoy were kidnapped and killed there in July.

Iraq also remains saddled with billions of dollars in debt to Persian Gulf states that helped finance the 1980-88 war with Iran. The Arab leaders are expected to discuss the issue of debt forgiveness this week.

The Arab leaders will also try to produce unified positions on a host of crises simmering across the Middle East, including the new Hamas-led Palestinian government, tensions between Lebanon and Syria, Iran's nuclear program and the conflict in the Darfur region of Sudan.

In another draft resolution, the ministers agreed to maintain Arab aid to the Palestinian Authority at $55 million a month.

While the Arab League had previously agreed to that amount, its members have contributed only about $30 million.

If adopted, the resolution could result in an increase in aid. One reason for the action would be to counter Iranian influence.

The United States and Europe threaten to cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority when its government is taken over by Hamas, which won an election in January but which they consider to be a terrorist organization.

Iran has offered to cover the resulting shortfall for the Palestinians, an estimated $130 million a month.

DOJ_NMG_0022567

"We believe that the assistance to the Palestinians should continue," Mr. Yousef said. "The assistance before was not for Fatah and this time it will not be for Hamas, but rather for the Palestinian Authority and the Palestinian people. The world should not punish the Palestinians for their democratic choice."

U.S. Is Not Probing Iraqi Leak Claims (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

The U.S. military's Central Command said yesterday it has not opened an investigation into whether sources inside the command leaked details of the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq to Russian officials, and distanced itself from captured Iraqi documents that contain the allegations.

A U.S. military study released Friday quoted two Iraqi documents that described how Russian officials -- drawing on "their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha" -- provided intelligence on U.S. troop movements and war plans to Saddam Hussein as U.S. forces attacked in March and April 2003.

A Central Command official said the command takes "all matters of operational security seriously" but was not probing the allegations.

"Centcom has not opened an investigation at this time," said Capt. Christopher Augustine, a spokesman for the Tampa-based command, which oversees U.S. military operations in the Middle East and other areas.

In e-mailed statements in response to questions, Centcom cast doubt upon the validity of the captured Iraqi documents: "It's important to remember that the information came from an Iraqi intelligence report.

"Central command does not vouch for the document's accuracy or authenticity," the statement said.

During the buildup of U.S. forces in Kuwait before the invasion of Iraq, Centcom noted, speculation was widespread about "what might or might not be planned."

Such views contrast with those of the authors of the 210-page Iraqi Perspectives Project study released Friday by the U.S. Joint Forces Command in Norfolk. They said they believe the Iraqi documents are authentic. Retired Lt. Col. Kevin M. Woods, the project director, said he had "no reason to doubt the Iraqi documents."

On Saturday, Russia's foreign intelligence service called the allegations in the documents "baseless accusations" and "fabrications," and denied that Russian officials gave Hussein information on the U.S. military operations in Iraq.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a television interview Sunday that the Bush administration would take "a real hard look at the documents and then raise it with the Russian government."

Yesterday, Central Command indicated that it would defer to State on the matter. "According to Secretary of State Rice, the State Department will address the issue through appropriate channels," its statement said.

Augustine, the Central Command spokesman, said no one in his office knew of the existence of the Iraqi documents before the study's release on Friday, and that it was "highly possible" the military released them without prior vetting by Central Command.

Russia Knocks U.S. Motives For Spy Report (AP)

AP, March 27, 2006

Russia's foreign minister accused the United States on Monday of having "hidden political motives" for a report that said Moscow turned over information on American military plans to Saddam Hussein during the invasion of Iraq.

Sergey Lavrov's comments were the first formal statement from President Vladimir Putin's government about the Pentagon report, though a spokesman for Russia's foreign spy agency over the weekend denied the report's allegations.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will discuss the matter with Lavrov — either when the foreign ministers of the five permanent U.N. Security Council members and Germany meet in Berlin on Thursday or by telephone, the State Department said. In Berlin, the ministers will be discussing what to do about Iran's suspect nuclear program.

The Pentagon report released Friday said two captured Iraqi documents indicate that Russia obtained information from sources "inside the American Central Command" in Qatar. Russia passed battlefield intelligence to Saddam through the former Russian ambassador in Baghdad, Vladimir Titorenko, according to the Pentagon report.

DOJ_NMG_0022568

The unclassified report does not assess the value or accuracy of the information Saddam got or offer details on Russia's information pipeline. Moscow fiercely opposed the U.S.-led war to oust Saddam.

Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service dismissed the claims over the weekend as "baseless accusations," and Lavrov reiterated that dismissal Monday.

"How this was done allows one to speculate that this has hidden political motives and that this is being done in connection with Iraq, but I can hardly be sure of it," Lavrov said.

"It is unclear to us why the international community has to learn about such facts regarding Russian intelligence cooperation in Iraq from the media."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried conveyed a U.S. request that the Russian government look at the matter through Moscow's ambassador in Washington.

"Clearly, as the secretary stated over the weekend, any hint that information provided to the Iraqis may have put our troops in harm's way would be very concerning," McCormack said.

Rice said Sunday that the Bush administration will ask Russia about the report.

"Any implication that there were those from a foreign government who may have been passing information to the Iraqis prior to the invasion would be, of course, very worrying," Rice said on CNN's "Late Edition."

"I would think the Russians would want to take that very seriously as well."

Russian Intelligence (WP)

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

YOU'D THINK that evidence that a supposedly friendly country had delivered detailed military intelligence to an American enemy at a time of war would quickly provoke a reaction from the U.S. government: at the least, a demand for a full explanation, followed by a reassessment of relations with that country. But that's not how the Bush administration handles Vladimir Putin's Russia.

For some time the administration has been in possession of captured Iraqi documents describing how the Russian ambassador in Baghdad supplied Saddam Hussein with information about U.S. troop movements before and during the invasion of Iraq, including the critical intelligence that U.S. forces planned to bypass Iraqi cities and press through the "Karbala Gap" to Baghdad.

Yet it was not until they were questioned about the documents on national television over the weekend that senior national security officials offered that they would ask the Russian government about them. And even that was qualified.

"I do think we have to look at the documents and look very carefully," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. "But I don't want of jump out ahead and start making accusations about what the Russians may or may not have known." Fair enough, but a Pentagon study has already been through at least part of that exercise. It found no reason to doubt the documents' authenticity.

The news that Moscow would have helped Saddam Hussein fight U.S. forces might be unwelcome to those administration officials who still try to portray Mr. Putin as a partner of the West and a worthy host for the next summit of the Group of Eight nations. But it shouldn't be surprising. As has been well documented, Russia did its best to weaken and then break the sanctions regime imposed on Iraq, and then to prevent the 2003 invasion. In exchange it reaped lucrative economic concessions from Saddam Hussein, including the payment of large bribes to senior officials and politicians.

Moreover, Mr. Putin has done his best to undermine or defeat U.S. policies in much of the rest of the world. He has fought President Bush's efforts to promote democracy in the Muslim countries of Central Asia, rushing to embrace the autocratic president of Uzbekistan when his massacre of opposition protesters led to a rift with Washington and the closure of an important U.S. air base. He welcomed the Islamic movement Hamas to Moscow just as the Bush administration was trying to arrange its international isolation. He is propping up the dictator of Belarus even as the United States and European Union impose sanctions on him for staging fraudulent elections.

Ms. Rice and other Putin apologists ignore all this in part because they believe Russia will be helpful in stopping Iran's nuclear program. But Russia hasn't been helpful. Since its compromise offer to allow Iran to enrich uranium in Russian facilities failed to gain traction, it has dedicated itself to blocking concerted action by the United States and its European allies in the U.N.

Security Council. Meanwhile it is discussing the sale to Iran of surface-to-air missiles. As Mr. Putin knows, Iran wants those weapons in the event its drive to obtain nuclear bombs eventually leads to a military confrontation -- with the United States. But the possible consequences of bolstering the defenses of a U.S enemy may not deter him. After all, he has suffered none for Russia's actions in Iraq.

U.S. Makes Seized Iraqi Documents Public (AP-Y2)

By Robert Tanner

AP2, March 27, 2006

The federal government is making public a huge trove of documents seized during the invasion of Iraq, posting them on the Internet in a step that is at once a nod to the Web's power and an admission that U.S. intelligence resources are overloaded.

Republican leaders in Congress pushed for the release, which was first proposed by conservative commentators and bloggers hoping to find evidence about the fate of Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs, or possible links to terror groups.

The Web surfers have begun posting translations and comments, digging through the documents with gusto. The idea of the government turning over a massive database to volunteers is revolutionary — and not only to them.

"Let's unleash the power of the Internet on these documents," said House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. "I don't know if there's a smoking gun on WMD or not. But it will give us a better understanding of what was going on in Iraq before the war."

The documents' value is uncertain — intelligence officials say that they are giving each one a quick review to remove anything sensitive. Skeptics of the war, suspicious of the Bush administration, believe that means the postings are either useless or cherry-picked to bolster arguments for the war.

The documents — Iraqi memos, training guides, reports, transcripts of conversations, audiotapes and videotapes — have spurred a flurry of news reports. The Associated Press, for instance, reported on memos from Saddam Hussein in 1987 ordering plans for a chemical attack on Kurds and comments from Hussein and his aides in the 1990s, searching for ways to prove they didn't have weapons.

Hoekstra said it took months of arguing with intelligence officials before he and John Negroponte, the new Director of National Intelligence, agreed to make the documents public. None contain current information about the Iraqi insurgency, and U.S. intelligence officials say they are focusing their limited resources on learning about what's happening on the ground now.

There are up to 55,000 boxes, with possibly millions of pages. The documents are being posted a few at a time — so far, about 600 — on a Pentagon Web site, often in Arabic with an English summary.

Regardless of what they reveal, open-government advocates like the decision to make them available.

It's a "radical notion," said Steve Aftergood at the Federation of American Scientists government secrecy project, which tracks work by U.S. intelligence agencies. That "members of the public could contribute to the intelligence analysis process. ... That is a bold innovation."

Champions of the Internet as a "citizen's media" embraced the step, too.

"The secret of the 21st century is attract a lot of smart people to focus on problems that you think are important," said Glenn Reynolds, the conservative blogger at Instapundit.com and author of "An Army of Davids: How Markets and Technology Empower Ordinary People to Beat Big Media, Big Government and Other Goliaths."

"It's kind of like a swarm. It's a lot of individual minds looking at it from different angles. The stuff that's most interesting tends to bubble to the top," he said.

A self-described Iraqi blogger translated one of the documents for the American blog pajamasmedia.com — a Sept. 15, 2001, memo from the Iraqi intelligence service that reported about an Afghan source who had been told that a group from Osama bin Laden and the Taliban had visited Iraq.

Some remain doubtful, suspecting that the administration only releases information that puts President Bush and his arguments for war in a good light. The Iraq Survey Group found no stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction after the war, and the Sept. 11 commission reported it found no "collaborative relationship" between Iraq and al-Qaida.

DOJ_NMG_0022570

"I would bet that the materials that they chose to post were the ones that were suggestive of a threat," said John Prados, author of the book, "Hoodwinked: The Documents That Reveal How Bush Sold Us a War."

Prados, an analyst with the National Security Archive, a non-governmental research institute, dismissed the documents: "The collection is good material for somebody who wants to do a biography of Saddam Hussein, but in terms of saying one thing or the other about weapons of mass destruction, it's not there."

One of several conservative blogs devoting attention to the release, Powerline.com, set up a separate page to catalog its findings and news reports on what the documents reveal.

"These documents are going to shed a lot of light on a regime that was quite successful in maintaining secrecy," said John Hinderaker, one of three men who run the site. "Before the first Gulf War, Saddam was perilously close to getting nuclear weapons and people didn't know it. The evils of the regime will be reflected."

But he also cautioned the optimistic. "When you're dealing with millions of pages of documents," he said, "it's a big mistake to think you can pull out one page or sentence out of a document and say 'Eureka, this is it.'"

Iraqi Documents Are Put On Web, And Search Is On (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — American intelligence agencies and presidential commissions long ago concluded that Saddam Hussein had no unconventional weapons and no substantive ties to Al Qaeda before the 2003 invasion.

But now, an unusual experiment in public access is giving anyone with a computer a chance to play intelligence analyst and second-guess the government.

Under pressure from Congressional Republicans, the director of national intelligence has begun a yearlong process of posting on the Web 48,000 boxes of Arabic-language Iraqi documents captured by American troops.

Less than two weeks into the project, and with only 600 out of possibly a million documents and video and audio files posted, some conservative bloggers are already asserting that the material undermines the official view.

On his blog last week, Ray Robison, a former Army officer from Alabama, quoted a document reporting a supposed scheme to put anthrax into American leaflets dropped in Iraq and declared: "Saddam's W.M.D. and terrorist connections all proven in one document!!!"

Not so, American intelligence officials say. "Our view is there's nothing in here that changes what we know today," said a senior intelligence official, who would discuss the program only on condition of anonymity because the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, directed his staff to avoid public debates over the documents. "There is no smoking gun on W.M.D., Al Qaeda, those kinds of issues."

All the documents, which are available on fmso.leavenworth.army.mil/products-docex.htm, have received at least a quick review by Arabic linguists and do not alter the government's official stance, officials say. On some tapes already released, in fact, Mr. Hussein expressed frustration that he did not have unconventional weapons.

Intelligence officials had serious concerns about turning loose an army of amateurs on a warehouse full of raw documents that include hearsay, disinformation and forgery. Mr. Negroponte's office attached a disclaimer to the documents, only a few of which have been translated into English, saying the government did not vouch for their authenticity.

Another administration official described the political logic: "If anyone in the intelligence community thought there was valid information in those documents that supported either of those questions — W.M.D. or Al Qaeda — they would have shouted them from the rooftops."

But Representative Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee and who led the campaign to get the documents released, does not believe they have received adequate scrutiny. Mr. Hoekstra said he wanted to "unleash the power of the Net" to do translation and analysis that might take the government decades.

DOJ_NMG_0022571

"People today ought to be able to have a closer look inside Saddam's regime," he said.

Mr. Hoekstra said intelligence officials had resisted posting the documents, which he overcame by appealing to President Bush and by proposing legislation to force the release.

The timing gives the documents a potent political charge. Public doubts about the war have driven Mr. Bush's approval rating to new lows. A renewed debate over Saddam Hussein's weapons and terrorist ties could raise the president's standing.

"As an historian, I'm glad to have the material out there," said John Prados, who has written books on national security, including one that accuses the administration of distorting prewar intelligence. He said the records were likely to shed new light on the Iraqi dictatorship. Some of the documents, also included in a new study by the United States military, already have caused a stir by suggesting that Russian officials passed American war plans to Mr. Hussein's government as the invasion began.

But Mr. Prados said the document release "can't be divorced from the political context."

"The administration is under fire for going to war when there was no threat — so the idea here must be to say there was a threat," he said.

That is already the assertion of a growing crowd of bloggers and translators, almost exclusively on the right. So far they have highlighted documents that refer to a meeting between Osama bin Laden and an Iraqi intelligence officer in Sudan in 1995; a plan to train Arab militants as suicide bombers; and a 1997 document discussing the use of "special ammunition," chemical weapons, against the Kurds.

But the anthrax document that intrigued Mr. Robison, the Alabama blogger, does not seem to prove much. It is a message from the Quds Army, a regional militia created by Mr. Hussein, to Iraqi military intelligence that passes on reports picked up by troops, possibly from the radio, since the information is labeled "open source" and "impaired broadcast." No anthrax was found in Iraq by American search teams.

"No offense, but the mainstream media tells people what they want them to know," said Mr. Robison, who worked in Qatar for the Iraq Survey Group, which did an exhaustive search for weapons in Iraq.

The document release may help the president, he said, but that is not the point. "It's not about politics," Mr. Robison said. "It's about the truth."

The truth about prewar Iraq has proven elusive. The February 2003 presentation Colin L. Powell, the secretary of state at the time, to the United Nations appeared to provide incontrovertible proof of Iraqi weapons, but the claims in the speech have since been discredited.

Given that track record, some intelligence analysts are horrified at exactly the idea that excites Mr. Hoekstra and the bloggers: that anyone will now be able to interpret the documents.

"There's no quality control," said Michael Scheuer, a former Central Intelligence Agency specialist on terrorism. "You'll have guys out there with a smattering of Arabic drawing all kinds of crazy conclusions. Rush Limbaugh will cherry-pick from the right, and Al Franken will cherry-pick from the left."

Conservative publications have pushed for months to have the documents made public. In November, Mr. Hoekstra and Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, asked Mr. Negroponte to post the material.

When that request stalled, Mr. Hoekstra introduced a bill on March 3 that would have forced the posting. Mr. Negroponte began the release two weeks later.

Under the program, documents are withheld only if they include information like the names of Iraqis raped by the secret police, instructions for using explosives, intelligence sources or "diplomatically sensitive" material.

In addition, the intelligence official said, known forgeries are not posted. He said the database included "a fair amount of forgeries," sold by Iraqi hustlers or concocted by Iraqis opposed to Mr. Hussein.

In previous Internet projects, volunteers have tested software, scanned chemical compounds for useful drugs and even searched radiotelescope data for signals from extraterrestrial life.

The same volunteer spirit, though with a distinct political twist, motivates the Arabic speakers who are posting English versions of the Iraqi documents.

DOJ_NMG_0022572

"I'm trying to pick up documents that shed light on the political debate," said Joseph G. Shahda, 34, a Lebanese-born engineer who lives in a Boston suburb and is spending hours every evening on translations for the conservative Free Republic site. "I think we prematurely concluded there was no W.M.D. and no ties to Al Qaeda."

Mr. Shahda said he was proud he could help make the documents public. "I live in this great country, and it's a time of war," he said. "This is the least I can do."

Enemy Of Our Enemy (NYT)

By Peter Bergen

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

Washington

BUSH administration defenders, right-wing bloggers and neoconservative publications are crowing about Iraqi documents newly released by the Pentagon that, they say, prove that Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein were in league.

Even though the 9/11 commission found no "collaborative relationship" between the ultrafundamentalist Osama bin Laden and the secular Saddam Hussein, the administration's reiterations of a supposed connection — Vice President Dick Cheney has argued that the evidence for such an alliance was "overwhelming" — have convinced two out of three Americans that they had "strong" links.

Some administration supporters have drawn an analogy to the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, in which Stalin and Hitler put aside ideology in favor of pragmatic goals (carving up the Baltic states, Poland and Finland). But history is not a good guide here: not only was the ideological divide between Al Qaeda and Baathist Iraq far greater than that between the two 20th-century dictators, but unlike Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, the two sides had nothing practical to gain by working together.

What do the new documents establish? According to ABC News's translation of one of the most credible documents, in early 1995 Mr. bin Laden — then living in Sudan — met with an Iraqi government representative and discussed "carrying out joint operations against foreign forces" in Saudi Arabia. The document also noted that the "development of the relationship and cooperation between the two parties" was "to be left according to what's open [in the future] based on dialogue and agreement on other ways of cooperation."

The results of this meeting were ... nothing. Two subsequent attacks against American forces in Saudi Arabia — a car bombing that year and the Khobar Towers attack in 1996 — were carried out, respectively, by locals who said they were influenced by Mr. bin Laden and by the Saudi branch of Hezbollah, a Shiite group aided by Iranian government officials.

As for the other new documents, there is one dated Sept. 15, 2001, that outlines contacts between Mr. bin Laden and Iraq, but it is based on an Afghan informant discussing a conversation with another Afghan. It is third-hand hearsay.

And, strangely, another document, dated Aug. 17, 2002, from Iraq's intelligence service explains there is "information from a reliable source" that two Al Qaeda figures were in Iraq and that agents should "search the tourist sites (hotels, residential apartments and rented houses)" for them. If Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda had a relationship, why was it necessary for Iraqi intelligence to be scouring the country looking for members of the terrorist organization?

Another striking feature about the supposed Qaeda-Iraq connection is that since the fall of the Taliban, not one of the thousands of documents found in Afghanistan substantiate such an alliance, even though Al Qaeda was a highly bureaucratic organization that required potential recruits to fill out application forms.

All this goes to the central problem faced by proponents of the Qaeda-Iraq connection. It's long been known that Iraqi officials were playing footsie with Al Qaeda in the mid-1990's, but these desultory contacts never yielded any cooperation. And why should they have? Al Qaeda was able to carry out the embassy attacks in Africa in 1998, the bombing of the destroyer Cole in 2000 and 9/11 with no help from Iraq. The Iraqi intelligence services, for their part, could handle by themselves low-level jobs like bumping off Iraqi dissidents abroad. And after the botched attempt to assassinate former President George H. W. Bush in Kuwait in 1993, Saddam Hussein never attempted terrorism against an American target again.

We know, too, that Mr. bin Laden had long distrusted Saddam Hussein; months before the Kuwait invasion in 1990 he angrily warned colleagues that Iraq had designs on Persian Gulf states. He even offered his own fighters to the Saudis in that war, making it clear that he yearned for the "infidel" dictator to be overthrown.

DOJ_NMG_0022573

If there was a method to Saddam Hussein's madness, it was that he wanted to remain in power. Al Qaeda, however, wanted theocratic regime change across the Middle East. In the end, their goals and worldviews were diametrically opposed, and no number of sketchy intelligence documents is going to bring them closer.

Unfair, Unbalanced Channels (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Bush administration has poured millions of dollars into creating Western-style news media in Iraq, backing at least two television channels as well as training programs for Iraqi journalists on balance and ethics.

The effort has helped launch more than a dozen Iraqi channels. But the result is hardly what the administration set out to accomplish. Most of the channels are increasingly sectarian and often appear to be inflaming the country's tensions, critics say.

The result was highly visible Sunday and Monday as the state-owned Al Iraqiya station interrupted its regular schedule to broadcast nonstop footage of bloodied corpses at what it said was a Baghdad mosque.

U.S. and Iraqi forces had killed at least 16 people Sunday evening in what Americans said was a shootout with militants. On Al Iraqiya, the raid was portrayed as the killing of unarmed worshipers in a Shiite Muslim mosque. Between interviews with Shiite politicians criticizing the Americans, the camera lingered on the dead and the grieving relatives.

The channel was created by the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority as an experiment in public broadcasting. It was later turned over to the Iraqi government, but is now widely viewed as sectarian.

"It was supposed to be fair, and address all the people of Iraq, but so far it hasn't succeeded in achieving this unique goal," said Mohammad Shaboot, editor of the state-run Al Sabah daily. "No one has invested in a real, nationwide Iraqi channel for all Iraqis."

Homebound because of violence and curfews, Iraqis watch their world through the kaleidoscope of satellite TV. But channel surfing Iraqi-style often offers views of the country through a sectarian lens.

Click the remote, and on one channel, the anchor refers to the Sunni-led insurgency as the "honorable resistance" as images of wounded Iraqis and aggressive U.S. soldiers flash on screen.

Click the remote again, and the insurgents are described as terrorists and the speakers praise crackdowns by the Shiite-led government.

Click again, and the insurgency might well not exist.

Until the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, the two governmentsanctioned channels offered only presidential propaganda and patriotic tunes.

The toppling of former President Saddam Hussein's regime, however, prompted a TV revolution and the launch of the more than a dozen Iraqi channels. They lure viewers with popular Iraqi-made dramas such as the Sopranos-style gangster show "Departures," the irreverent "Saturday Night Live"-like "Caricature" and a host of reality TV and makeover shows.

But while escapist entertainment flourished, news programming proved more problematic.

The coverage in the aftermath of the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, an attack that brought the country close to civil war, was particularly incendiary.

Channels with ties to Sunni Arabs such as Baghdad TV — headed by former Baath Party member Saad Bazzaz and run by the Iraqi Islamic Party, the main Sunni political group — highlighted the suffering of Sunnis in reprisal attacks.

Stations run by Shiites, such as Al Furat and the government's Al Iraqiya, focused on the damage to the shrine and the suffering of Shiites under Hussein.

"Al Furat was pouring petrol on the fire, and Baghdad TV was doing the same thing on the other side," said Shaboot, the newspaper editor.

On Baghdad TV, Sunni studio hosts took calls from the audience, with some callers encouraging the audience to form a Sunni militia to counter the so-called Shiite militia.

Al Furat, backed by the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq — the main Shiite political party — meanwhile was airing slogans demanding that Shiites stand up for their rights.

DOJ_NMG_0022574

Al Iraqiya initially lacked credibility because of its American origins. Now some Shiites are critical of its Shiite focus and obsequious coverage of the Shiite-led government.

"When something happens in [Shiite-dominated] Karbala or Kadhimiya, we see that there is full coverage," said Ahmed Hussein, a 33-year-old Shiite businessman. "But when something happens in [the largely Sunni city of] Fallouja, there is not that much coverage, so we hear the Sunnis ask, 'Why?' "

Other channels are even more sectarian in their coverage.

On a recent day, amid kids' cartoons, Lebanese pop music videos and reruns of old Egyptian movies, a viewer could watch Al Furat's female news anchor, dressed in black hijab and abaya, introduce a speech by the leader of the largest Shiite party about Shiite families displaced by sectarian violence.

After the news, a montage showed worshipers kissing the walls of the Shiite holy shrines in Najaf and Karbala as a singer recited religious songs.

Meanwhile, on Baghdad TV, known as "Baathist TV" among some Shiites who criticize its pro-Sunni agenda, an Indonesian singer was wooing his audience from the stage, bathed in disco lights, followed by a corpulent host wearing a suit and a sky blue tie talking with a prominent Sunni cleric by phone. The program, "Under the Shadow of Sharia," dealt with questions about how to live according to religious edicts.

Farther along the spectrum, Al Rafidain showed a series of vox pop interviews. Everyone on the Arab street held the same view:

"The occupiers came to destroy us," said one man.

"The occupation cannot last," said another. "By the will of God, we will get rid of them."

On Baghdadia, a moderate Sunni channel, the anchor was delivering the top news of the day: "President Bush confesses that occupying Iraq is a very difficult task."

News directors across the political spectrum defend their own coverage while deriding their competitors as sectarian. Ahmed Rushdi, the news director of Baghdad TV, said that unlike state-controlled Al Iraqiya, his channel had no sectarian bias — even though it's backed by a major Sunni political group.

"We are always showing the facts as they are," he said.

Baghdad TV has no correspondents in either of the Shiite holy cities of Najaf and Karbala, which Rushdi chalked up to Baghdad TV's being "new in the business" and still recruiting journalists around the country.

Even sports coverage has a political bent.

"We concentrate on sport stars who were oppressed during Saddam's time," said Muhsin Fasani of Al Furat, which is aimed at religiously conservative Shiites.

On the U.S.-backed channel Al Hurra, or "the Free One," a television host in a crisp blue suit profiled a Syrian dissident. "An eye on democracy opens the eye on freedom," one guest said. The channel carries most speeches by Bush in addition to a youth-oriented mix of entertainment and news.

Despite U.S. efforts, many educated Iraqis now prefer the slick, well-funded Persian Gulf-based stations such as Al Arabiya and Al Jazeera, often criticized by the U.S. government for being anti-American and pro-insurgency, because they focus on regional economic and environmental issues instead of just daily violence.

Hussein, the Shiite businessman, said he even preferred the Arabic-language version of the Discovery Channel to the Iraqi networks. "They like to analyze problems and find solutions."

While the Bush administration has been touting the proliferation of media outlets in the country as an example of newfound freedoms, some Iraqis are tuning out, exercising democracy by remote control.

"It's a luxury now to have different channels," Shaboot said. Iraqis "are hungry for it, but I'm not sure they are happy with it."

Tony Blair Defends His Policy On Iraq (AP)

By Rod McGuirk

AP, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022575

British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday pledged to keep British troops in Iraq and Afghanistan until those countries are stabilized.

"If the going is tough, we tough it out," Blair told a rare joint session of Australia's Parliament.

Blair told lawmakers that the "immediate threat is from Islamist extremism," which he said was "not a passing spasm of anger but a global ideology at war with us and our way of life."

Britain and Australia were the only two nations to send troops to fight alongside U.S. forces in the invasion of Iraq three years ago and both countries still have forces in the country and in Afghanistan fighting Taliban and al-Qaida insurgents.

"If we want to secure our way of life, there is no alternative but to fight for it," he said. "That means standing up for our values not just in our own countries but the world over."

In a key foreign policy speech, Blair said the struggle was not just against "those who hate us," but also against opponents who believe Britain and its allies fight for their values selectively.

"This struggle is about justice and fairness as well as security and prosperity," he said. "And in truth today there is no prosperity without security and no security without justice. That is the consequence of an interconnected world."

He pointed to recent elections in both Iraq and Afghanistan as symbols of the values he was advocating and said those countries were "engaged in a titanic struggle to be free of a legacy of oppression, stagnation and servitude."

Blair also strongly defended the U.S. role in the struggle, saying the alliance he was describing "does not end with, but does begin with America."

He said that having Washington as an ally could sometimes be difficult, but said the United States was key to victory.

"The danger with America today is not that they are too much involved, the danger is that they decide to pull up the drawbridge and disengage. We need them involved, we want them engaged," he said. "The reality is that none of the problems that press in on us can be resolved or even contemplated without them."

In an earlier interview, Blair declined to say how long British troops might remain in Iraq.

"What's happening now in Iraq is that the Iraqi security forces and the army are building up their capability and as that happens, we can draw down," he told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

"Will we be able to make substantial troop reductions? ... In my view, that is possible provided, of course, that the Iraqi capability has been built up and sustained," he said.

British And Australian PMs Defend Iraq Involvement (AFP)

AFP, March 28, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his Australian counterpart John Howard defended their involvement in the US-led Iraq war, describing the political situation there as "inspiring."

At a joint press conference to wrap up his four-day visit to Australia, Blair said that despite a precarious security situation in Iraq, the world was better off as a result of the March 2003 invasion.

"I just pose this question -- would the world be safer today if Saddam Hussein was still in power? I can't believe the answer to that is yes," Blair told reporters.

"Whatever the problems in Iraq, the people there want to work together and want democracy. What you've got, true, is a very, very difficult security situation but what you have on the political side is really something quite inspiring.

"For all the difficulties, that's why I think it's important we see it through."

Howard said he was happy with Australia's involvement in Iraq and that talk of pulling out troops would send the wrong message to the Iraqi people.

"I am happy to continue to defend the original decision to be involved in Iraq and I certainly can defend with some passion a continuation of our presence," he said.

"In the light of what is happening in Iraq I can't think of anything worse than a signal to the Iraqi people who have braved their all to embrace democracy, I can't think of anything more calculated to break their spirit, than for countries like Australia and Britain to be talking about pulling out."

DOJ_NMG_0022576

Earlier during his visit, Blair foreshadowed a possible substantial "draw down" of British troops in Iraq but gave no timeframe and said it would only happen only once Iraqi security forces were capable of defending the country.

Australia has about 900 troops in Iraq, while Britain has some 8,000.

Bush Was Set On Path To War, British Memo Says (NYT)

By Don Van Natta Jr.

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

LONDON — In the weeks before the United States-led invasion of Iraq, as the United States and Britain pressed for a second United Nations resolution condemning Iraq, President Bush's public ultimatum to Saddam Hussein was blunt: Disarm or face war.

But behind closed doors, the president was certain that war was inevitable. During a private two-hour meeting in the Oval Office on Jan. 31, 2003, he made clear to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain that he was determined to invade Iraq without the second resolution, or even if international arms inspectors failed to find unconventional weapons, said a confidential memo about the meeting written by Mr. Blair's top foreign policy adviser and reviewed by The New York Times.

"Our diplomatic strategy had to be arranged around the military planning," David Manning, Mr. Blair's chief foreign policy adviser at the time, wrote in the memo that summarized the discussion between Mr. Bush, Mr. Blair and six of their top aides.

"The start date for the military campaign was now penciled in for 10 March," Mr. Manning wrote, paraphrasing the president. "This was when the bombing would begin."

The timetable came at an important diplomatic moment. Five days after the Bush-Blair meeting, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell was scheduled to appear before the United Nations to present the American evidence that Iraq posed a threat to world security by hiding unconventional weapons.

Although the United States and Britain aggressively sought a second United Nations resolution against Iraq — which they failed to obtain — the president said repeatedly that he did not believe he needed it for an invasion.

Stamped "extremely sensitive," the five-page memorandum, which was circulated among a handful of Mr. Blair's most senior aides, had not been made public. Several highlights were first published in January in the book "Lawless World," which was written by a British lawyer and international law professor, Philippe Sands. In early February, Channel 4 in London first broadcast several excerpts from the memo.

Since then, The New York Times has reviewed the five-page memo in its entirety. While the president's sentiments about invading Iraq were known at the time, the previously unreported material offers an unfiltered view of two leaders on the brink of war, yet supremely confident.

The memo indicates the two leaders envisioned a quick victory and a transition to a new Iraqi government that would be complicated, but manageable. Mr. Bush predicted that it was "unlikely there would be internecine warfare between the different religious and ethnic groups." Mr. Blair agreed with that assessment.

The memo also shows that the president and the prime minister acknowledged that no unconventional weapons had been found inside Iraq. Faced with the possibility of not finding any before the planned invasion, Mr. Bush talked about several ways to provoke a confrontation, including a proposal to paint a United States surveillance plane in the colors of the United Nations in hopes of drawing fire, or assassinating Mr. Hussein.

Those proposals were first reported last month in the British press, but the memo does not make clear whether they reflected Mr. Bush's extemporaneous suggestions, or were elements of the government's plan.

Consistent Remarks

Two senior British officials confirmed the authenticity of the memo, but declined to talk further about it, citing Britain's Official Secrets Act, which made it illegal to divulge classified information. But one of them said, "In all of this discussion during the run-up to the Iraq war, it is obvious that viewing a snapshot at a certain point in time gives only a partial view of the decision-making process."

DOJ_NMG_0022577

On Sunday, Frederick Jones, the spokesman for the National Security Council, said the president's public comments were consistent with his private remarks made to Mr. Blair. "While the use of force was a last option, we recognized that it might be necessary and were planning accordingly," Mr. Jones said.

"The public record at the time, including numerous statements by the President, makes clear that the administration was continuing to pursue a diplomatic solution into 2003," he said. "Saddam Hussein was given every opportunity to comply, but he chose continued defiance, even after being given one final opportunity to comply or face serious consequences. Our public and private comments are fully consistent."

The January 2003 memo is the latest in a series of secret memos produced by top aides to Mr. Blair that summarize private discussions between the president and the prime minister. Another group of British memos, including the so-called Downing Street memo written in July 2002, showed that some senior British officials had been concerned that the United States was determined to invade Iraq, and that the "intelligence and facts were being fixed around the policy" by the Bush administration to fit its desire to go to war.

The latest memo is striking in its characterization of frank, almost casual, conversation by Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair about the most serious subjects. At one point, the leaders swapped ideas for a postwar Iraqi government. "As for the future government of Iraq, people would find it very odd if we handed it over to another dictator," the prime minister is quoted as saying.

"Bush agreed," Mr. Manning wrote. This exchange, like most of the quotations in this article, have not been previously reported.

Mr. Bush was accompanied at the meeting by Condoleezza Rice, who was then the national security adviser; Dan Fried, a senior aide to Ms. Rice; and Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff. Along with Mr. Manning, Mr. Blair was joined by two other senior aides: Jonathan Powell, his chief of staff, and Matthew Rycroft, a foreign policy aide and the author of the Downing Street memo.

By late January 2003, United Nations inspectors had spent six weeks in Iraq hunting for weapons under the auspices of Security Council Resolution 1441, which authorized "serious consequences" if Iraq voluntarily failed to disarm. Led by Hans Blix, the inspectors had reported little cooperation from Mr. Hussein, and no success finding any unconventional weapons.

At their meeting, Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair candidly expressed their doubts that chemical, biological or nuclear weapons would be found in Iraq in the coming weeks, the memo said. The president spoke as if an invasion was unavoidable. The two leaders discussed a timetable for the war, details of the military campaign and plans for the aftermath of the war.

Discussing Provocation

Without much elaboration, the memo also says the president raised three possible ways of provoking a confrontation. Since they were first reported last month, neither the White House nor the British government has discussed them.

"The U.S. was thinking of flying U2 reconnaissance aircraft with fighter cover over Iraq, painted in U.N. colours," the memo says, attributing the idea to Mr. Bush. "If Saddam fired on them, he would be in breach."

It also described the president as saying, "The U.S. might be able to bring out a defector who could give a public presentation about Saddam's W.M.D," referring to weapons of mass destruction.

A brief clause in the memo refers to a third possibility, mentioned by Mr. Bush, a proposal to assassinate Saddam Hussein. The memo does not indicate how Mr. Blair responded to the idea.

Mr. Sands first reported the proposals in his book, although he did not use any direct quotations from the memo. He is a professor of international law at University College of London and the founding member of the Matrix law office in London, where the prime minister's wife, Cherie Blair, is a partner.

Mr. Jones, the National Security Council spokesman, declined to discuss the proposals, saying, "We are not going to get into discussing private discussions of the two leaders."

At several points during the meeting between Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair, there was palpable tension over finding a legitimate legal trigger for going to war that would be acceptable to other nations, the memo said. The prime minister was quoted as saying it was essential for both countries to lobby for a second United Nations resolution against Iraq, because it would serve as "an insurance policy against the unexpected."

DOJ_NMG_0022578

The memo said Mr. Blair told Mr. Bush, "If anything went wrong with the military campaign, or if Saddam increased the stakes by burning the oil wells, killing children or fomenting internal divisions within Iraq, a second resolution would give us international cover, especially with the Arabs."

Running Out of Time

Mr. Bush agreed that the two countries should attempt to get a second resolution, but he added that time was running out. "The U.S. would put its full weight behind efforts to get another resolution and would twist arms and even threaten," Mr. Bush was paraphrased in the memo as saying.

The document added, "But he had to say that if we ultimately failed, military action would follow anyway."

The leaders agreed that three weeks remained to obtain a second United Nations Security Council resolution before military commanders would need to begin preparing for an invasion.

Summarizing statements by the president, the memo says: "The air campaign would probably last four days, during which some 1,500 targets would be hit. Great care would be taken to avoid hitting innocent civilians. Bush thought the impact of the air onslaught would ensure the early collapse of Saddam's regime. Given this military timetable, we needed to go for a second resolution as soon as possible. This probably meant after Blix's next report to the Security Council in mid-February."

Mr. Blair was described as responding that both countries would make clear that a second resolution amounted to "Saddam's final opportunity." The memo described Mr. Blair as saying: "We had been very patient. Now we should be saying that the crisis must be resolved in weeks, not months."

It reported: "Bush agreed. He commented that he was not itching to go to war, but we could not allow Saddam to go on playing with us. At some point, probably when we had passed the second resolutions — assuming we did — we should warn Saddam that he had a week to leave. We should notify the media too. We would then have a clear field if Saddam refused to go."

Mr. Bush devoted much of the meeting to outlining the military strategy. The president, the memo says, said the planned air campaign "would destroy Saddam's command and control quickly." It also said that he expected Iraq's army to "fold very quickly." He also is reported as telling the prime minister that the Republican Guard would be "decimated by the bombing."

Despite his optimism, Mr. Bush said he was aware that "there were uncertainties and risks," the memo says, and it goes on, "As far as destroying the oil wells were concerned, the U.S. was well equipped to repair them quickly, although this would be easier in the south of Iraq than in the north."

The two men briefly discussed plans for a post-Hussein Iraqi government. "The prime minister asked about aftermath planning," the memo says. "Condi Rice said that a great deal of work was now in hand.

Referring to the Defense Department, it said: "A planning cell in D.O.D. was looking at all aspects and would deploy to Iraq to direct operations as soon as the military action was over. Bush said that a great deal of detailed planning had been done on supplying the Iraqi people with food and medicine."

Planning for After the War

The leaders then looked beyond the war, imagining the transition from Mr. Hussein's rule to a new government. Immediately after the war, a military occupation would be put in place for an unknown period of time, the president was described as saying. He spoke of the "dilemma of managing the transition to the civil administration," the memo says.

The document concludes with Mr. Manning still holding out a last-minute hope of inspectors finding weapons in Iraq, or even Mr. Hussein voluntarily leaving Iraq. But Mr. Manning wrote that he was concerned this could not be accomplished by Mr. Bush's timeline for war.

"This makes the timing very tight," he wrote. "We therefore need to stay closely alongside Blix, do all we can to help the inspectors make a significant find, and work hard on the other members of the Security Council to accept the noncooperation case so that we can secure the minimum nine votes when we need them, probably the end of February."

At a White House news conference following the closed-door session, Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair said "the crisis" had to be resolved in a timely manner. "Saddam Hussein is not disarming," the president told reporters. "He is a danger to the world. He must disarm. And that's why I have constantly said — and the prime minister has constantly said — this issue will come to a head in a matter of weeks, not months."

DOJ_NMG_0022579

Despite intense lobbying by the United States and Britain, a second United Nations resolution was not obtained. The American-led military coalition invaded Iraq on March 19, 2003, nine days after the target date set by the president on that late January day at the White House.

Canadian PM Thanks Bush For Activist Help (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 27, 2006

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper called President Bush with thanks Monday for U.S. help in rescuing three peace activists from captivity in Iraq last week.

The activists — two Canadians and one Briton — were freed without a shot, ending a four-month hostage drama in which an American among the group was shot to death and dumped on a Baghdad street.

The two leaders also discussed Afghanistan in light of their recent visits there, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said. And they exchanged notes on their three-way meeting with Mexican President Vicente Fox in Cancun on Thursday and Friday. Cancun will be the first time Bush and Harper have met since the Canadian took office in February.

State Dept. Offers Record Pay In 2 Hot Spots (WP)

By Bradley Graham

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

To help recruit U.S. government civilians for duty in Iraq and Afghanistan, the State Department has boosted the pay allowances for both hardship and danger to the highest levels ever granted, department officials said.

Starting this month, U.S. government civilians serving in Iraq and in Afghanistan outside of Kabul are receiving an extra 35 percent above their base salaries for hardship and another 35 percent for danger. Previously, they were paid 25 percent extra for each category, the limits the government had set decades ago for any foreign post.

Because a number of other overseas posts had also been receiving the 25 percent maximums, government authorities were under pressure from Foreign Service representatives to adjust the allowance system and differentiate the most difficult assignments from the rest. The new record-high rates underscore the especially poor security and stressful working conditions faced by U.S. government employees in Iraq and Afghanistan, even as the Bush administration continues to emphasize signs of progress there.

The pay increases were approved as part of a broader restructuring of rates that also lifted allowances for more than 20 other locations, mostly in Africa and central and southeastern Asia. But most of these increases stopped at 30 percent. Only Iraq and Afghanistan ended up with 35 percent for both hardship and danger.

"The idea was to recognize service at our most difficult and dangerous posts, and foremost among those posts are Iraq and Afghanistan," said a senior State Department official involved in the decision but willing to discuss the increases only on condition of anonymity. "We know that the department has trouble recruiting people for these places."

Congress granted permission to raise the allowances in a little-noticed foreign relations authorization provision in late December. Responsibility for determining which locations get what allowances rests with the State Department, which issued the new rates earlier this month.

The rates apply to about 80,000 U.S. government civilians working overseas and also tend to be used by private U.S. companies and other organizations as benchmarks for establishing their compensation plans for employees abroad.

State Department officials stressed that the revised allowances were not based on any reassessment of conditions in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rather, they said, the changes involved taking previous survey data and awarding more compensation to the worst cases.

"Over the years there had been a real compression of posts at the 25 percent level," said J. Anthony Holmes, president of the American Foreign Service Association, which pushed for the increases. "To maintain a system in which everyone is volunteering for the places they go, you want to provide incentives that reflect the true range of conditions."

Base salaries for the more than 300 State Department members working in Iraq range from about $35,000 to $155,000, according to department figures.

With word of the new hardship and danger rates still filtering through government ranks, officials said it was too early to assess the impact on attracting fresh volunteers for Iraq or Afghanistan or persuading those there to extend their assignments.

The duty involves not only very long work days and weeks but also cramped living quarters in heavily guarded compounds. A recent survey of active-duty Foreign Service officers with experience in Iraq, published this month in the Foreign Service Journal, quoted many respondents describing the working conditions as "extreme" and the security requirements as enormously constraining. At the same time, many played down financial incentives as a consideration in volunteering for Iraq duty and instead cited a desire to serve where most needed or to boost their chances for promotion.

State Department figures show that 87 percent to 94 percent of its jobs in Iraq are being filled, with the biggest recruiting challenge coming in finding staff for reconstruction assignments because, in the words of one official involved in Iraq policy, "they're in the most dangerous positions, they're the ones out in the field."

Of 632 overseas locations with U.S. government employees, 353 qualify for some kind of hardship differential, ranging from 5 percent up. The previous limit of 25 percent had been set in 1948, according to State's Office of Allowances.

In setting the hardship differentials, the State Department uses a scoring system that assigns specific weights to such factors as sanitation and disease (20 percent), housing (11 percent), political violence (11 percent), climate (10 percent), political harassment (9 percent), medical and hospital (9 percent) and physical isolation (8 percent).

The danger-pay allowance is based on a separate calculation that includes such factors as the existence of local conflicts, the involvement of U.S. combat troops and the record of U.S. civilian deaths in a particular country. Rates start at 15 percent. The previous maximum of 25 percent had been set in 1981, when the allowance was introduced.

About 25 countries now qualify for danger pay. Iraq and Afghanistan were the first to jump to 35 percent when the new rates were issued during the first week of March. Karachi, Pakistan, was added to the top-danger category on March 17.

Sometimes different places within the same country can receive different rates. For instance, although most of Afghanistan qualifies for the 35 percent danger allowance, an assignment in Kabul, considered slightly safer, gets 30 percent.

The State Department estimates that the additional cost of the higher hardship pay for its employees in Iraq will exceed $2 million a year. It expects to cover that expense through a supplemental appropriation request.

The rise in hardship pay for other foreign posts will be financed largely by eliminating 14 of 27 places that had been receiving hardship allowances of 5 percent, among them Athens, Warsaw, Hong Kong and Seoul. This move will free up an estimated $2.6 million a year, officials said. But the American Foreign Service Association has objected to it. "We think the department ought to be able to find the additional money without taking it out of the hide of others," Holmes said.

The association also has advocated allowing foreign service officers who leave Washington for an overseas post to keep the 17.5 percent cost-of-living differential that comes with duty here.

Fukuyama's Fantasy (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

It was, as the hero tells it, his Road to Damascus moment. There he is, in a hall of 1,500 people he has long considered to be his allies, hearing the speaker treat the Iraq war, nearing the end of its first year, as "a virtually unqualified success." He gasps as the audience enthusiastically applauds. Aghast to discover himself in a sea of comrades so deluded by ideology as to have lost touch with reality, he decides he can no longer be one of them.

And thus did Francis Fukuyama become the world's most celebrated ex-neoconservative, a well-timed metamorphosis that has brought him a piece of the fame that he once enjoyed 15 years ago as the man who declared, a mite prematurely, that history had ended.

A very nice story. It appears in the preface to Fukuyama's post-neocon coming out, "America at the Crossroads." On Sunday it was repeated on the front page of the New York Times Book Review in Paul Berman's review.

I happen to know something about this story, as I was the speaker whose 2004 Irving Kristol lecture to the American Enterprise Institute Fukuyama has now brought to prominence. I can therefore testify that Fukuyama's claim that I attributed "virtually unqualified success" to the war is a fabrication.

DOJ_NMG_0022581

A convenient fabrication -- it gives him a foil and the story drama -- but a foolish one because it can be checked. The speech was given at the Washington Hilton before a full house, carried live on C-SPAN and then published by the American Enterprise Institute under its title "Democratic Realism: An American Foreign Policy for a Unipolar World." (It can be read at http://www.aei.org/publications/pubID.19912,filter.all/pub_detail.asp .) As indicated by the title, the speech was not about Iraq. It was a fairly theoretical critique of the four schools of American foreign policy: isolationism, liberal internationalism, realism and neoconservatism. The only successes I attributed to the Iraq war were two, and both self-evident: (1) that it had deposed Saddam Hussein and (2) that this had made other dictators think twice about the price of acquiring nuclear weapons, as evidenced by the fact that Moammar Gaddafi had turned over his secret nuclear program for dismantling just months after Hussein's fall (in fact, on the very week of Hussein's capture).

In that entire 6,000-word lecture, I said not a single word about the course or conduct of the Iraq war. My only reference to the outcome of the war came toward the end of the lecture. Far from calling it an unqualified success, virtual or otherwise, I said quite bluntly that "it may be a bridge too far. Realists have been warning against the hubris of thinking we can transform an alien culture because of some postulated natural and universal human will to freedom. And they may yet be right."

History will judge whether we can succeed in "establishing civilized, decent, nonbelligerent, pro-Western polities in Afghanistan and Iraq." My point then, as now, has never been that success was either inevitable or at hand, only that success was critically important to "change the strategic balance in the fight against Arab-Islamic radicalism."

I made the point of repeating the problematic nature of the enterprise: "The undertaking is enormous, ambitious and arrogant. It may yet fail."

For Fukuyama to assert that I characterized it as "a virtually unqualified success" is simply breathtaking. My argument then, as now, was the necessity of this undertaking, never its ensured success. And it was necessary because, as I said, there is not a single, remotely plausible, alternative strategy for attacking the root causes of Sept. 11: "The cauldron of political oppression, religious intolerance, and social ruin in the Arab-Islamic world -- oppression transmuted and deflected by regimes with no legitimacy into virulent, murderous anti-Americanism."

Fukuyama's book is proof of this proposition about the lack of the plausible alternative. The alternative he proposes for the challenges of Sept. 11 -- new international institutions, new forms of foreign aid and sundry other forms of "soft power" -- is a mush of bureaucratic make-work in the face of a raging fire. Even Berman, his sympathetic reviewer, concludes that "neither his old arguments nor his new ones offer much insight into this, the most important problem of all -- the problem of murderous ideologies and how to combat them."

Fukuyama now says that he had secretly opposed the Iraq war before it was launched. An unusual and convenient reticence, notes Irwin Stelzer, editor of "The Neocon Reader," for such an inveterate pamphleteer, letter writer and essayist. After public opinion had turned against the war, Fukuyama then courageously came out against it. He has every right to change his mind at his convenience. He has no right to change what I said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Defense Continues Challenging Enron Witness (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

HOUSTON -- Defense attorneys for Enron Corp.'s former two top executives continued to chip away at the testimony of a former finance executive who provided details of key meetings where the two were warned about the company's precarious state.

Last week in the criminal conspiracy and fraud trial of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay1 and former President Jeffrey Skilling2, former Enron treasurer Ben Glisan Jr.3 testified that the two executives knew several businesses had lost billions in value but did not adjust the company's books and insisted to investors the company was healthy. He also testified that Mr. Lay misled credit companies about Enron's water-distribution business in order to retain an investment-grade credit rating.

Yesterday, Mr. Glisan acknowledged he had left an Oct. 22 meeting before the company's former chief accounting officer told Mr. Lay and other Enron directors that Enron's auditors had concluded no write-down of the company's Wessex Water unit was necessary. Prosecutors contend Mr. Lay lied about auditors' decision to investors. (Read excerpts from Mr. Glisan's testimony4.)

Bruce Collins, a defense attorney for Mr. Lay, used the meeting to suggest that Mr. Glisan's testimony showed he lacked the information available to the two executives. He also challenged Mr. Glisan's testimony that he had warned Mr. Lay on Oct. 23 that "bankruptcy was inevitable" by introducing Mr. Glisan's own reports detailing improving finances in late September and early October.

On Oct. 8, Mr. Glisan told directors that Enron was "on target" to meet its year-end liquidity goals and it would hold onto its investment-grade credit rating, calling a lowered outlook the "most likely worst-rating outcome" from its third-quarter earnings report. Mr. Glisan also passed along on Oct. 17 a Deutsche Bank credit analysts' report to Mr. Lay and others that noted Enron's "liquidity remains solid." Mr. Glisan said he learned from bankers on Oct. 23 that Enron was losing access to credit markets, a condition the company had earlier estimated could force it into bankruptcy.

During the October time frame, Mr. Lay was describing Enron as healthy and growing -- descriptions that the prosecution alleges were misleading to employees and investors. Mr. Collins also suggested that Enron did not have to write down the businesses if it was holding them in anticipation of an increase in value.

Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to an Enron-related conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are accused of criminal conspiracy and fraud in U.S. District Court here. The trial is in its ninth week. The two have said they did nothing wrong.

But Mr. Glisan said there was "pressure to close sales" of the company's underperforming assets. "We needed that cash and needed it badly. There wasn't a plan to hold onto those assets for a better deal," he said. Earlier, an Arthur Andersen LLP auditor testified he was still evaluating a write-down of the Wessex unit into mid-November.

Late in the day, a stockbroker testified that Mr. Skilling did not want to alert Enron to a September 1991 sale of $15.6 million in shares. Glenn Ray, a Denver broker, said Mr. Skilling proposed that an Enron authorization be phrased so as not to alert the company he planned to sell imminently. Mr. Skilling is charged with insider trading in conjunction with that sale and others. Mr. Ray conceded under questioning by an attorney for Mr. Skilling that his clients "almost always" wanted to keep sales confidential.

The prosecution introduced a Citigroup executive's email that supported two key points in Mr. Glisan's depiction of the company in the fall of 2001. In an email to Salomon Smith Barney capital markets executives, then Salomon managing director Anne Clarke Wolff wrote that she urged the removal of Andrew Fastow5, the company's then chief financial officer. Recounting a conversation with Mr. Glisan, she wrote "the architect of the strategy is not the guy to unwind it." She also said Mr. Glisan realizes a loss of investment-grade credit rating "is game over" for the company.

Prosecutors Of 2 Ex-Enron Officials Could Rest Case Today (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

HOUSTON, March 27 — Defense lawyers sought on Monday to undercut testimony by Enron's former treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., that he warned Kenneth L. Lay that Enron was running low on cash shortly before Mr. Lay told investors the company was financially healthy.

Under questioning by Bruce Collins, a lawyer for Mr. Lay, Mr. Glisan acknowledged that he had assured Mr. Lay, the chief executive, and a group of directors that Enron had enough cash to operate.

Mr. Collins displayed notes from an Oct. 22, 2001, finance committee meeting taken by Paula Rieker, the corporate secretary, that showed that Mr. Glisan and Andrew S. Fastow, then the chief financial officer, told the directors, including Mr. Lay, that Enron had adequate liquidity.

Mr. Glisan told the board that Enron had immediate access to $1.5 billion in cash and could seek more. That appeared to contradict his testimony last week that he had given Mr. Lay a much dimmer financial forecast, saying Enron's liquidity was strained and its cash flow weak.

Mr. Glisan, testifying in the criminal fraud trial of Mr. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, concluded his fourth and last day on the stand.

DOJ_NMG_0022583

Mr. Lay re-assumed the title of chief executive after Mr. Skilling resigned in August 2001.

The day's court session concluded with testimony from a stockbroker who handled Mr. Skilling's sale of Enron shares a month after he resigned. That testimony contradicted what Mr. Skilling told the Securities and Exchange Commission about the reason for the sale.

The government could wrap up its case Tuesday, with the defense set to start its case next Monday.

Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay are accused of conspiring to defraud Enron, which filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 for helping to create the Raptors structure, which Enron used to manipulate earnings and hide losses. He is serving a five-year sentence.

On Monday, Mr. Collins also displayed notes from the Oct. 22 meeting that showed Mr. Lay was told that the company might not have needed to write down the value of some international assets. Ms. Rieker's minutes show that after Mr. Glisan left the meeting, the chief accounting officer, Richard A. Causey, told Mr. Lay that a British water company, Wessex, did not need to be written down. Mr. Lay told analysts that the next day.

That contradicted Mr. Glisan's assertions last week. He said Mr. Lay knew the international portfolio was overvalued on Enron's books by nearly twice what it was worth.

"I cannot say I had all the information he had," Mr. Glisan said of Mr. Lay. "I did not have this piece of information. Mr. Causey gave a favorable report, it seems."

Under further questioning by a prosecutor, Kathryn Ruemmler, Mr. Glisan said he sought approval at the Oct. 22 meeting for another $1.5 billion secured bank loan as well as a private $500 million loan to help shore up Enron's liquidity. "Neither of those two steps would have been taken had we not felt we needed that additional liquidity," he said.

Three days later Enron drew down $3 billion in credit lines from banks.

Also on Monday, Glenn Ray, a stockbroker at Charles Schwab, testified he took an order from Mr. Skilling on Sept. 6, 2001, to sell 200,000 Enron shares. The Sept. 11 attacks happened while Mr. Ray was waiting for a letter from Enron's general counsel assuring him that Mr. Skilling was no longer an officer, or insider, at the company, and thus forbidden to sell restricted stock. Mr. Skilling told Mr. Ray he preferred that Enron did not know he was "considering selling."

Then, on Sept. 17, the day the stock exchanges reopened after the attacks, Mr. Skilling called Mr. Ray to place an order to sell 500,000 of his 936,576 shares. Mr. Ray later called back after Schwab's restricted stock department informed him that more assurance was required; the letter from Enron's general counsel, Rex Rogers, still had not been received.

On a recording of the call played in court, Mr. Skilling said he was worried about the market dropping and seemed agitated at having his order stopped. "I have done what is necessary. If there is any breaking the law I am the one in trouble, not them."

The transaction was finally approved later on Sept. 17 after the letter from Mr. Rogers was faxed. On cross-examination by Ronald Woods, Mr. Ray said there was nothing in Mr. Skilling's tone to indicate a sale based on insider information.

In testimony to the S.E.C. in December 2001, which was read into the record on Monday, Mr. Skilling said there was "no other reason" for him to sell his Enron shares than the decline of the stock market after Sept. 11. "Oh, I agonized over it, absolutely agonized it," he said in the 2001 testimony. "I cannot believe the stock market is where it is right now."

Enron Treasurer's Testimony Contradicted By Meeting Minutes (BLOOM)

By Andrew Dunn Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, March 28, 2006

March 27 (Bloomberg) -- Testimony by a former Enron Corp. executive that he warned then-Chairman Kenneth Lay in October 2001 the company's finances were ``strained'' was contradicted by evidence presented today by defense lawyers at Lay's fraud trial.

Ben F. Glisan Jr., Enron's former treasurer, said last week in federal court in Houston that he told Lay in September and October 2001 the company faced a liquidity crisis and that Lay knew some of Enron's assets, including a British water company, needed to be written down in value.

DOJ_NMG_0022584

Today, Lay's attorney Bruce Collins presented notes from an Oct. 22, 2001, finance committee meeting that showed Glisan had optimistic estimates about the company's access to cash. The minutes show that after Glisan left the meeting, Chief Accounting Officer Rick Causey had told Lay the water company didn't need to be written down, which Lay told analysts the next day.

``I cannot say I had all the information he had," Glisan said under cross-examination during his fourth day on the witness stand. ``I did not have this piece of information. Mr. Causey gave a favorable report, it seems."

Prosecutors accuse Lay, 63, of misleading investors, employees and credit rating companies about Enron's financial status in the weeks before it filed for bankruptcy in December 2001. Collins repeatedly contrasted Glisan's direct testimony with his 2004 grand jury testimony, and 2001 board meeting documents and minutes, to point out inconsistencies in Glisan's discussion of the financial status of the company.

Government Charges

Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling, 52, face at least 25 years in prison if convicted on charges that they conspired to defraud Enron investors and enrich themselves. Lay and Skilling are accused of overseeing a conspiracy to deceive investors about Enron's finances so they could profit by selling their personal shares at inflated prices.

On direct examination, Glisan told the jury he had warned that Enron was facing a liquidity crisis. He said he told Lay on Oct. 23, 2001, after the analyst call and a companywide employee meeting that he believed bankruptcy was ``inevitable."

Today Collins showed the jury documents illustrating that on Oct. 8, 2001, Glisan told the board that the company had more available cash than it needed. Minutes kept by a corporate secretary from the Oct. 22 board meeting, where Glisan said he told Lay the company's liquidity and balance sheet were ``strained," show Glisan telling the board that Enron had access to more cash than needed at the time.

``Her notes might not be complete," Glisan said.

Fraud Sentence

Glisan is 2 1/2 years into a five-year sentence for securities fraud in a federal prison east of Houston. In 2003, he admitted falsifying Enron's reported financial results to make the company look more successful than it was. He's testifying under an immunity agreement with prosecutors and could be out of prison as early as September.

Enron had more than $68 billion in market value before it sought bankruptcy protection in December 2001, wiping out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds almost overnight. Investors suing over the collapse of what was once the U.S.'s seventh-largest corporation claim accounting fraud led to at least $25 billion in losses.

Legal experts have partially blamed partnerships and hedging vehicles created by former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow for Enron's meltdown. Skilling's and Lay's defense teams claim prosecutors are seeking to criminalize normal business practices and the two executives were victims of thieving subordinates such as Fastow.

They contend the former CFO, who already has pleaded guilty to fraud charges stemming from Enron's demise, stole at least $25 million from the company in connection with partnership-related deals.

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Skilling's Broker Tells Of Attempt To Sell Stock (HC)

By TOM FOWLER

Houston Chronicle, March 28, 2006

Former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling tried to sell one-fifth of his Enron stock holdings just weeks after he left the company and days before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to testimony in court Monday.

The sale of 200,000 shares never went through on Sept. 6, 2001, because his stockbroker still had him listed as a company officer restricted from selling, but he was able to sell 500,000 shares several weeks later.

The failed sale itself wasn't illegal but it could cast doubt on statements Skilling gave to investigators that the only reason he sold stock after leaving the company was post-Sept. 11 worry.

Testimony about the stock sale, one of 10 illegal sales the government claims Skilling made, came on day 31 of the trial. The government may finish its case against Skilling and former chairman Ken Lay as early as this afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0022585

Former Treasurer Ben Glisan, who left the stand Monday afternoon, was the last major witness the government planned to call.

Letter needed for sale Skilling resigned from Enron on Aug. 14, 2001. On Sept. 6 he called Glenn Ray, his broker at Charles Schwab in Denver to do a couple of transactions, including the sale of the 200,000 shares.

During testimony in court Monday, Ray said Skilling told him an Enron attorney would send a letter stating he was no longer an officer, which would clear the way for the stock sale.

On Sept. 17, Skilling called Ray again saying, "I'm worried about it. I don't like it," referring to the stock market, which was reeling from the Sept. 11 attacks. Enron's stock price was continuing its yearlong decline and Skilling said he wanted to sell 500,000 shares.

On a recording of the call, Ray sounds surprised at the size of the stock sale.

About 109,000 shares of the sale went through before the transaction was halted by Schwab officials, Ray said, because the letter from Enron confirming Skilling's status had not arrived.

Ray called Skilling to tell him the news and agreed he could talk to the Enron attorney, Rex Rogers, on the phone instead. Skilling makes a point of asking Ray not to mention the stock sale to Rogers when they talk.

"I would prefer they not know that I'm selling," Skilling said on the call.

The request was hardly unusual, however, according to Ray, who noted on the stand that his wealthy clients "almost always" made such requests.

Prosecutors later read a transcript of Skilling's interview with Securities and Exchange Commission officials in December 2001, where they asked him about his stock sales both before and after leaving Enron. In the transcript Skilling said "there was no other reason than Sept. 11 that I sold the stock. I was very optimistic until the Sept. 11 thing."

Defense hammers Glisan Earlier on Monday, defense attorneys continued efforts to undermine Glisan's prior testimony that Lay and Skilling were well aware of severe problems at the company and approved of various accounting and finance chicaneries.

Glisan claimed Lay was lying when he told analysts in an Oct. 23 conference call that there was no need to write-down Enron's water business because of a new accounting rule.

But Lay attorney Bruce Collins tried to show through minutes and notes taken of a board finance committee meeting a day earlier that Lay was merely repeating what Chief Accounting Officer Rick Causey told him about the issue. Glisan admitted he left the board meeting before Causey made that presentation.

Collins also tried to cast doubt on Glisan's testimony that he presented a dire picture of Enron's financial stability during that board meeting. Meeting minutes taken by former board secretary Paula Rieker make just a brief mention of Glisan's presentation.

On redirect examination, however, prosecutor Kathy Ruemmler showed an e-mail from Rieker to others noting that Glisan would "comment on the very negative response of the debt investors."

Defense attorney's surgery Also on Monday lead Lay attorney Mike Ramsey said he underwent surgery last week to have a stent placed in his heart.

Ramsey, 65, said he started feeling episodes of pain and shortness of breath about three weeks into the trial. On Friday, March 17, he had tests done, which spotted the problem, and had the stent put in at Methodist Hospital on March 24.

He attended trial on Monday and said he felt "wonderful."

"I want to emphasize that there has been no interference with the trial and there won't be whatsoever," Ramsey said.

Lay Faces A Second Trial, Alone (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

HOUSTON, March 27 -- As lawyers for Enron Corp.'s former leaders prepare to start their defense next week, another potentially more dangerous trial looms for founder Kenneth L. Lay.

DOJ_NMG_0022586

Lay is scheduled to be tried on four separate criminal charges related to personal bank loans, with the case opening as soon as the jury begins deliberations in the current trial, in which both Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling are charged with fraud in Enron's collapse.

The unusual double jeopardy is the result of a bet Lay's legal team placed -- and lost -- two years ago. Lay sought to face trial alone rather than with his protege Skilling, who ran the company's daily operations.

Government lawyers pounced on the strategic opportunity. The judge's ruling, in what may be the worst possible outcome for Lay, gave prosecutors not one but two chances to convict the former titan. The judge kept Lay in the major fraud case, which includes Skilling. But he split off into a separate trial four narrow fraud charges against Lay that relate to personal bank loans.

The second proceeding, to be decided by the same judge, will begin a mere two hours after jurors retire to consider the broader charges. It means that Lay, who built a fortune once valued at more than $100 million after growing up the son of a poor Baptist preacher who hopped from job to job, will face the anxiety of awaiting a jury verdict in the first trial while he defends himself against additional charges that carry a maximum penalty of a decade behind bars.

The prospect leaves open the possibility that jurors could acquit Lay, 63, of taking part in a massive conspiracy that led to Enron's filing for bankruptcy protection but that a judge could send him to prison for wrongdoing in his personal finances. In April 2005, Lay waived his right to a jury trial on the bank fraud charges, depriving him of the best defense he had: the chance to argue to a dozen average citizens that the law did not matter.

Legal experts say the bank charges amount to a significant challenge for Lay, in part because the government cites more than a dozen clear-cut documents he signed, promising to abide by Federal Reserve Board rules prohibiting him from using his multimillion-dollar lines of credit to buy stock. It is the sort of paper trail that has been missing from the fraud trial, in which prosecutors have produced no papers or e-mails directly tying Lay to fraud. Most of the evidence in the joint trial has been stacked against Skilling, not Lay.

Michael W. Ramsey, the lead defense lawyer for Lay, has alternately mocked the bank rules Lay is charged with violating -- known in shorthand as "Reg U" -- as a kind of pasta sauce and derided them as vague and baseless. He has said that Lay repaid the loans to Bank of America, Chase and Compass Bank and that the institutions suffered no losses, making the alleged crime a victimless one. The rules date to the stock market crash of 1929, when lawmakers decided, as a matter of public policy, to limit the amount of stock purchased on credit.

But federal prosecutors at the Justice Department's Enron Task Force have replied in court papers that Lay engaged in "classic bank fraud and false statements to a bank."

"In response to the question, 'Will any part of this credit be used to purchase or carry margin stock?' defendant Lay is charged with knowingly, falsely answering No," prosecutors wrote in court papers last year. "Moreover, defendant Lay expands upon his false answer in the same form" by adding typed and handwritten phrases that contain information about how he intended to use the credit line for other purposes.

"In an ordinary case, this would be a laugher," Lay's attorney said. "These counts would never have been brought." Ramsey said the charges reflect a "political decision that is unconscionable."

In the past, prosecutors on the Enron Task Force, who come from the ranks of the Justice Department's career employees, have repeatedly denied that politics influenced their work.

The second trial could last less than a week. Government lawyers are prepared to call at least one witness who may have questioned Lay before he signed some of the papers. Lay's defense team will probably turn to his longtime financial advisers to cast doubt about whether he understood the forms but affixed his signature anyway -- a key issue in the upcoming trial.

In a provocative 2003 scholarly article, University of Miami Law Professor William H. Widen urged prosecutors to pursue the bank charges, reasoning that such a move follows in the tradition of the government's pursuit of mafia don Al Capone. After earlier, unsuccessful prosecutions, Capone ultimately went to prison on tax fraud charges.

Six years ago, it would have been unthinkable to equate Lay with such a notorious figure. He posed for photos with dignitaries including former president George H.W. Bush, Henry Kissinger and Mikhail Gorbachev. He acquired the nickname "Kenny Boy" from President George W. Bush and caucused with Vice President Cheney about energy policy. He and his wife, Linda, a former Enron secretary, donated more than $25 million to charities. They bailed out the local NAACP chapter and persuaded the local baseball team to stay put. But that was before the collapse of Enron and his indictment forced him to focus his time and energy on defending himself against fraud charges.

To date, the massive Enron fraud trial has focused mostly on the conduct of Skilling, who led daily operations until his abrupt departure in August 2001. As a result, Lay's defense in the first case will not directly overlap with that of his second, on the bank charges.

Indeed, legal experts who are following both cases say Lay's defenses reflect some inconsistency.

Lay, who is preparing to testify in the broader case within the next couple of weeks, will maintain that Enron scrupulously complied with the letter of the law and that he should not be held criminally responsible for the failure of his business. In essence, he is using the law as a shield, experts say.

But in his second, bank fraud trial, Lay is preparing to argue the exact opposite -- that banking law is outdated and unclear and therefore should not apply to him.

Agency Finds Enron Billing Irregularities (AP)

Justice Dept. Finds Billing Irregularities by Turnaround Expert Who Led Enron Through Bankruptcy

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The turnaround expert who led Enron Corp. through its bankruptcy engaged in unacceptable billing practices and has agreed to cut in half the $25 million he has been seeking as a "success fee," the Justice Department said Monday.

The department's U.S. Trustee Program, which monitors the administration of bankruptcy cases, said it uncovered the billing problems after Stephen Forbes Cooper LLC and its principal, Stephen Cooper, asked the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York for $25 million as the fee for guiding the one-time energy giant, decimated by scandal, through its Chapter 11 case.

The firm denied any billing irregularities, but agreed to reduce its request to $12.5 million after the trustee's office shared the results of its investigation with the bankruptcy court, according to papers filed with the bankruptcy court. The court agreement did not spell out the billing issues.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Arthur Gonzalez will determine the size of the success fee.

The firm is part of Kroll Zolfo Cooper LLC, of which Cooper is chairman.

"While most, including Enron's creditor committee, supported the amount of the proposed fee, others objected," Kroll Zolfo Cooper said in a statement Monday. "Recognizing that a prolonged disagreement would not benefit Enron's creditors or employees, and in the interest of moving forward, we have agreed to resolve our differences, reduce the requested amount and move on."

Cooper and his firm already have been paid $107 million for their work. Enron hired Cooper in January 2002.

Enron had gone bankrupt a month earlier, following revelations of fraudulent accounting, hidden debt and inflated profits. Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling are on trial in Houston on fraud and conspiracy charges.

Cooper's firm claimed credit for holding off on selling assets immediately at fire-sale prices, eventually gaining $12.8 billion to distribute to creditors rather than half that. It also said it shaved $1.2 billion off professional fees for lawyers, accountants, consultants and others by wrapping up the bankruptcy in three years.

Since then, Cooper has been hired to try to save troubled Krispy Kreme Doughnuts Inc. The company is facing federal investigations into its finances, as well as lawsuits by franchisees and workers who claim to have lost everything since its stock plunged in May 2004.

Ex-Raytheon Chief Agrees To Fine And Forfeit Of Part Of Bonus (NYT)

By Leslie Wayne

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022588

The former chief executive of the Raytheon Corporation, Daniel P. Burnham, has agreed to pay a fine and return part of a $1.75 million bonus to settle Securities and Exchange Commission accusations over improper accounting practices in 2000 and 2001.

Disclosure of the arrangement came in a regulatory filing yesterday by the First Data Corporation, where Mr. Burnham, 59, is a director and chairman of the company's compensation committee. Mr. Burnham served as chairman and chief executive of Raytheon for five years until his resignation in July 2003.

The alleged accounting irregularities took place in Raytheon's troubled commercial aircraft division from 1997 to 2001 and concerned the timing of losses recorded by the company. The S.E.C. said that the company had overstated its 2001 losses and that its aircraft subsidiary should have charged up to $240 million of a $693 million loss in 2000 instead.

Raytheon, First Data and the S.E.C. would not comment on the settlement. The amount of the fine and the amount of the bonus that Mr. Burnham will return were not specified. Raytheon would not comment on whether directors' and officers' insurance would cover Mr. Burnham's costs. Mr. Burnham did not respond to a message left for him at First Data.

Since January 2003, the S.E.C. has been investigating accounting practices at Raytheon's aircraft division, which had faced a deteriorating market. Last April, the company offered to settle the investigation and recorded a charge of $12 million in the first quarter of 2005 to cover potential settlement costs. Raytheon has neither admitted nor denied the charges and the offer has yet to be approved.

The agreement with Mr. Burnham, who neither admitted nor denied the agency's charges, is still subject to approval by the S.E.C.

In its regulatory filing, First Data expressed confidence in Mr. Burnham, whom the company is renominating as head of its compensation committee. After reviewing the S.E.C. charges, First Data said the company's board "determined that the allegations are not reflective of Mr. Burnham's conduct, judgment or integrity" as they relate to his First Data board activities and cited "Mr. Burnham's valuable service to the company over the past two years."

First Data also praised Mr. Burnham for "the forthright manner in which Mr. Burnham brought the allegations" to the attention of the company and said the events at Raytheon were unrelated to his board work at First Data.

Paul Nisbet, a military industry analyst with JSA Research in Newport, R.I., said Mr. Burnham's agreement was "somewhat unusual" but that it "doesn't mean much" for Raytheon.

Mr. Nisbet said that Mr. Burnham's action might lead to a resolution of charges involving Edward Pliner, the company's former chief financial officer, who was put on leave last April in connection with the S.E.C. investigation into Raytheon's accounting. Raytheon has said that the S.E.C. is expected to "bring action" against Mr. Pliner.

"This could very well lead to something similar involving Ed Pliner," Mr. Nisbet said.

Mr. Burnham is not the only chief executive facing a giveback of some of his bonus. Last January, Nortel Networks announced that a dozen current executives would repay $8.6 million in bonuses over manipulated financial statements. Government regulators are seeking repayment of bonuses of two top executives at Fannie Mae as a result of its accounting scandal, and shareholder pressure caused FPL Group to announce it was recouping $22.5 million in bonuses to eight executives after a failed merger.

Also, last January, an Alabama judge ruled that Richard M. Scrushy, the former executive of HealthSouth, must repay his company more than $47.8 million in bonuses. Dean L. Buntrock, former chief executive of Waste Management, agreed last August to pay $19.5 million, which included his bonus, to settle S.E.C. claims.

The S.E.C. is also trying to obtain $100 million, including bonuses, from Henry Yuen, the former chief executive of Gemstar-TV Guide International after charges that Mr. Yuen inflated revenues to mislead the company's investors.

Clarent Ex-execs Charged With Fraud Former CEO Of Redwood City Firm Pleads Not Guilty (SFC)

By Tom Abate, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022589

The U.S. attorney in San Francisco has charged a Los Altos man with two counts of federal securities fraud for allegedly inflating the revenues of Clarent Corp. in 2001.

Shares in the publicly traded Redwood City firm, which sold equipment to send phone calls over the Internet, collapsed between September 2001 and May 2002, wiping out $200 million in stock value, according to the indictment. The company went bankrupt and its assets have since been acquired.

Former Clarent chief executive Jerry Shaw-Yau Chang, 48, of Los Altos surrendered to federal authorities in San Francisco Friday. His attorney, Michael Diamond of Los Angeles, said Chang pleaded not guilty and was released on a $1 million bond.

The U.S. attorney also filed three fraud counts and a fourth charge of tampering with a witness against former Clarent official Matthew Ming Chiang, 36, of Taiwan. Federal officials said that Chiang remains at large and that a warrant has been issued for his arrest.

According to the indictment, Chang was CEO of Clarent from July 1996 to July 2001. He remained a director until September 2001. Chiang held several marketing positions during this time. From September 2000 to September 2001, he was president of Clarent's Asia-Pacific division in Taipei, Taiwan, and reported directly to Chang, in Redwood City.

The indictment alleges that from December 2000 through August 2001, "Chang and Chiang conspired to improperly recognize revenue for Clarent, resulting in the fraudulent filings of financial statements" with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The indictment lists several deals in which the defendants allegedly booked orders without disclosing to the company's investors or auditors that the buyers had the right to cancel the deals and return the products and in some cases that they had agreed to find another purchaser for any equipment buyers didn't need.

"These undisclosed contingencies between Clarent and its customers were either verbal or in writing and were provided by Chang and/or Chiang," according to the indictment.

Federal officials say that just before trading in Clarent shares was halted in September 2001, shares of its stock were worth $5.37. By the time it restated its earnings in May 2002, its price had slumped to 27 cents per share.

Diamond, the attorney representing Chang, said "the case will be that Jerry did nothing wrong and did not violate securities laws." He noted that a majority of the charges were filed against Chiang.

Former Networking Execs Indicted For Securities Fraud (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service, Washington Bureau

IDG News Service, March 28, 2006

Two former executives at networking equipment provider Clarent Corp. have been indicted on securities fraud charges, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced.

Jerry Shaw-Yau Chang, 48, of Los Altos, California, and Matthew Ming Chang Chiang, 36, of Taiwan were charged with filing fraudulent financial statements with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) in the last quarter of 2000 and the first and second quarters of 2001, the DOJ said. Chiang was additionally charged with one count of witness tampering in the indictment, unsealed late Friday.

Chang, former president and chief executive officer at Clarent, surrendered into custody Friday and was released on US$1 million bond in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, the DOJ said. An arrest warrant was issued for Chiang.

The defendants were top executives at Clarent, based in Redwood City, California. They are accused of conspiring to improperly recognize millions of dollars in revenue for Clarent.

Chang served as president and chief executive officer of Clarent between July 1996 and about July 2001, and Chiang was president of Clarent Asia/Pacific between September 2000 and September 2001, the indictment said.

The two are alleged to have negotiated high-value deals on behalf of Clarent with various overseas distributors. The defendants carried out the improper revenue recognition scheme by immediately recognizing revenue from transactions in which customers had been given the right to return products, the right to cancel orders, or a guarantee that Clarent would find a purchaser for any product customers were unable to sell on their own, the DOJ said.

The defendants are charged with entering into undisclosed side agreements establishing the contingencies to the sales. The defendants allegedly made these agreements without disclosing this information to the SEC and Clarent's independent auditor, Ernst & Young LLP.

The purpose of the scheme to defraud was to falsely inflate Clarent's revenue and profits, to exceed projected quarterly financial results, and to artificially sustain Clarent's stock price, the indictment said.

Trading on Clarent stock was halted on Sept. 4, 2001. The stock price on the previous day was at $5.37, and the company was valued at approximately $216 million, the DOJ said. On May 8, 2002, Clarent restated its financial statements for 2000 and 2001, at that time the stock price closed at $0.27 cents per share, and the company was valued at about $10.9 million.

Clarent, a provider of VOIP (voice over Internet Protocol) hardware and software for large businesses and multi-use networks, was sold to Verso Technologies Inc. in February 2003.

The maximum statutory penalty one count of securities fraud is 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine, plus restitution. The maximum statutory penalty for witness tampering is 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Grant Gross is Washington correspondent for the IDG News Service.

U.S. Pressures Firms Not To Pay Staff Legal Fees (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

Defense lawyers are closely watching an accounting-fraud case in New Hampshire that they see as the latest government effort to stop companies from paying the legal fees of indicted employees.

In the past three years, federal prosecutors in New York, Alabama and, now, Concord, N.H., have pursued a strategy that puts companies at risk of being branded as uncooperative if they don't cut off such payments. Lawyers say that could be tantamount to convicting defendants before they have even had a trial, since they can't properly defend themselves.

"If companies don't cooperate with the government, they can face a death penalty by being indicted," says Ellen Podgor, a professor at Stetson University College of Law. She adds that companies fear becoming the next Arthur Andersen LLP, which imploded shortly after its indictment in 2002 for allegedly obstructing the government's investigation of fraud at Enron Corp. (The accounting firm was later convicted of obstruction, but the Supreme Court overturned the verdict last year.) "Prosecutors can now force individuals to pay their own attorneys' fees," Prof. Podgor says, "and corporations have to go along."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse counters that "the government does not force corporations to do anything." If a company declines to advance fees, he adds, "that is a business decision made after weighing all of the costs and benefits of cooperation."

The cost of a trial is out of the financial reach of many white-collar defendants. "It is hard to defend a white-collar case for less than $100,000, and most cost much, much more than that," says John Hasnas, a professor at Georgetown University's McDonough School of Business.

In the New Hampshire case, five former executives of technology company Enterasys Networks Inc. charged with accounting fraud were set to stand trial in Concord this month but got a three-month reprieve after federal prosecutors were accused of misconduct. Government lawyers pressured the company to cut off legal fees to the defendants to weaken the employees' ability to fight the charges, defense lawyers allege in court filings.

New Hampshire U.S. Attorney William Morse, the lead prosecutor in the case and one of three accused of misconduct, denies wrongdoing. In pretrial testimony, when asked why he inquired about the company's payment of legal fees, he said, he simply wanted to inform Enterasys that the "payment of attorneys' fees for defendants was something that the Department of Justice had instructed its line prosecutors to consider" when assessing a company's cooperation with prosecutors. In an interview, he says, "Enterasys's decision to stop paying legal fees had nothing to do with government pressure." He says that he last spoke to Enterasys about the reimbursement of fees in the summer of 2004, and that the company didn't cut off funding until a year later.

Mr. Morse says he notified the Justice Department in 2004 that he had asked Enterasys about its payment of legal fees. He says he made the inquiry to determine whether the company was living up to its cooperation agreement. The Justice Department approved his actions, he says. A Justice Department spokeswoman declines to comment.

At a March 7 hearing, U.S. District Judge Paul Barbadoro, who is presiding over the trial, voiced concern that prosecutors had wrongly pressured Enterasys to cut off funding to the defendants. Nevertheless, he didn't sanction the prosecutors, and Enterasys reluctantly agreed to pay past-due legal bills and cover future costs.

The fee-payment issue has gained prominence in recent years, following a 2003 U.S. Justice Department memo that advised prosecutors to credit companies that cooperate with the government in an effort to avoid indictment. The memo, written by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, advises that a company's willingness to advance legal fees to "culpable employees" may signal a lack of cooperation. A spokesman for PepsiCo Inc., where Mr. Thompson is now the general counsel, says he wouldn't discuss the memo.

Until now, the nonpayment of legal fees has been most heavily debated in the government's ongoing tax-shelter case against former executives of KPMG LLP, which is scheduled for trial in New York in September. Yielding to government pressure, the accounting firm hasn't reimbursed these executives since 2004 in what Stanley Arkin, an attorney for one of the defendants, calls "a way of unfairly breaking down the defendants' ability to resist the government." KPMG declines to comment.

In their investigation of accounting fraud at HealthSouth Corp., federal prosecutors informed the company that the payment of fees to indicted executives would be viewed as a sign of noncooperation, according to lawyers in the case. The company later withheld fees to former chief executive Richard Scrushy, the only indicted executive who pleaded not guilty to federal charges. A jury in Birmingham, Ala., acquitted him of fraud in 2005.

Federal prosecutors also encouraged Symbol Technologies Inc. to withhold fees from executives charged in an alleged accounting fraud at the New York maker of bar-code scanners, according to company counsel Andrew Levander. Last month, in Central Islip, N.Y., U.S. District Judge Leonard Wexler ended the trial of three former Symbol executives after jurors said they were deadlocked.

Symbol was able to pay the executives' fees after it convinced prosecutors that company bylaws required it to do so, Mr. Levander says. "The government is not sensitive to the fact that a failure to indemnify can harm a company's ability to attract talented officers and directors in the future," the lawyer says.

Enterasys, based in Andover, Mass., makes wireless products and computer hardware. It was spun off by Cabletron Systems in 2000 and co-founded by New Hampshire Gov. Craig Benson before he went into politics. Gov. Benson hasn't been charged with wrongdoing. The executives, whose trial is set for June, are accused of artificially inflating revenue in 2001. Four other top executives, including the company's chief executive, have pleaded guilty to charges relating to accounting fraud.

Enterasys has agreed to cooperate with the government's fraud investigation, according to company lawyer Harvey Wolkoff. In 2004, prosecutors encouraged Enterasys not to pay the defendants' legal bills, in order to comply with its cooperation agreement, according to Mr. Wolkoff.

The law in Delaware, where the company is incorporated, authorizes Enterasys to advance legal fees to the defendants. Still, prosecutors asked Enterasys to contest the law. It was an appropriate request, says Mr. Wolkoff: "If [the defendants] did something criminal, why should" their legal fees be reimbursed?

The Enterasys defendants asserted in court filings that they have been hampered from proving their innocence by a lack of funding. In a February filing, the defendants claimed Enterasys stopped paying their legal fees in the summer of 2005, hurting their ability to investigate the backgrounds of witnesses and to review "voluminous" documents. Prosecutors have pressured Enterasys to cut off fees in order to "gain a substantial advantage at trial," defendants asserted in the filing.

Whatever the outcome of the Enterasys trial, Robert Bonner, a defense lawyer with Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP in Los Angeles who isn't involved in the New Hampshire case, worries that in the future more companies will "throw [indicted] executives to the wolves." His rationale: "The consequences of an indictment are so cataclysmic that companies will do anything to avoid it."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ_NMG_0022592

2 Dismissed From Jury Deciding Case Of Politician (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

CHICAGO, March 27 — A federal judge dismissed two jurors on Monday two weeks after the jury began deliberating in former Gov. George Ryan's corruption case, tossing into turmoil a trial that has stretched over six months.

The judge, Rebecca R. Pallmeyer of Federal District Court, said she had not made any decisions about whether to proceed and hoped to avoid a mistrial by replacing the two jurors with alternates.

But Mr. Ryan's lawyers objected to that prospect, arguing that "asking them to 'start deliberations anew' is asking the impossible."

The dismissals follow revelations in The Chicago Tribune last week that two jurors lied on questionnaires about whether they had criminal records, with one failing to disclose drunken-driving arrests that led to the revocation of his driver's license while Mr. Ryan, a Republican, was the secretary of state, whose office is responsible for such matters.

Judge Pallmeyer ordered the dismissed jurors not to discuss the situation, and lawyers in the case are also barred from speaking about it with reporters.

But legal experts who have been following the proceedings described Monday's removals as a serious threat to the trial, raising a strong issue for appeal regardless of how the judge proceeds.

"The deliberations have turned out to be a nightmare," said Patrick Cotter, a defense lawyer here and a former federal prosecutor in Brooklyn. He called the situation "a unique sort of perfect storm of problems."

Mr. Ryan, 72, and his friend Lawrence K. Warner, 67, face 22 counts of racketeering and conspiracy, accused of trading state business for gifts, vacations and cash.

Even before the dismissals, jurors had sent notes to Judge Pallmeyer indicating discontent, prompting her to urge them to treat each other with "dignity and respect" and to deliberate only when all of them were together in one room. Judge Pallmeyer said Monday that she had no indication they were deadlocked.

Alternates routinely replace jurors, but rarely so deep into deliberations. It is unusual, after all, for jurors to deliberate for even the eight full days that have already been logged in this case.

In an odd parallel, the conviction of Fife Symington, former governor of Arizona, was overturned in 1999 because a juror was dismissed seven days into deliberations. But another former governor, Edwin W. Edwards of Louisiana, remains in prison despite persistent appeals of his corruption conviction in 2000, partly based on the dismissal of a juror six days into deliberations.

Ted A. Donner, co-author of the law text "Jury Selection Strategy and Science," which was referred to in the defense's objection to using alternate jurors, predicted a mistrial in the Ryan case.

"It's one thing to hear a piece of testimony and have a judge tell you to disregard that," Mr. Donner said. "It's another thing to disregard an entire week's discussion that you've had with 11 other people."

Judge Pallmeyer said that if she decided to proceed, she planned to repeat the jury instructions and advise the reconstructed group to "begin afresh" and "to the extent possible, to go back into that jury room as though they have never discussed the case with one another at all."

But experts pointed out that the four alternates returned to their regular lives after closing arguments on March 10, exposed to blaring headlines about the case.

The fact that the two jurors were dismissed for lying, and that one might have harbored a grudge against the secretary of state's office for denying him driving privileges, complicates matters further.

"If you're the defense, you're saying, 'Oh my God, there's been a guy on the jury for eight days of deliberations who's against us, who hates us,' " Mr. Cotter said, imagining an appeal. "I mean, how do you put that toothpaste back in the tube?"

Determining whether the jury has been tainted presents a major challenge for the judge.

"She doesn't want to appear to be asking about what they've decided," said Andrew D. Leipold, a law professor at the University of Illinois.

The question, Professor Leipold said, is whether the jury is "still banging their heads on Count 1" or is "chugging away nicely."

DOJ_NMG_0022593

If they have already voted on several counts, he said, "are we really going to have the same conversation again, and everyone will stare at the two new jurors and say, 'Do you agree?' "

Ryan Judge Dismisses 2 Jurors (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI AND ANNIE SWEENEY, STAFF REPORTERS

Chicago Sun-Times, March 28, 2006

Two jurors who served for nearly six months on former Gov. George Ryan's jury were dismissed today after a federal judge learned the two had criminal histories they didn't disclose at the beginning of the trial.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said she would make a decision Tuesday of how and whether deliberations should proceed. "If we can continue fairly, that would be my goal," Pallmeyer said. "I continue to hope we can proceed in some fashion."

She said it was possible alternate jurors would replace the two who were dismissed but that she had not made that decision. If that were to happen, the judge said she would order the jury to begin its deliberations all over again.

In a motion filed this morning, Ryan's lawyers object to replacing the two questionable jurors with substitutes, saying that would constitute a violation of Ryan's Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial.

The two jurors in question were seen walking separate from other jurors this morning. It appeared they were leaving Pallmeyer's chambers.

The remaining jurors left the building at about 11:30 a.m.

A male juror did not disclose DUI convictions and a weapons conviction, and a female juror did not disclose six arrests and a weapons charge. The woman was never convicted, according to public records.

The revelations came after the Chicago Tribune brought them to the court's attention last week.

In the motion this morning, Ryan's lawyers said it was too late in the proceedings to substitute jurors.

"The substitution of alternates at this stage of deliberations would violate Ryan's Sixth Amendment right to trial by a fair and impartial jury," Ryan's lawyers wrote.

They indicated that notes sent from the jury to Pallmeyer last week made it appear that the jurors were "deadlocked."

Pallmeyer could put in two alternate jurors to replace the two jurors in question. But the defense argues that those alternates almost certainly have been exposed to news coverage of the deliberations. The alternates were excused two weeks ago and told not to discuss the case.

In the afternoon, one of the defendants, Lawrence Warner, showed up at the courthouse. He waited briefly in the courtroom but left when lawyers never came out from behind closed doors.

2 Jurors Dismissed In Ex-Gov.'s Trial (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, March 28, 2006

CHICAGO -- A federal judge said Monday that she has dismissed two jurors from former Gov. George Ryan's corruption trial and that she is still trying to determine whether the stalled jury deliberations can be restarted.

"I haven't made any final decisions about whether we will be able to proceed," U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer told reporters after dismissing the two jurors.

To get deliberations going again, she said, she would have to replace the dismissed jurors with alternates _ something defense attorneys say would violate Ryan's rights.

The announcement came after a day in which deliberations where on hold while the judge met privately with attorneys on both sides to try to prevent a mistrial after six months of proceedings.

The trial has already cost millions of dollars to hold _ "a very significant investment," Pallmeyer noted.

She said her goal would be to forge ahead, if "we can proceed with this case fairly."

The two jurors were dropped after articles in the Chicago Tribune last week that said they had apparently lied about their criminal records on questionnaires filled out before the trial.

Ryan, 72, and lobbyist Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count federal indictment with racketeering, fraud and other offenses.

DOJ_NMG_0022594

Prosecutors say that as secretary of state for eight years in the 1990s and later as governor, Ryan steered big-money state leases and contracts to Warner and others.

Ryan was rewarded with vacations and gifts ranging from $145,000 in loans to his brother's sputtering business to a free golf bag, prosecutors allege.

Ryan and Warner say they did nothing illegal.

The judge said she wanted to talk with jurors Tuesday morning, apparently to determine how they feel about proceeding.

If the trial goes on, the judge said she was likely to bring the jury back into the courtroom, instruct them again and "explain to them that my expectation is that they will begin afresh."

Starting from scratch could add weeks to a trial that began in September. If jurors go back to work, they will be in their third week of deliberations.

Earlier Monday, the defense argued in a court filing that replacing the two jurors with alternates would violate Ryan's constitutional right to a fair and impartial jury.

They argued that the jury would be unable to erase conclusions reached so far. "Asking them to 'start deliberations anew' is asking the impossible," they said.

Newspaper Criticized As Judge Ponders Next Step (CBS2CHI)

CBS 2 Chicago, March 28, 2006

Tribune Investigation Triggered Juror Controversy

(CBS) CHICAGO Two jurors have been dismissed in the George Ryan corruption trial. The key decision the judge will have to make Tuesday is whether to keep the trial from being derailed.

It's a case that's been loaded with twists and turns long after the closing arguments were made.

As CBS 2 Chief Correspondent Jay Levine reports, after more than five long months of testimony, the pressure is on the judge to decide exactly what to do next.

Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer's dismissing the two jurors who allegedly lied on their questionnaires leaves her with several options. She could replace both with the alternates she released before deliberations. She could replace just one of them, and proceed with 11 jurors. Or she could simply go with the remaining 10, although both sides must agree to that, which appears unlikely.

"I think this judge will do anything possible, within reason, to keep this trial going," CBS 2 Legal Analyst Irv Miller said.

George Ryan's attorneys argue that replacements at this stage would be unfair to Ryan and remaining jurors: "To ask them to start deliberations anew with new colleagues is asking the impossible."

As Judge Pallmeyer ponders her next step, others question the Chicago Tribune investigation that triggered the controversy.

"It was waiting until the trial had closed and the deliberations began with replacements gone home that caused all these problems," said Northwestern University Law Professor Ron Allen.

According to Tribune Editor Anne Marie Lipinski, the investigation that discovered a juror's criminal background started after deliberations began as a feature story.

"We were looking for routine information so we could contact jurors when the case was over, which is very common in stories like this," Lipinski said. "The reporter assigned to this came across this information. We were quite surprised by it and immediately brought it to the attention of the court."

That information has now brought this case to the brink of a mistrial. Professor Allen calls it an question of corporate responsibility.

"There's simply no advantage to waiting until this time except to increase the harm this investigation causes," Allen said.

"For us to have withheld that information at the point we came across it would have been extremely irresponsible," Lipinski said.

Tuesday's Tribune will have a complete explanation of how, why and when it launched its probe.

DOJ_NMG_0022595

Also Tuesday, Judge Pallmeyer will decide whether the alternates have kept themselves away from media coverage and conversation about the trial. If they have, she'll seat them and the trial will continue. If not, a mistrial might be the only option.

How The Tribune Uncovered Juror Problems (CHIT)

By James Janega, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 28, 2006

After a 5½-month trial and eight days of jury deliberations, the Chicago Tribune uncovered public records last week indicating that two jurors in the federal trial of former Gov. George Ryan gave false answers on their jury questionnaires.

Both jurors had checked boxes on pretrial questionnaires indicating that they had never been charged with a crime, but the Tribune found public records that appeared to contradict those answers.

Those jurors were dismissed from the trial Monday by U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer.

While the information had the potential to disrupt the trial, Tribune editors recognized it could be even more damaging if it were revealed after the jury had reached its verdict. Nationally, other cases have been overturned on appeal when it was discovered after the verdict that jurors had been untruthful to the court.

Because of this, the newspaper went to Chief Judge Charles Kocoras as soon as possible, both to continue the reporting on the story and to inform court officials of the records it had discovered.

"The paper took extraordinary precaution by alerting the chief judge of its findings in advance of any publication so that the court might address matters as it saw fit," said Tribune Editor Ann Marie Lipinski. "In addition, no effort was made to contact the subjects of the stories—as would be common practice in any other similar reporting effort—so as not to interfere in any manner with sitting jurors.

"The paper has the utmost respect for the process and the serious job the court and jurors are engaged in. Once we had this knowledge, it would have been irresponsible for us to keep it to ourselves.

"Whatever challenges now exist, they would have been far more grave had they come out later, or after the fact of a verdict."

The Tribune's reporting on the stories began Wednesday.

Reporters frequently interview jurors after a case ends and the jurors are dismissed from duty. In preparation for a verdict, Tribune reporter Ray Gibson was checking computer databases for information about the jurors.

In this case, he was not looking for criminal histories but was interested in the jurors' political affiliations.

On the first screen of links to records for one juror, Gibson came across a 1995 felony conviction for aggravated DUI. The charge indicated the man had prior DUIs as well.

Police reporter David Heinzmann then located court and criminal records for the man, and Gibson and federal courts reporter Matt O'Connor matched information from those records with the answers given by the juror on his jury questionnaire.

By Wednesday night, it was clear to the reporters and their editors that the records indicated that it was the same man.

Under normal circumstances, the reporters would then contact the subject of the story for comment. But an order from Pallmeyer prohibited any contact with the jurors while the case is ongoing.

Tribune editors decided to contact Kocoras as soon as possible, both to seek comment and to let the court know of the newspaper's findings. A message was left in Kocoras' chambers Wednesday night, but the call was not returned.

On Thursday morning, reporters Gibson and O'Connor met with Kocoras. Kocoras then contacted Pallmeyer, who sent the jury home early Thursday with the announcement that she had launched an investigation into a juror. The Tribune published the first story on the Ryan jury on its Web site Thursday night.

Tribune reporters continued looking at public records about the jurors on Friday.

They discovered a second juror, a woman, who could be linked through public records to an alias. Someone with that alias faced drug and other charges but was not convicted, records show.

Again, the reporters went to the chief judge Friday afternoon as part of their reporting.

Those results were published online Friday night.

Jury Duty Can Reveal Secrets (CHIT)

By Ray Quintanilla And James Janega, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 28, 2006

The white-hot spotlight of the American judicial system can be uncomfortable, with lawyers, judges and sometimes the media prying into difficult and embarrassing moments. But defendants aren't alone in the glare. From the moment a jury summons arrives, potential jurors find their own histories under scrutiny.

"Has any member of your immediate family or a very close friend ever been the victim of a crime?" asks a typical juror questionnaire. "Have you ever been a party to any lawsuit?"

Experts say most jurors, facing threat of perjury, try to be honest. But they say others may be too embarrassed to answer fully, or think it doesn't matter.

"I think some truly don't understand the gravity of the responses that they're giving. And others are being evasive, and we have no idea which it is," said Duke University Law School professor Neil Vidmar.

If they do have something in their past, "they may have said, 'That's over and done with,'" he said. Officers of the court seldom know when a juror has stopped being truthful.

The slippery issue of juror honesty, one that has occupied legal scholars from university campuses to the U.S. Supreme Court, was cast into sharp relief Monday when U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer dismissed two jurors in the middle of deliberations over the fate of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan. A Tribune investigation found they may have lied on juror questionnaires.

It is unclear how representative the Ryan jury is of juries in general. There is long-standing debate in the legal community about whether long, high-profile trials wind up with jurors of different qualities and demographics, said University of Chicago law professor Al Alschuler.

But once summoned, all jurors face an insular world in which long stretches of tedium play out against a backdrop of deep importance, and the possibility of drama.

Richard Leja, a 49-year-old Berwyn painter, on Monday took a commuter train to get downtown by 9:15 a.m., rode a crowded elevator to the jury room on the 17th floor of the Daley Center, waited all day and was not picked for a county civil trial.

In those numbing circumstances, he said the personal details he was asked to provide verged on galling.

"It just seems like they want a lot of information from me," said Leja, 49, as he and 150 strangers poured out of the Circuit Court's jury room six hours later, their $17.20 checks in hand.

"I'm not so sure what you put down on those forms really matters all that much," said Aliyah Shields, 19, of Chicago. "A person can still be a good juror, no matter what they put down on that form."

But lying about the information "is sufficient for removal"—and possibly prosecution—warned Cornell University Law professor Valerie Hans, a jury expert watching the Ryan trial, for which the juror questionnaire was 34 pages long.

"Of course, the more questions you ask, the greater the likelihood that a prospective juror can get in trouble," she said.

Tribune staff reporter Michael Higgins contributed to this report.

Letters To Judge Show Support For Abramoff (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — The fallen Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff may be among the most unpopular men in Washington, shunned by many of his former friends at the White House and on Capitol Hill.

But more than 260 others — including a House member from California, a senior Senate staff member and several leaders of the Washington Jewish community — have stepped forward in letters to a federal judge to praise Mr. Abramoff and ask that he be spared a long prison sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0022597

The House member, Dana Rohrabacher, Republican of California, said in his letter that Mr. Abramoff was a "selfless patriot" whose work in a conservative lobbying group, Citizens for America, in the 1980's was evidence of his desire "to make a positive contribution to the nation he loves so much."

The Senate staff member, Steven Groves, counsel to the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, vouched for "Jack as a caring, pious and generous man who dotes on his friends and family."

Excerpts of the letters from Mr. Rohrabacher, Mr. Groves and others were revealed in court papers filed by Mr. Abramoff's lawyers on Friday in Federal District Court in Miami, where the lobbyist faces sentencing on Wednesday after pleading guilty to federal fraud charges involving his purchase of a cruise-ship line. He faces up to seven years in prison. He has pleaded guilty to separate corruption charges in Washington.

The letters, along with the filing by the defense in Miami, sought to portray Mr. Abramoff as a man devoted to his family and to his faith who, while acknowledging that he defrauded Indian tribes and other clients of millions of dollars, deserved leniency because so much of his money had been given to charity.

"Media attention regarding Mr. Abramoff, from newspaper editors to late-night comedy monologues, has made him into a caricature and has distorted a lifetime of accomplishments," the defense lawyers said in their brief. "As large a figure as he has been painted in the media, he is an even larger figure in matters of family, faith, generosity and remorse."

As Parting Gift, Duke Cut Check To NRCC (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 28, 2006

Before former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) headed to prison, he prepared a small parting gift intended to help his colleagues in the upcoming election: a $2,000 check from his expiring campaign committee to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

That relatively small gesture, made Dec. 13 according to Cunningham's campaign records, followed on the heels of an Oct. 24 donation of $11,684 to the NRCC. It also came about two weeks after he admitted to taking $2.4 million in bribes to direct government business to certain defense contractors.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said yesterday that the party never received the $2,000 check and that it has "no plans" to return the nearly $12,000 it accepted before Cunningham's Nov. 28 guilty plea.

"I mailed it to them," said Cunningham's campaign treasurer, Kenneth Batson. "If it hasn't cleared, I'll stop payment and send it again."

Batson said he hopes to close Cunningham's account this quarter, which ends Friday.

Whether or not the last injection of money made it to the NRCC, the donation shows that a lawmaker can continue to influence elections even after a federal bribery conviction. And it's perfectly legal.

Cunningham's account was subjected to no special limitations after his conviction, raising the prospect that another lawmaker could funnel an entire war chest of millions of dollars to colleagues or a party committee on his or her way to the penitentiary.

"They can donate it to charity or party committees," said Ian Stirton, a spokesman for the Federal Election Commission (FEC).

"Obviously some people would have concerns if questionable money is being reintroduced into the campaign-finance system by people who have been found to do improper things," said Daniel Lathrop, a database editor at the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan government watchdog group.

But Lathrop noted that others would prefer that jail-bound lawmakers send money to the party rather than sit on large piles of cash.

Four days after he was indicted in September 2004, former Rep. Frank Ballance (D-N.C.) transferred $25,000 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

He did not give the DCCC money after pleading guilty to conspiring to commit mail fraud and launder money in November 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0022598

Since then, his campaign committee has given contributions ranging from $500 to $2,000 to Greater Little Zion United Holy Church, John Miles Youth Ministry, Kiddie World Inc. and the Warren Family Institute, according to FEC records.

Most of Cunningham's remaining campaign cash was used to pay lawyers at O'Melveny & Myers $570,000 in the last quarter of 2005. In an advisory opinion, the FEC ruled that Cunningham could use campaign money to pay his lawyers because the charges against him stemmed from official duties.

Once they are no longer candidates for office, Lathrop said, "there's very little lawmakers can't do with that money."

Cunningham had announced in July 2005 that he would not seek reelection.

Earlier this month, he was sentenced to more than eight years in prison and ordered to pay $3.7 million in back taxes and restitution, plus the proceeds from an auction of ill-gotten goods.

Mitchell Wade, a defense contractor, pleaded guilty in February to giving the congressman more than $1 million in bribes. Wade and other employees of his company, MZM, were major contributors to Cunningham's campaign committee.

Forti expressed no concern about the origin of the money that ended up in the NRCC coffers. The majority of Cunningham's contributors "wanted to support Duke Cunningham, and Duke wanted to support us," he said.

Lathrop says that reporting discrepancies between one committee and another are fairly common in the campaign-finance system and that it is not terribly hard to imagine a $2,000 check getting lost at the NRCC, which had $21 million on hand at last count.

Forti said the NRCC does not have any standard practice for dealing with donations from convicted former lawmakers.

"All contributions will be evaluated individually," he said. "There's no blanket policy."

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, did not answer a request for comment on the DCCC's policy regarding such donations before press time.

Hand It Over (RC)

By John Bresnahan and Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, March 28, 2006

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman has let stand a subpoena issued to a Senate Indian Affairs Committee staffer by attorneys for David Safavian, the former Bush administration official charged with lying to federal investigators about his relationship with Jack Abramoff.

Friedman, who set a May 22 trial date for Safavian, is still considering a motion by Safavian to have his case thrown out entirely, and Safavian's motion to inspect the prosecutors' instructions to the grand jury that indicted him was denied. Friedman released the orders on Friday.

Safavian's attorneys had subpoenaed Indian Affairs investigator Bryan David Parker for all documents or notes Parker made during his discussions with Safavian in February and March 2005. The Justice Department tried to have the subpoena quashed, arguing that Safavian's attorneys already had notes from an FBI agent who interviewed Parker. Friedman eventually sided with Safavian.

Safavian allegedly lied to officials at the General Services Administration, where he served as chief of staff from May 2002 to January 2004, the FBI and the Indian Affairs Committee about his dealings with Abramoff, and whether the former lobbyist was seeking his help in getting the GSA to grant his requests for government property. Safavian has denied the charges.

Going to K Street. Andrew Shore, formerly chief of staff to the House Republican Conference, is taking a lobbying post with the law firm Mayer, Brown, Rowe and Maw.

In addition to his work with the Conference, Shore also logged time as an assistant to senior members of the Ways and Means Committee, including then-Chairman Bill Archer (R-Texas) and then-Rep. Phil Crane (R-Ill.).

Shore is expected to focus on tax, trade and health care issues for the firm.

G-Sting Wiretap Conversations Cast Mary Kincaid-Chauncey In A Bad Light (KVBC-TV)

KVBC-TV, March 28, 2006

Monday was a good day to be Dario Herrera and a bad day to be Mary Kincaid-Chauncey in the G-Sting political corruption trial.

The former Clark County commissioners are accused of accepting bribes from former strip club owner Mike Galardi in exchange for their votes on strip club regulations.

In wiretaps played for jurors Monday, Mike Galardi and Lance Malone repeatedly conspire over how much money to offer Dario Herrera in exchange for his vote to allow nude dancing with alcohol being served at strip clubs.

In one instance, Galardi is heard telling Malone to offer him 20, meaning $20,000 the day of the vote. Malone says give it to him right after the vote. But wiretaps revealed Herrera was opposed to the ordinance especially since he was running for Congress at the time. And no matter what Galardi offered, Herrera wouldn't budge.

Mary Kincaid-Chauncey on the other hand, can be heard repeatedly conspiring with Malone to get votes to go Galardi's way, and can also be heard asking Malone for Galardi's money.

Malone says to Galardi: "Mary's solid, Mary's not going to budge, she's there for us."

News 3 Investigator Darcy Spears questioned defense attorneys about their clients.Wright didn't answer the question because a few minutes earlier the judge had cracked down on defense attorneys for talking to the press.

Details Of City Hall Bribery Case Get Airing Today (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 28, 2006

The lawyer for an ex-Minneapolis City Council member accused of accepting a bribe wants to examine more closely the role of a key informant.

David Chanen and Randy Furst, Star Tribune Gary A. Carlson once alerted Minneapolis police that his older brother planned to set fire to Carlson's bar to collect a share of the insurance money. The brother, who was caught leaving Gary's Pub just after a fire was set, went to jail for a year.

Nearly three decades later, Carlson played informant again, this time in a case that has drawn far more scrutiny -- a corruption scandal at Minneapolis City Hall.

Carlson's role last year in helping the FBI investigate Dean Zimmermann, who at the time was a City Council member, is expected to come into sharper focus today at a court hearing on the bribery allegations. Zimmermann's attorney is seeking more information about Carlson -- a real estate developer and the unnamed "cooperating witness" who assisted the FBI.

The two men are the central figures in a case that rocked City Hall.

The case also cast a shadow over Zimmermann two months before he faced voters in November -- an election that he narrowly lost. Now there are hints that the case may be widening.

The politician and the developer would seem not to have much in common. Zimmermann, 63, was a handyman before he was elected to the City Council in 2001. He commuted by bicycle from his home in the Whittier neighborhood. Since he was turned out by voters, Zimmermann has returned to his trade, relying on friends and political supporters for a steady stream of work laying kitchen linoleum, repairing sheet rock or unplugging clogged toilets. A Green Party member, he also keeps his hand in activist causes, serving recently as a marshal at an anti-war parade.

Carlson, on the other hand, is a man on the move. At 50, he has rebounded from bankruptcy twice, and he bought an $850,000 house in Edina three years ago. He has built single-family luxury homes throughout the Twin Cities' western suburbs, but not long ago made the leap to developing a $20 million condominium, retail and office project. His political activities have included holding a fundraiser at his home last May for Republican U.S. Sen. Norm Coleman.

The project in question

But Zimmermann and Carlson's paths intersected at Chicago Commons, the development Carlson was building in south Minneapolis adjacent to the Sixth Ward that Zimmermann represented. From the start, it appears, the project proceeded under a cloud.

Chicago Commons, at 24th Street and Chicago Avenue S., sits on the site of a former nursing home. The Carlson Family Limited Partnership bought the property, which included the vacant Colonial Place Nursing Home, for $1.45 million in 2004.

About two days before the scheduled closing on the nursing home, which police said Carlson planned to raze, two arson fires caused severe damage. A fire in a mechanical room quickly fizzled and a sprinkler extinguished another fire in a laundry cart. But the sprinklers ran for two days before being discovered, said police Sgt. Tony Miranda.

DOJ_NMG_0022600

Around the time the fires were set, Carlson and business partner Azzam Sabri walked around the building, heard a beeping sound and saw a blinking alarm by the back door, Miranda said. The men told police they thought fire and police would be dispatched, so they didn't alert authorities. But for some unknown reason, the connection to an alarm-monitoring service had been stopped, Miranda said.

In the ensuing court fight over insurance proceeds for the water damage, the nursing home owner, Alef Homes Co., alleged that the Chicago Commons Corp. was "responsible for the arson." The corporation denied that it set the fire or knew the identity of who did set it. The insurer and Chicago Commons eventually settled their dispute.

Chicago Commons is "getting ready to buy and knock down the building, a suspicious fire happens and they get a big insurance claim," said Jim Rock, a senior sales associate who represented Alef Homes in the sale. "This was a huge battle for the [insurance] adjustors."

No one has been charged in the case.

Nor has anyone been charged in an arson at Carlson's south Minneapolis home in 1977.

The investigation unveiled

Chicago Commons returned to the spotlight in September, when the FBI searched Zimmermann's home. The search warrant affidavit outlined the bribery allegations.

The "cooperating witness" told the FBI last May that Zimmermann sought campaign contributions in exchange for supporting zoning changes that would aid Chicago Commons. Zimmermann allegedly took $7,200 from the witness during three meetings in June and August, court documents said. The meetings were secretly recorded. Those recordings have not been made public.

Zimmermann ultimately joined in the unanimous council vote to reject the proposal to allow more retail in the project. He allegedly explained to Carlson that he had tried, but failed, to round up council support.

In September, Zimmermann arrived at Chicago Commons for another meeting with Carlson. The developer walked out of the meeting as two men in dark suits walked in, Zimmermann said. He figured by their look they were FBI agents.

Indeed, the agents questioned him on the spot. In January, Zimmermann was indicted.

He declined to discuss much about the case, except to say the bribery allegations are not true. He said he tried to help Carlson as he would try to help any constituent. When Carlson said he wanted to donate money to Zimmermann's campaign, Zimmermann said, he suggested Carlson contribute to a legal fight over redistricting. "Where's the crime?" he said.

Carlson declined to be interviewed for this story. His attorney, Mark Larsen, said Carlson's "sense of duty to his community" prompted him to step forward and tell authorities about City Hall corruption.

"Unlike many cooperating witnesses, Mr. Carlson is not facing criminal charges of any kind," Larsen said in a written statement. "He is merely attempting to do the right thing."

In today's court hearing, Zimmermann's attorney said he will probe Carlson's role in the case. Dan Scott said he will question an FBI agent about Carlson and has filed a motion asking prosecutors to turn over any evidence that would address Carlson's credibility.

Carlson has had some minor run-ins with the law: a misdemeanor drunken driving charge in 1994 and last fall he pleaded guilty to helping his wife leave the scene of an accident in Bloomington. In July, Carlson and his brother Donald, who is an incorporator for Chicago Commons, were charged with fifth-degree misdemeanor assault for allegedly attacking a process server at their Danna Inc. office in St. Louis Park. The charges were dropped.

In September, Carlson hit Star Tribune reporter Paul McEnroe with the side mirror of his truck as he was driving away from Chicago Commons. Carlson told police it was accidental. McEnroe, who said he was bruised, filed a police report, but no charges have been filed. McEnroe's attorney has written a letter to Carlson seeking monetary damages.

Carlson also has filed for bankruptcy twice -- in 1990 and in 2000.

Now his Chicago Commons is in financial trouble. Only four of the 81 condos have been sold as of last week, said David Hellmuth, an attorney who represents Carlson in connection with the project. There are verbal commitments to buy about 20 percent of the units, said Greg Stull, owner of Realty Executives, which took over sales of the condos in January.

Marshall Bank has started foreclosure proceedings on an $11.9 million loan to Chicago Commons. The bank said in court documents that Chicago Commons owes $11.1 million, plus interest and other fees, and it began missing payments in December.

"Carlson has advised me he has lost a lot of money on this project," Hellmuth said. "The project has become a financial disaster."

Relationships shift

In the meantime, Donald Carlson remains a strong ally of the brother who once turned him in for an arson plot. They have worked together on business deals, including jointly incorporating Chicago Commons. Donald Carlson issued a statement through an attorney saying he loves his brother and is proud of Gary's role in the Zimmermann investigation.

Gary Carlson, however, has had a falling out with partner Sabri. While he has praised Carlson for his work ethic and vision as a developer, Sabri said he was upset that Carlson worked with the FBI. "Entrapping people is not in my nature," he said.

Now Sabri himself may be in the FBI's cross hairs. The same prosecutor and FBI agent working on the Zimmermann case recently filed a subpoena asking the city's development agency to turn over documents related to Sabri and a neighborhood shopping center near Chicago Commons and in which Sabri said he is a part owner.

Sabri still believes Chicago Commons is good for Minneapolis, but he said he fears Carlson's role in Zimmermann's bribery case will bring adverse publicity.

"I'm a spiritual person," he said. "Maybe Chicago Commons is not a blessed project."

Witness Details Alleged 'Mafia Cops' Payment (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 28, 2006

Visions of the tropics as the scene of skulduggery entered the "Mafia Cops" trial Monday, with a witness telling a federal court jury that he passed money directly to one of two ex-NYPD detectives on a Caribbean island.

Thomas Galpine, 49, said he paid $10,000 to former detective Louis Eppolito in 1988 or 1989 for a Caribbean time-sharing unit at the behest of businessman Burton Kaplan, a key associate of the Luchese crime family.

Galpine, who is serving a 16-year sentence for marijuana trafficking, was for many years a self-described errand boy for Kaplan, until both were convicted on federal drug charges in 1997. He could not recall whether he passed the money to Eppolito on Martinique or St. Maarten.

Kaplan, who is serving a 27-year sentence, testified earlier in the case that he paid Eppolito and his NYPD partner, Stephen Caracappa, for law enforcement information that was useful to former Luchese crime boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. Kaplan also testified that Eppolito and Caracappa took part in some gangland killings.

Once highly regarded NYPD detectives, Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are on trial in Brooklyn federal court on racketeering charges. They are accused of playing roles in eight gangland murders and of leaking sensitive law enforcement information to Casso. Both retired from the NYPD in the early 1990s.

Galpine, testifying with a promise that prosecutors would help him get a reduction in his sentence if he is a truthful witness, told the jury he met Eppolito at Kaplan's Brooklyn home sometime in 1987 or 1988. Galpine said that Kaplan told Eppolito that he, Galpine, was "like a son to me" as a way of saying he was trustworthy.

Galpine's testimony had the effect of backing up Kaplan on a number of points, among them, Kaplan's lending of $75,000 in marijuana smuggling money to Eppolito for a Las Vegas house purchase, and Kaplan's claim that he was getting information from two cops.

Under questioning by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch, Galpine said he decided to cooperate with the government in April 2005 because it seemed as if investigators were building a case that could implicate him.

"It seemed to me, little by little, I was going to get charged. ... I knew that there were two New York City cops and Burt was getting information from them," Galpine said.

On cross-examination by Eppolito's attorney, Bruce Cutler, Galpine admitted he had led a bad life.

"You were on a road to perdition?" asked Cutler.

"Just something I did in my life; I had a choice and made a bad one," Galpine replied.

But he insisted he was sticking to his promise to the government to tell the truth about his life of crime.

"I told them everything, and along with that everything was Louis Eppolito," he said.

Federal prosecutors are expected to wrap up their case this week. U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein scheduled closing arguments for Monday.

Ex-Detective Took Payoff, 'Errand Man' Says On Stand (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

In Elizabethan dramas, the cast of characters is wildly diverse, ranging from the noble lords and kings to the lowly fools and scullery maids.

In criminal dramas, it is much the same: the cast runs from major witnesses with bombshell testimony to lesser ones who say their piece in an hour on the stand.

The federal racketeering trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, two retired New York detectives accused of killing for the mob, has had a fascinating cast of supporting players, ranging from the Brooklyn patrolman who worked out at the same gym as the gangster whose dead body he discovered on the street to Mr. Eppolito's mistress from 20 years ago.

Those minor characters advance the story of the trial and give a feel for its ambience, its milieu.

In this case, the milieu is the Old World Brooklyn universe of two-bit hoods and murder where, according to testimony yesterday, the rules to live by were as follows: never go directly to a crime scene; always call before you meet someone; and "watch your mirrors," as a witness said.

His name was Thomas Galpine, and he claimed to be a "doer, not a talker," a man whose life included alcohol, cocaine, domestic violence, mistresses ("paramours," he said) and a controlling interest in a Korean massage parlor, which, he reminded the jury, was "a house of prostitution."

Mr. Galpine, who is 49 and in prison, was called by the government to bolster the testimony of his former boss, Burton Kaplan, a marijuana dealer who has told the jury that the two detectives served as spies and assassins for the mob.

A plainspoken man from Flatlands, Brooklyn, Mr. Galpine said that in 1974, after an aimless adolescence mowing lawns, bagging groceries and driving a truck for Polly-O cheese, he went to work as Mr. Kaplan's young man Friday, doing chores around the boss's house, taking the older man's mother to the hospital and putting eyedrops in his eyes after he had retina surgery.

The two met in the early 1970's at a Brooklyn appliance store, where Mr. Galpine said he loaded air-conditioners for installation men like Mr. Kaplan, who tipped him at $20 a load. When Mr. Galpine lost the job, he went on Mr. Kaplan's payroll and was soon embroiled, he said, in an illicit empire that stretched from homemade quaaludes to counterfeit Champion sweatshirts.

They became friends, close enough that the young man, who was not Jewish, not only was invited to a Kaplan family bas mitzvah, but pronounced it that way, in the old Ashkenazi style.

As Mr. Galpine put it: "We made some quaaludes moves, we made some marijuana moves, we made some money."

Some of that money, he said, was given to Mr. Eppolito — once when the lawman needed cash to rent a time-share while on vacation with his wife.

On Mr. Kaplan's orders, Mr. Galpine said, he flew to either Martinique or St. Maarten — he couldn't remember which — and gave the detective $10,000 in $100 bills in a "small eatery" at the airport.

Lawyers for the two defendants were in the unenviable position of hearing Mr. Kaplan's words repeated by Mr. Galpine. On cross-examination, Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, went on the attack.

He called Mr. Galpine an "acolyte and errand man" under the spell of Mr. Kaplan, whom Mr. Cutler called "a Fagin character" who had led the witness on a "spiral to perdition, to hell."

Mr. Cutler is given to the fancy phrase, often reaching for a top-shelf word when one off the bottom will suffice.

DOJ_NMG_0022603

Nonetheless, Mr. Galpine seemed unfazed. His answer was, indeed, credible for a man who had sworn, as he put it, to "tell it like it is."

To Mr. Cutler's apocalyptic remark, all he said was: "What?"

Mob Cop 'kin' Links Eppolito (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 28, 2006

The feds yesterday called a member of Louis Eppolito's own crime family to testify against the reputed Mafia cop.

Tammy Ahmed is the daughter of slain mob associate Frank Santora, who was the original intermediary between Eppolito - his first cousin - and Luchese crime associate Burton Kaplan.

Ahmed, 33, appeared nervous as she was questioned about Eppolito, his NYPD partner Steven Caracappa and Kaplan meeting with her father in her Brooklyn home. Prosecutor Robert Henoch asked if her father ever talked about cops.

"They weren't his favorite subject," said Ahmed, whose father allegedly participated in a murder and kidnappings with Eppolito and Caracappa in 1986. He was rubbed out in 1987.

More damning was Ahmed's identification of names and numbers in her father's phone book - including the reputed Mafia cops, Kaplan and a tow-truck driver who is expected to testify today that he helped Santora bury the corpse of murder victim Israel Greenwald.

Also bolstering the government's case yesterday was Thomas Galpine, who testified that Kaplan, his mentor-in-crime, told him the cops were on the Luchese crime family's payroll.

"Mr. Eppolito was a New York City detective who was passing information to Burt Kaplan, and Burt was passing it along to [Luchese underboss] Anthony Casso," Galpine said.

Galpine, 49, a convicted drug dealer, said he gave Eppolito cash twice and also delivered a Plymouth Fury sedan to Santora that was outfitted to look like an unmarked police car.

The car looked so official that Galpine said he was driving it when "a young black guy came running up the street screaming, 'I need help!' I said, 'Call the cops,'" and drove off.

Prosecutors will argue it is the vehicle Eppolito and Caracappa drove when they used lights, sirens and their badges to kidnap or kill mob targets.

On cross examination, lawyer Bruce Cutler tried dazzling the witness with flamboyant gestures and fancy phrases - "This Fagan character [Kaplan] ... led you down a spiral of perdition, perdition, hell."

"What?" asked Galpine, a 10th-grade dropout. "What's the question?"

Agents: Nichols Blamed Ex-lover Defense Asks Judge To Bar Statement (AJC)

By Rhonda Cook, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 28, 2006

Accused killer Brian Nichols told investigators he shot up the Fulton County Courthouse on March 11, 2005, because of his former girlfriend's romantic relationship with a minister, two FBI agents testified Monday.

The two agents testified they were about to leave the Gwinnett County apartment complex where Nichols surrendered on March 12 when he made the spontaneous admission while sitting in the back seat handcuffed and shackled.

Agents Joseph Fonseca and Cynthia Myers said they had just explained to Nichols where they were taking him — to the FBI's Atlanta offices — and while there they wanted to talk to him about the deaths of three people at the courthouse and a fourth person in Buckhead.

"I would like to make a statement," Fonseca said Nichols responded. "This whole thing started because my girlfriend slept with our pastor."

In preparation for the death penalty trial set for October at the same courthouse, Nichols' attorneys asked Senior Judge Hilton Fuller to ban testimony about his statement to the FBI agents. It was one of several motions to be heard this week.

When the killings occurred, Nichols was on trial a second time on charges that he had raped the former girlfriend. After being transported to the courthouse, authorities say, he overpowered a deputy and used her gun to kill Superior Court Judge

Rowland Barnes, court reporter Julie Ann Brandau and sheriff's Deputy Sgt. Hoyt Teasley. Nichols later allegedly killed U.S. customs agent David Wilhelm in Buckhead.

Like his first rape trial, the second one was declared a mistrial, after the killings.

Nichols made the statement to the agents before he was officially read his rights to remain silent and before he signed a document waiving his constitutional right to have an attorney with him when he was interrogated, according to testimony.

"We told him to wait until we got to headquarters," said FBI agent Myers, who was in the back seat of the dark blue SUV with Nichols for the drive from Duluth to FBI offices just off Clairmont Road in DeKalb County.

For the rest of the drive, the conversation was light and focused primarily on the ongoing NCAA basketball playoffs, both agents testified.

"We talked about sports. He was an avid sports fan. ... Syracuse was his team in March Madness," Fonseca said.

Nichols was read his Miranda rights later that day at Atlanta police headquarters, where he was given lunch from McDonald's and a soft drink.

Both agents and Atlanta police homicide Detective Vincent Valazquez testified that Nichols was given opportunities to go to the restroom, that he never complained about the discomfort of the handcuffs or leg irons and that he never asked to sleep or rest after being awake all night.

They also testified there was no evidence he was impaired even though he had admitted using methamphetamine and drinking a few beers before he surrendered.

According to the agents' testimony, Nichols was still angry over the demise of the seven-year relationship with his girlfriend after another woman became pregnant with his child.

Nichols' former girlfriend and an associate pastor from the Word of God Christian Center in Suwanee had just returned from a date when Nichols allegedly confronted them outside Sandy Springs. The woman and the minister had gone out several times but the relationship was not sexual, according to her testimony in the rape trial. But Nichols apparently believed it was more intimate. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution does not identify alleged victims of sexual assault.

The former girlfriend testified in the first rape trial that Nichols raged, clenched his fists and swore at them. She said Nichols had told the minister, "There is a demon inside me ... and it's getting very powerful. I don't know what I'm capable of doing."

Defense attorneys are trying to suppress statements Nichols made to authorities in the hours after his arrest the morning of March 12.

They also want Fulton County sheriff's deputies removed as bailiffs in the trial, and that is among the matters to be discussed in the hearing set to run through the rest of the week.

Just before breaking Monday, Nichols' lawyers told the judge the commander at Fort McPherson had told them she would not make the Army post available for the trial. Nichols' lawyers had asked that the Army facility five miles south of the courthouse be the site of the trial because the courthouse complex had been deemed a crime scene. The base is scheduled to initiate closure in late 2007.

Fuller ruled last month that the trial would be held in a first-floor courtroom in the same complex where Barnes, Brandau and Teasley were slain.

Shootings Sparked By Infidelity, Suspect Told Agent (AP)

By Harry R. Weber

AP, March 28, 2006

ATLANTA - Accused courthouse gunman Brian Nichols told authorities he lashed out because his girlfriend had a relationship with the couple's church pastor, an FBI agent testified Monday.

Agent Joseph Fonseca's testimony came during a hearing in which Nichols' lawyers were seeking to have the court throw out their client's statements to police following his arrest the day after the March 11, 2005, shootings.

DOJ_NMG_0022605

They've argued that Nichols was denied counsel before he made incriminating statements about the shooting deaths of a judge, court reporter, sheriff's deputy and federal agent. But prosecutors have argued Nichols waived his right to counsel and spoke voluntarily.

There was no immediate ruling by Superior Court Judge Hilton Fuller.

Fonseca testified that during a 20-minute ride with Nichols from the suburban Atlanta apartment where he was arrested to the FBI office in Atlanta, Nichols spoke mostly about sports and his love of college basketball. But at one point at the beginning of the ride, he told the agent he wanted to make a statement, Fonseca said.

"This whole thing started because my girlfriend slept with our pastor," Fonseca quoted Nichols as saying.

Fonseca did not immediately reveal during the hearing what else was said during the ride or when Nichols was questioned by other agents and Atlanta police detectives.

Another FBI agent, Jeffrey Holmes, testified that Nichols never asked for a lawyer before speaking to authorities. However, a third FBI agent, Cynthia Myers, testified that Nichols was in FBI custody for two hours before being advised of his rights to a lawyer, and was not told until after he made the comment about his girlfriend.

A portion of a videotape of Nichols' three-hour police interview was played in court, but only the part that shows him being advised of his rights.

Nichols was being retried on charges that he raped the on-again, off-again girlfriend when he allegedly grabbed a deputy's gun and went on the shooting spree. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty. His murder trial has been scheduled for Oct. 3 in the same courthouse complex where the spree started.

Nichols testified during his first rape trial that he was dating two women: the alleged rape victim and another woman who gave birth to his son three days before the shooting spree.

The alleged rape victim testified during the first trial that Nichols was suicidal at times about her threats to end their seven-year relationship. She also said Nichols at one point attacked the minister from the couple's church, whom she had recently started dating.

A defense request to throw out the murder charges against Nichols also is among several motions that will be argued during a series of hearings this week.

The hearings that started Monday also will address defense motions to prevent local sheriff's deputies from acting as bailiffs at his trial, make prosecutors reveal certain evidence they might use and protect the defendant's right to counsel.

Nichols, 34, is accused of killing the judge presiding over his rape retrial and the judge's court reporter. Police say Nichols later killed a sheriff's deputy who chased him outside the courthouse, and a federal agent who encountered him at a home a few miles away.

Nichols surrendered the next day.

Fourth Man Charged In GOP Phone-jamming Scam (AP)

By HOLLY RAMER, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, March 27, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. -- The former co-owner of a telemarketing firm pleaded not guilty Monday to participating in a Republican scheme to jam New Hampshire Democrats' get-out-the-vote phone lines on Election Day 2002.

Shaun Hansen, 34, of Spokane, Wash., was indicted by a federal grand jury on March 8, but the charges were not made public until his arraignment Monday.

Hansen is charged with conspiring to commit and aiding the commission of telephone harassment. Prosecutors say he was paid $2,500 to have employees at Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises place hundreds of hang-up calls to phone lines installed to help voters get rides to the polls on Nov. 5, 2002. Among the contests decided that day was the close U.S. Senate race in which Republican Rep. John Sununu beat outgoing Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen.

Three others have been convicted for their roles in the scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0022606

Former state Republican Executive Director Chuck McGee pleaded guilty to devising the idea of jamming the lines and served seven months in prison. Allen Raymond, former president of Virginia-based GOP Marketplace LLC, pleaded guilty to executing the plan and is serving a three-month sentence.

James Tobin, who had served as New England chairman of President Bush's re-election campaign, was convicted in December of telephone harassment charges and faces up to five years in federal prison. He is scheduled to be sentenced in May.

Hansen had faced similar accusations last April but he never was indicted, said his lawyer Jeffrey Levin, who declined to comment further on the case Monday.

In July 2004, Hansen told the Idaho State Journal that GOP Marketplace hired his company to call six phone lines installed by the New Hampshire Democratic Party and a firefighters union but he didn't know the purpose of the calls. He added he and the company's other owner thought their instructions were odd, so they met with GOP Marketplace attorneys, who told them not to worry.

According to court documents, Hansen now works at a rental center. The government paid for his travel to and from New Hampshire because he could not afford the cost. His trial is scheduled for May 2.

Prosecutor Lily Chinn did not immediately return a phone call Monday at the Justice Department seeking comment.

Fumo Says Probe Will 'Go Nowhere' (PHI)

By Mario F. Cattabiani And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 28, 2006

HARRISBURG - State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo said yesterday that he wasn't worried about the two-year federal probe into his role in a South Philadelphia nonprofit, predicting that it would "go nowhere."

"It's been extremely in-depth, and I can say today that I have no fears of anything I've seen," the Philadelphia Democrat told a roomful of lobbyists, public officials and reporters at a Pennsylvania Press Club luncheon in Harrisburg.

For more than two years, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the FBI, and the IRS have been investigating the spending and fund-raising of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, the group that the senator has called "my nonprofit."

The charity is known for cleaning streets, revitalizing the Passyunk Avenue shopping district, and funding charter schools. Federal authorities are scrutinizing some of its other expenses, including $250,000 in political polling.

Fumo suggested that the Bush administration was behind the investigation. "In this case, you have a White House that still believes Pennsylvania should be a red state," he said.

Fumo likened the probe to "the guy who goes to the psychiatrist for all those years, gets treated, and says, 'At least I can prove that I'm not insane.'

"It's no fun, but it's part of the job," he went on. "... at least when you are a political figure, when you are a person who gets things done."

Rich Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia, declined to comment.

The probe began after The Inquirer reported that Fumo and Peco Energy had a secret deal under which the utility donated $17 million to the charity during negotiations on Peco's rates.

Ruth Arnao, a former legislative aide of Fumo's and the director of Citizens' Alliance, is a target of a related obstruction-of-justice probe. Prosecutors often notify a person that they are a "target" when criminal charges are likely.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John J. Pease said at a court hearing that a "Jane Doe," identified by sources as Arnao, destroyed e-mails last year after learning that federal authorities had subpoenaed Citizens' Alliance records.

Arnao is not considered a target of the larger investigation into the nonprofit's spending.

The grand jury considering evidence in the case began its work in March 2005. It is scheduled to conclude its work by September.

Lockheed Supplier Gets 7 Years For Fraud (FWST)

By Bryon Okada

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022607

FORT WORTH - In the end, Todd Brian Loftis' attorney asked that his client be allowed to report to federal prison after May 10 so he could participate in his daughter's birthday.

U.S. District Judge Terry Means said no.

Loftis, 38, must report to jail by 2 p.m. April 24 to serve a seven-year, three-month sentence for fraud.

"Sorry," Means said Monday. "That's what you do when you steal $20 million."

Loftis, president of Tools and Metals, a supplier for three Lockheed Martin plants including Fort Worth, was sentenced to federal prison and ordered to repay the aeronautics company $20 million in restitution for conspiring to defraud the U.S. government by overcharging the company since 1998.

TMI, which filed for bankruptcy liquidation in September, won contracts from Lockheed to supply and maintain inventories of drill bits and other cutting tools used to make the F-16 and F/A-22 fighter jets. But Loftis and employees under his direction wildly overcharged Lockheed. TMI employees then forged and altered documents to fool company auditors and destroyed critical evidence, the government said.

Because Lockheed contracts with the federal government, military aircraft manufacturing costs are paid by U.S. taxpayers.

Prosecutor Ronald Eddins, who won a guilty plea from Loftis in December, estimated the fraud to be "in the neighborhood of $20 million."

Defense counsel Thomas Melsheimer, however, presented a retired FBI expert to testify that the amount was actually $10 million, or even less.

"The government's amount does not tell the whole story," Melsheimer said.

By looking at profit margins and industry norms and analyzing financial information in a database supplied by the defendant, defense witness Randy Horton estimated that the overcharge may have been more like $4.9 million. Prosecutors questioned the dependability of an analysis based on information given by an individual who had already pleaded guilty to fraud.

Ultimately, Monday's sentencing came down to both sides arguing for the size of the restitution. Means did not describe how he arrived at the $20 million figure. He had the discretion to fine Loftis twice the amount stolen.

Loftis, who lives in Colleyville, was soft-spoken in court.

"There's no justification for my actions," he said. He apologized to his colleagues and his family for the embarrassment.

In addition to jail and restitution, which he must pay in $500 monthly increments if he can't repay the $20 million when he gets out of prison, Loftis will be on restricted supervised release for three years once he's free.

Will Law Firms Be Able To Weather Wiretap-Related Suits? (LAW)

By Justin Scheck And Kellie Schmitt, The Recorder

California Recorder, March 28, 2006

Indictments stemming from Hollywood's latest celebrity scandal have struck fear into L.A.'s legal community. But it's the civil fallout from private eye Anthony Pellicano's wiretapping indictment that instills true horror for law firms.

While top entertainment lawyer Terry Christensen is the only attorney indicted so far in connection with Pellicano, several others face litigation that could cripple their practices -- and possibly break up their firms.

The big problem, said Timothy Halloran, an expert in law firm liability at Murphy, Pearson, Bradley & Feeney in San Francisco, is that illegal activity such as wiretapping won't be covered by malpractice insurance.

"I would expect that in the Pellicano matter, if the wiretapping was in connection with big litigation, someone who was wiretapped can make a pretty big damages claim," Halloran said. "Your professional liability insurance can't cover you for that."

That's the issue that much of the L.A. legal community is looking at these days, as a small but well-armed armada of plaintiffs takes aim at lawyers who used Pellicano for wiretaps.

Developments during the past week indicate that while Christensen may be the first lawyer indicted, another top firm -- L.A. entertainment shop Greenberg Glusker Fields Claman Machtinger & Kinsella -- may be feeling even more heat.

At least a half-dozen Greenberg Glusker attorneys are talking about leaving, according to a source within the firm.

And while some Greenberg Glusker attorneys said last week that they were confident that the firm's future was stable, others were unsure how the firm would weather Pellicano-related lawsuits.

A look at the first suit filed against the firm in connection with Pellicano shows why they may be nervous.

An amended complaint filed Thursday by Gregory Dovel, an attorney for screenwriter Vincent "Bo" Zenga, is based largely on federal prosecutors' allegations that Zenga was wiretapped by Pellicano in 2000. The complaint says Pellicano tapped nearly 1,600 phone calls, allegedly at the behest of top Greenberg Glusker partners.

Under state law, each illegal wiretapping count carries minimum statutory damages of $5,000, meaning defendants could be on the hook for about $8 million on the wiretapping claims alone, never mind punitive damages or other claims.

Dovel said Greenberg Glusker's insurance probably wouldn't pick up any tab unless a jury found negligence rather than intentional wrongdoing.

"You run into a problem there because you don't want to walk people out of coverage," said Guy Calladine, a law firm liability expert at Carlson, Calladine & Peterson in San Francisco. "You want to try to pigeonhole these as negligence."

That seems unlikely in cases like Dovel's and an ongoing suit against several smaller law firms accused of using Pellicano to wiretap litigants, since they allege intentional malfeasance.

So Dovel said he'll probably have to take aim at firm equity or the assets of individual partners who took part in wiretaps.

"That's one of the difficulties of law firms," he said. "They're very thinly capitalized. They take all the money out at the end of the year."

Greenberg Glusker isn't the only firm with such concerns. Plaintiffs lawyers -- including several firms known for a string of large verdicts -- have been retained by clients who were allegedly wiretapped by other firms, including Christensen's firm, Christensen, Miller, Fink, Jacobs, Glaser, Weil & Shapiro.

But the Christensen firm reportedly had relatively limited dealings with Pellicano and shows fewer signs of concern than Greenberg Glusker, which had a long-standing relationship with Pellicano.

At least three current or former Greenberg lawyers have hired attorneys in connection with the criminal probe.

Star partner Bertram Fields is known to have used Pellicano extensively, and partner Bonnie Eskenazi has been mentioned by several sources as someone who worked frequently with the private eye.

Eskenazi -- who said last week that she's not a target in the criminal investigation and that she doesn't have a lawyer -- would not elaborate on her relationship with Pellicano, saying "many people worked with him."

Another lawyer at the firm -- Ricardo Cestero, who has represented actor Tom Cruise -- worked for Pellicano prior to joining Greenberg. "I'm not going to comment," he said last week.

Brian Sun, the Jones Day partner representing Greenberg Glusker, would not comment on civil litigation.

Brian Panish, who represents a client who claims she was wiretapped, said Friday he's talking to potential clients and may have several suits in the works.

Kabateck Brown Kellner partner Brian Kabateck, who also represents wiretap plaintiffs, said it's likely law firms such as Christensen Miller will be implicated in future suits.

"I've spoken to people whom it's safe to say are clearly victims of law-firm-directed wiretapping," he said.

Lawyers at Gaims, Weil, West & Epstein, a firm with a much lower profile than Greenberg Glusker, are also facing civil liability in a suit filed by Kissandra Cohen, a lawyer who worked with the now-deceased L.A. toxic tort attorney Edward Masry.

In an ongoing federal suit, Cohen says she was wiretapped by Pellicano at the behest of attorneys with the L.A.-based Gaims firm.

That firm had an ongoing relationship with Pellicano: partner Alan Weil, who didn't return repeated phone calls, represented Pellicano in the 2002 criminal case that sent him to jail for possession of illegal explosives. And Victor Sherman, who worked on Pellicano's defense with Weil, confirmed that Pellicano had worked for Weil prior to that case.

Ami Shafrir, who was engaged in litigation with a Gaims Weil client, said last week that a lawyer at that firm hired Pellicano to wiretap him. That wiretap is cited in the Pellicano indictment.

Gaims Weil partner Marc Epstein, Shafrir said, asked questions in a deposition about information that could only have come from private conversation that were likely wiretapped.

Epstein did not return phone calls for this story, and a partner at the firm would not say whether they have a lawyer in the criminal case.

The firm's lawyer in Cohen's suit, Dorothy Wolpert -- a partner at Bird, Marella, Boxer, Wolpert, Nessim, Drooks & Lincenberg in Los Angeles -- would not comment on the suit last week, but said it's set for trial in July in L.A. federal court.

That case will likely be the first indication into how firms will handle the wiretap charges. But Halloran, the law firm liability lawyer, has an idea of what will happen to firms in the event of a big verdict.

"Bankruptcy may be the only alternative," he said.

FORMER MORAGA CHAMBER AND ROTARY LEADER PLEADS GUILTY TO FRAUD (BCNW)

Bay City News Wires, March 28, 2006

OAKLAND (BCN) -- A former president of the Moraga Chamber of Commerce and Moraga Rotary Club has pleaded guilty to nine counts of mail fraud and seven counts of wire fraud for his role in defrauding more than 30 investors out of more than $5 million.

Edwin Torres, 46, was indicted by a federal grand jury last April 21 and entered his plea last Friday at a hearing before U.S. District Court Judge Martin Jenkins.

Torres remains free on bail pending his sentencing on June 22.

The maximum penalty for each count is 20 years in federal prison, a $250,000 fine and restitution to victims.

According to the indictment, Torres was an independent representative for AIG Advisor Group, doing business as SunAmerica Securities, in Moraga from August 1998 to August 2004.

Prosecutors say that in pleading guilty, Torres admitted that he used his status as past president of the Chamber of Commerce and Rotary Club to influence potential investors to buy high-yielding Los Angeles and Orange County municipal bonds when in fact he had no intention to buy the bonds and did not do so.

Instead, according to the U.S. Attorney's office, Torres converted the investors' money for his own use.

Prosecutors say the evidence reflects that between July 2003 and September 2004 Torres defrauded more than 30 investors out of more than $5 million.

According to the indictment against him, Torres provided counterfeit invoices on SunAmerica stationary falsely reflecting the purchase of the bonds.

According to the indictment, Torres deposited his clients' funds into his personal bank account and kept investors from complaining to law enforcement and SunAmerica by mailing and wire-transferring checks as purported interest payments on the bonds.

The U.S. Attorney's office says Torres' guilty plea is the result of an investigation by the FBI in conjunction with the Contra Costa County District Attorney's Office.

Famed Coroner Resigns Amid Indictment (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joe Mandak, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 28, 2006

(AP) - PITTSBURGH-Dr. Cyril Wecht, forensic pathologist to the stars, doesn't just tell his critics off. He cuts them to pieces with words.

Three years ago, for example, he wrote to the attorney for a citizens group that wanted to eliminate Wecht's office as Allegheny County coroner.

"Anytime you or any of your minions, sycophants, or other assorted motley crew wish to publicly debate the activities of my office, just let me know," Wecht wrote. "I can only hope that you will have occasion to require the services of this office in the most possible personal fashion."

He signed it: "Very truly yours, Cyril H. Wecht, M.D., J.D."

Wecht, 74, gained celebrity as a critic of the Warren Commission investigation of John F. Kennedy's assassination and as a consultant on such cases as the death of Elvis Presley, the slayings of JonBenet Ramsey and Laci Peterson, and the attempted murder trial of Claus von Bulow. He is a familiar face to TV viewers, often weighing in on big cases in the news, and recently helped Louisiana officials conduct autopsies on Hurricane Katrina victims.

DOJ_NMG_0022610

But back home in Pittsburgh, admiration for Wecht's accomplishments and decades of public service is tempered by tales of unbridled egotism that some say led to the criminal charges he now faces.

Federal prosecutors say Wecht used county employees, equipment, even unclaimed morgue cadavers for the benefit of his multimillion-dollar private pathology practice.

"Sometimes he doesn't think the rules are really meant for him," said Morton Coleman, a retired political science professor who has known Wecht since they attended the University of Pittsburgh. "I just think he thinks the county's lucky to have such an important person as their coroner and they shouldn't mind that he cuts corners, as it were."

Wecht, 74, resigned from office a few days after being indicted in January on charges including fraud and theft of honest services. But he has denied any wrongdoing and continues to crisscross the country as an expert witness in murders and wrongful-death cases. He is expected to go on trial in October.

Buried in the 84-count indictment is the allegation that Wecht had his former county secretary type a nasty letter to Keith Sueker, a retired engineer who poked fun of Wecht's failed run for county executive in 1999.

Federal authorities say it was another instance of Wecht using a county worker for his personal benefit - in this case, political retribution. But for longtime Wecht watchers, it shows an ugly side of Wecht generally hidden from national view.

Wecht's letter reads:

"Mr. Sueker:

"When I am testifying as an expert witness in major cases around the country; appearing on national television and radio shows; lecturing at major universities; writing books; accepting honors and accolades from various organizations; and making a hell of a lot of money, I have found that I am able to enhance and sustain the substantial pleasures and great joy that accompany such endeavors and accomplishments by thinking of insignificant a------- like you."

"Sincerely,

"Cyril H. Wecht, M.D., J.D."

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette columnist Brian O'Neill considers the Sueker letter the "Mona Lisa" of Wecht's poison pen letters. He has been collecting Wecht's letters for years, including one targeting him.

"He's accomplished. He's very smart. He's very energetic," O'Neill said. "But I have my doubts that really brilliant guys do some of the things he does."

Coleman said: "This is a tremendously talented guy. He could have been a concert violinist; he has almost a completely retentive memory; he was a first-class athlete. He was a real renaissance guy. He was president of everything at Pitt."

Wecht's attorneys refused to let him be interviewed.

Wecht, who holds a law degree in addition to a medical degree, served two 10-year stretches in the elected position of coroner, first from 1970 to 1980, then from 1996 to 2006.

Last month, Wecht told CNN's Larry King that he had never done anything "politically corrupt or criminal" while coroner since 1996. But former U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, a member of Wecht's defense team, acknowledged on the same show that there were "some accounting irregularities here and probably some inappropriate use of county employees."

State officials filed similar charges against him in 1981. Wecht was acquitted of misusing county resources but paid the county $200,000 to settle related litigation.

"You would think, having been through that, that he would be extra careful about not mixing his private and public work," said Jim Roddey, the businessman who beat Wecht in the 1999 campaign to become Allegheny County's first county executive. "But Cyril always feels that whatever he is doing somehow is OK because he's Cyril Wecht."

Dr. Henry Lee, a longtime friend of Wecht's and a retired Connecticut criminalist who has also worked on big cases, said it can be difficult for forensic investigators to separate public and private business.

"The reality is, you put in 16 hours a day, seven days a week. It's hard work," Lee said. "It's really hard to have a clear-cut idea of which portion of your time is public and which is private."

Tom DeLay wants his gun back!

Texas officials have suspended the former House majority leader's license to carry a concealed weapon, according to Fort Bend County court documents first revealed over the weekend by Brazosriver.com, a Web site based in his home county.

Under Texas law, anyone indicted on felony charges is prohibited from packing a pistol, and DeLay was hit with campaign money-laundering charges in October. He got a hearing on the suspension, but Judge Jim Richard on Jan. 26 upheld the order by the Texas Department of Public Safety. Last month, DeLay's Austin attorney Steve Brittain filed notice seeking an appeal. Of course he'll get his license back if the criminal charges are dropped or he's acquitted.

What's he need that handgun for? DeLay's press office promised a response that never came; Brittain did not return our call.

Meatloaf, Cookies, Presidential Suite . . .

Days after snagging a copy of Vice President Cheney's hotel room requirements, The Smoking Gun yesterday published John Kerry's request list from his 2004 presidential campaign. The senator nixed tomato-based foods and celery ("JK hates celery") while requesting cold cereal, meatloaf, chicken, cookies, Poland Spring bottled water and a recumbent bike for workouts.

Kerry spokesman David Wade was unembarrassed: "Dick Cheney drinks Perrier and refuses to watch anything but Fox News. John Kerry hates Evian, eats meatloaf, and snacks on chocolate chip cookies. If these documents had been leaked during the campaign we'd have won in a landslide."

Here's Your Supreme Court Opinion!

No, Antonin Scalia did not flip anyone off this weekend. The Boston Herald reported he made an "obscene gesture" in response to a reporter's question. But a Supreme Court spokeswoman told the Associated Press that the justice simply used a dismissive hand-flick-off-the-chin when he was asked Sunday about criticism of his Roman Catholic beliefs. "You know what I say to those people?" Scalia said, according to the Herald, and made the gesture. "That's Sicilian." Basta , folks.

Backstory: Breaking Barriers (CSM)

By Carolyn Abate

The Christian Science Monitor, March 28, 2006

SAN JOSE, CALIF. - For nearly 15 years, Gabriel Sanchez and Charles Mancillas were sworn enemies and they didn't even know each other. That's because at the ages of 12 and 13, the two joined opposing streets gangs, the Norteños and Sureños, in California. The two Latino gangs harbor a brutal rivalry that dates back decades. Had the youths ever met, they probably would have tried to kill each other.

But today, the two men, now in their 30s, sit next to each other at a steel table in cell pod 5C at the main jail in San Jose , Calif. They joke and laugh. They talk about playing cards. They even compare tattoos.

"If we were in a regular prison, we would be enemies," Mr. Sanchez says. "Over here, we are human beings."

The two men are part of an unusual program aimed at breaking one of the most pervasive - and violent - influences behind bars and on the streets of urban America: gangs. In a quest to overcome deeply ingrained and often fatal differences, the initiative brings together former rival gang members in one cell pod to eat, sleep, and live.

The program, "Breaking Barriers," offers counseling and courses - from substance abuse to poetry readings - to help overcome the causes of gang fealty and drug addiction. The goal is to get inmates who move through the Santa Clara County central jail to permanently sever ties with gangs, and thus reduce violence, when they transfer to a state prison or return to a life on the outside.

Experts consider it one of the only local programs of its kind in the country. While the initiative is still young - only two years old - it has already shown some success in rehabilitating individual lives. "It's given me a second chance with my family," says James Barnes Jr., an inmate whose former affiliation with a Latino gang is evident in many of his tattoos. "You learn to open up."

Gangs are nothing new to prison life, but over the past four decades their presence has increased dramatically. One national study found that, of the nearly 2 million people incarcerated in the US, more than 43 percent associated with a gang .

"Gang numbers are growing in the streets and they grow in the facilities," says Edward Cohn of the National Major Gang Task Force.

The gangs found inside prisons mirror those on the streets. Most are divided along racial lines and controlled through a strict hierarchy. Inmates who enter prison already affiliated with a gang have it easy: They simply continue their allegiance and receive protection. Inmates who are considered independent must decide whether to go it alone - and often quickly become targeted for assault - or cave to the status quo. "It's the culture of prison," says James Houston, a criminologist at Grand Valley State University in Allendale, Mich. "It's one way to feel safe, to get material things, to have ... a sense of autonomy."

What's difficult to determine is how much of the violence behind bars is gang-related. While inmates involved in melees rarely reveal that orders came down from a gang superior, experts say much of the violence in prisons is planned attacks by gangs, not random acts. And the easiest way for wardens to avoid mayhem is often to house inmates together based on their affiliation.

For prison officials in San Jose, violence was the catalyst behind Breaking Barriers. A couple of years ago, inmates who had dropped out of gangs were being targeted for assault or death by other prisoners.

To protect them, administrators decided to house the dropouts together in one cell pod, separate from the general inmate population. But officials wanted the program to be more than just a management tool.

"We found that there was an opportunity here to provide these inmates with tools - recovery tools, education tools, addiction counseling," says Edward Flores, correction chief for the Santa Clara County Department of Correction. The hope is that these guys can turn their lives around and influence others, particularly young male family members, to avoid gang life, he says.

To qualify for Breaking Barriers, an inmate must be serious about severing ties to a gang. The program is structured around a variety of classes. Topics range from faith-based courses to anger management. Homework in the form of personal essays, family history papers, and poetry is assigned weekly. Four days a week, the inmates gather for their class session.

On this day, the topic du jour is substance abuse recovery. Roughly 55 men sit in chairs as their teacher, Robert Gochez, a short, energetic Latino, reads the day's lecture. "Off the top of your head, who can tell me what relapse means?" he asks. Ten hands shoot up.

Some of the men lean forward, listening intently. Others rest their arms on the backs of chairs. After one inmate reads an original poem, he is applauded. The meeting closes with the men reciting a prayer.

It is a long way from the streets for inmates like Sanchez, who joined a gang in San Jose because it was the thing to do. Now 30, he is facing a charge of firearms possession with the possibility of receiving 50 years to life in prison. But it wasn't the prospect of a long jail term that propelled Sanchez to drop out of a gang. That happened in 2003 when his father was gunned down in prison by a rival gang member.

Four months into the program, Sanchez credits Breaking Barriers with teaching him a new way to live. "I've learned to take care of myself," he says. "My old way of thinking is wrong."

While it's easy for inmates to conform within the confines of cell pod 5C, the real test is when they leave prison. Mr. Mancillas knows the reality of relapse all too well. This is his second stint with Breaking Barriers. "It was embarrassing. I thought I had it - to make it outside," says the inmate, back to serve time for domestic violence. Now poised for rerelease, Mancillas is eager to prove himself again. "Now I know what my relapse triggers are. I know how to cope out there," he says.

Mr. Flores admits that it is still too early to determine the program's effect. Cell pod 5C has become one of the calmest in the 4,600-inmate county jail, mainly a holding facility for those awaiting trial. Most of the men end up convicted and shipped off to a state prison. Will they stay out of gangs? So far only six graduates have made it out. Four of them are working at a local Salvation Army center. The other two can't be accounted for.

Still, inmates like Sanchez believe the program is worth it. "If I don't get out, I want to help someone else ... the young kids coming in," he says. "There is a better way to live."

Credit Card Scam Investigated In D.C. (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022613

A woman posing as a Washington Post employee is suspected of duping dozens of the newspaper's advertisers into turning over their credit card numbers, according to The Post and the U.S. attorney's office.

Using the telephone numbers placed in classified ads, the woman would call advertisers claiming that she worked for the paper, Post spokesman Eric Grant said in a statement yesterday afternoon.

The woman would explain that the advertiser's credit card number had not gone through and that she needed to run it again. After the person provided the card information, the woman would use it to start making charges to that account.

At least 50 people have been victims of the scam, according to a person familiar with the case who spoke on the condition of anonymity because charges have not been filed.

The identity theft scam came to the paper's attention in 2002, and The Post notified the D.C. police, the paper said. Why the investigation has moved so slowly was not immediately clear, and officials would not say when the scam began or when it ended. The inquiry is now in the hands of the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, which is frequently involved in investigating identity theft, and the investigation appears to be coming to a close.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said that he could not disclose the woman's identity while she was still under investigation.

A law passed in 2004 by the D.C. Council makes identity theft that results in a loss of more than $250 a felony punishable by up to 10 years in prison. But only fraud alleged to have taken place since then would be covered by that statute.

Other potential charges, under long-established laws, would include theft, fraud and credit card fraud.

The Post has been cooperating in the investigation, Phillips said.

Grant said that after learning of the scam, The Post took steps to protect advertisers from such frauds. Advertisers are now given a unique identification number and are told not to divulge information to anyone claiming to work for The Post unless the person supplies that number.

Classified advertising has long been a bulwark of newspaper revenue, but in recent years, many customers have been migrating to free online ad services such as Craigslist.

Ensuring that newspapers' ads are used only for legitimate purposes is critical to the industry as it seeks to distinguish itself from outlets that are cheaper or even free, said John Kimball, chief marketing officer for the Newspaper Association of America.

Newspapers, he said, are "mindful of the fact that credibility is one of the differentiating factors" between them and other advertising forums.

Freed By DNA Test, Texas Man Cautiously Returns To Society (NYT)

By Nathan Levy

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

AUSTIN, Tex., March 27 — Arthur Mumphrey says he is doing his best to enjoy life these days. But after spending 18 years in prison for a rape he did not commit, he is also finding that being on the outside can be overwhelming.

"I really don't do that much," Mr. Mumphrey said. "Me and my wife, we go to a few places, no clubs or anything like that — just low profile."

Gov. Rick Perry pardoned Mr. Mumphrey, 42, on March 17 after a DNA test indicated that he did not sexually assault the victim, a 13-year-old seventh grader, who was forced at knifepoint into a wooded area near Conroe, about 40 miles north of Houston, and raped repeatedly on the night of Feb. 28, 1986.

Mr. Mumphrey was paroled in 2000 after serving 14 years of a 35-year sentence, but was sent back to prison two years later after failing to contact his parole officer. He points to his case as yet another example of the merits of DNA testing and the doggedness of a defense lawyer — as well as the systemic flaws of the Texas criminal justice system.

"I was very blessed not to have the death penalty," Mr. Mumphrey said in a telephone interview from the office of his lawyer, Eric J. Davis of Houston. "I'd probably be dead right now. The legal system is a hard system to wrestle, especially in Texas."

Mr. Mumphrey's younger brother, Charles Mumphrey, who is in jail on an unrelated crime, confessed earlier this year to participating in the rape, said Marc Brumberger, an assistant district attorney for Montgomery County. He cannot be charged, though, because the statute of limitations has expired.

DOJ_NMG_0022614

A co-defendant, Steve Thomas, pleaded guilty during a 1986 trial and testified against Arthur Mumphrey in exchange for a 15-year sentence.

At the time of the attack, Mr. Mumphrey said, he was 22 and living and working in Conroe. The police arrested him the day after the attack when someone reported hearing him and Mr. Thomas talking about it. Mr. Thomas, who is mentally retarded and illiterate, gave several conflicting statements to the authorities. Mr. Mumphrey said he refused a plea bargain, insisting on his innocence.

Charles Mumphrey, then 15, went to the local police department and confessed, but officials did not believe him and he recanted.

"The trial was a masquerade," said Arthur Mumphrey, describing how Charles Mumphrey testified that he had made the false confession to protect his brother.

"I haven't talked to my brother in 20 years," Arthur Mumphrey said. "It hurt."

At the time of the trial, forensic DNA equipment was not available. The jury convicted Mr. Mumphrey of aggravated sexual assault, and he served 14 years in several prisons. After his parole, he got a job and began dating his wife, Angela.

After failing to keep in contact with his parole officer, with whom Mr. Mumphrey said he had a difficult relationship, he was sent back to prison in 2002.

His wife vowed to fight to clear his name and hired Mr. Davis, who found out that blood samples had been taken from the suspects and the victim after the attack. A vaginal swab was also taken from the victim, as were cuttings from her underwear that contained semen samples.

It took three years to track down those samples. The Texas Department of Public Safety was supposed to have them, but they were not listed because the computerized classification system at the agency's crime lab in Houston did not begin until 1992. Last November, the lab found the samples in a freezer.

Tests on them indicated the presence of two people besides the victim: Mr. Thomas and a person who was not Arthur Mumphrey.

"It's by the grace of God that all this came to pass," Mr. Davis said. "It's easy to conceive that I wouldn't find that blood work."

After 18 years in prison, Mr. Mumphrey was exonerated and pardoned and is now eligible for state compensation. State law allows those wrongfully imprisoned to receive $25,000 for each year, with a maximum of $500,000. Mr. Davis said he and Mr. Mumphrey had not decided whether to seek restitution or file a lawsuit.

Mr. Mumphrey said he was thankful he was no longer considered a sex offender, with all of the restrictions that implied, including a prohibition against being around children.

Yet the sting of missing out on so many years of life haunts Mr. Mumphrey, particularly when it comes to his family and his father's death in 1996. "A lot of family passed away," he said. "I wasn't able to go to the funerals."

CIVIL LAW:

Agency Exempts Most Of Internet From Campaign Spending Laws (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — The Federal Election Commission ruled unanimously Monday that political communication on the Internet, including Web logs, setting up Web sites and e-mail, was not regulated by campaign finance laws.

The commission, in a 6-to-0 decision, also ruled that paid political advertisements placed on Web sites were covered by the 2002 campaign finance law, which includes restrictions on spending and contributions and bars corporations and unions from using their treasuries to purchase Web advertisements.

The decision marked a significant step in the rapid evolution of the Internet — and, in particular, Web logs — as a force in American politics. It is the latest chapter in the conflict between First Amendment guarantees of freedom of expression and efforts by Congress to regulate campaign spending.

DOJ_NMG_0022615

The commission ruling came two years after it had decided that all Internet activity was exempt from the campaign finance laws. That ruling was challenged by Congressional sponsors of the law, and a federal judge upheld that suit, ordering the commission to write rules to apply the 2002 law to the Internet.

The commission ruled that the law applied to paid political advertisements, but offered a broad exemption for all other Internet political activity, conducted by individuals or groups, even in direct coordination with a candidate.

"The commission established a categorical exemption for individuals who engage in online politics," Michael E. Toner, the chairman of the commission, said in an interview. "The agency has taken an important step in protecting grass roots and online politics."

Markos Moulitsas, the founder of the Daily Kos, the largest political Web log in the country, heralded the decision. "It looks like we got everything we wanted," Mr. Moulitsas said. "It's fantastic that the F.E.C. was as responsive as it was."

The original court ruling sparked fear by bloggers — many of whom are explicit in rallying their readers to contribute, work for and vote for specific candidates — that their work would be counted as contributions to the candidates, and thus fall under the contribution limits. The law limits individual contributions to $2,000 and includes a ban on any union or corporate donations.

The commission's ruling was broad and categorical. It said that activity on the Internet was exempt, whether done by an individual or by a group. As part of the ruling, the commission ruled that bloggers would be eligible for the same exemption from the campaign finance law that is now given to newspapers.

FEC Rules Exempt Blogs From Internet Political Limits (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

In a unanimous vote yesterday, the Federal Election Commission left unregulated almost all political activity on the Internet except for paid political advertisements. Campaigns buying such ads will have to use money raised under the limits of current federal campaign law.

Perhaps most important, the commission effectively granted media exemptions to bloggers and other activists using the Web to allow them to praise and criticize politicians, just as newspapers can, without fear of federal interference.

The rules "totally exempt individuals who engage in political activity on the Internet from the restrictions of the campaign finance laws. The exemption for individual Internet activity in the final rules is categorical and unqualified," said FEC Chairman Michael E. Toner. The regulation "protects Internet activities by individuals in all forms, including e-mailing, linking, blogging, or hosting a Web site," he said.

The 6 to 0 vote was widely expected after the FEC released the proposed rules last week. That followed months of discussions and widespread concern -- which turned out to be unfounded -- among many political activists that the commission would impose significant restrictions on Internet campaign activity. The vote drew praise from most ideological quarters, as well as from several watchdog groups.

Conservative blogger Mike Krempasky wrote: "This is a tremendous win for speech." Liberal blogger Duncan Black, writing under the pseudonym Artios, said: "This could have been an utter disaster, but it appears to have all worked out in the end."

Three public-interest groups that are often critical of the FEC -- Democracy 21, the Campaign Legal Center and the Center for Responsive Politics -- said in a statement that "the new FEC regulation strikes the correct balance in preserving the Internet as an unregulated forum for robust political activity by individuals, while ensuring that the Internet does not become a loophole for unregulated soft money."

The rule allows the unlimited use of corporate and union computers for political activity by employees and members, as long as they are not doing so on company time or are not under orders from their employer or union.

FEC To Leave Alone Web Political Speech (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

The Federal Election Commission voted 6-0 yesterday morning in favor of campaign-finance rules that will leave political speech on the Internet mostly unregulated.

DOJ_NMG_0022616

"It didn't take long to reach a decision," said FEC spokesman Ian Stirton. "All six members voted in favor."

The rules approved by the FEC will give Web sites, blogs and e-mails the same exemption that is provided to newspapers that cover political campaigns.

That means bloggers can promote or criticize federal candidates and issues without fear of financial penalty.

However, the rules will regulate online paid political advertisements.

The vote has been well-received online, but Mike Krempasky, co-founder of the popular conservative blog Red State, www.redstate.org, says he is still worried about regulatory action.

"The FEC deserves a lot of praise -- especially Commissioners [Ellen L.] Weintraub and [Chairman Michael E.] Toner," Mr. Krempasky said. "They took the lightest touch possible when it came to these regulations.

"It just remains to be seen whether or not the 'reform community' can resist the urge to sue that seems so deeply ingrained in their political DNA," he added.

The House has been considering a bill that would write into law protections for political speech on the Internet. Former FEC Chairman Brad Smith yesterday urged passage of the bill, which has been stalled.

"It's important Congress make their intent clear," he said. "Otherwise, the FEC can change its rules later and reform groups could sue from time to time."

Bill sponsor Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican, said, "I'm heartened by the fact that the FEC's rule is narrowly drawn, but a step in the wrong direction is still the wrong direction, and a bad precedent can lead to a worse precedent."

In releasing its 96-page proposal Friday, the FEC wrote, "Through this rulemaking, the Commission recognizes the Internet as a unique and evolving mode of mass communication and political speech that is distinct from other media in a manner that warrants a restrained regulatory approach."

Both conservative and liberal bloggers oppose online regulations, as do the Democrat and Republican senatorial campaign committees and the leaders of both parties in Congress.

The FEC took a quick vote yesterday after more than a year of debate and two recently postponed meetings.

In 2002, Congress passed campaign-finance reform rules, but provided an exemption for Internet communications. Regulation advocates opposed the online exemption.

In 2004, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled that the 2002 Internet exemption violated the campaign-finance law's intent, forcing the FEC to issue a ruling.

"The law was never intended to regulate private citizen communication on the Internet," FEC Vice Chairman Robert D. Lenhard told the Associated Press. "I believe that we have achieved that goal today."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Federal Judge Refuses To Postpone New Orleans Election (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- New Orleans residents living in Houston, Atlanta and other cities are still waiting for the absentee ballots they applied for weeks ago. No one knows how many people will come back to the city to vote. And the polling places have yet to be selected.

Pulling off this city's April 22 mayoral election could wind up as a fine example of democracy under trying circumstances, or a wobbly, error-filled embarrassment.

On Monday, a federal judge refused to postpone New Orleans' first election since Hurricane Katrina, despite complaints from civil rights groups that too many blacks scattered by the storm will be unable to take part in the voting.

U.S. District Judge Ivan Lemelle told both sides _ the state and plaintiffs _ to solve any problems that might hinder displaced residents' ability to vote. "I recognize that there is still room for improvement in that electoral process," he said.

Still, Lemelle said going ahead with the voting will help the city rebuild.

"If you are a displaced citizen, like I am, we have a burning desire for completeness," said the judge, whose own New Orleans home flooded.

DOJ_NMG_0022617

The Aug. 29 storm swamped 80 percent of the city, destroying some polling places and scattering more than half the population. What was a mostly black city of nearly half a million people was reduced to well under 200,000 inhabitants. Some black leaders fear a loss of political clout if the election goes ahead as planned.

Some civil rights leaders say the state's plan to allow mail voting for residents in other states, along with satellite polling places elsewhere in Louisiana, won't do enough to give all displaced residents the opportunity to vote.

"We can see that train wreck coming in slow motion," plaintiffs' attorney Bill Quigley said.

The city elections were originally scheduled for Feb. 4 but were postponed because of the damage and dislocation caused by Katrina.

Secretary of State Al Ater, Louisiana's top election official, said he was prepared to work with the plaintiffs and the judge. "I'm very proud of what we're doing," he said.

The state is setting up polling stations in 10 Louisiana cities, running a national advertising campaign to inform New Orleans residents about the election, and easing the rules on the casting of absentee ballots.

Mayor Ray Nagin, a black man criticized in some quarters for his response to the hurricane, is running for re-election against nearly two dozen opponents, including Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, who is white.

Monday's hearing was called after the NAACP and other civil rights groups argued that the cost of traveling to New Orleans to vote amounted to the "modern equivalent of a poll tax" _ something outlawed a generation ago by an amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Election procedures in Louisiana and many other Southern states are subject to Justice Department approval because of their history of racial discrimination.

Several black leaders have argued for satellite voting locations outside Louisiana. But Ater's office said state law does not allow out-of-state voting operations.

"This is a Florida in the making," warned National Urban League President Marc Morial, a former New Orleans mayor, referring to the debacle during the 2000 White House race.

E-mails Put Florida Investigator In Hot Seat (MH)

By Carol Marbin Miller

The Miami Herald, March 28, 2006

When the family of Martin Lee Anderson questioned the impartiality of Florida's top state lawman, Guy Tunnell, in investigating the teen's death at a Panama City boot camp, Tunnell assured Floridians he would be fair and impartial.

The reason the family was suspicious: Tunnell, head of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, is a former sheriff of Bay County, founded the boot camp, and is friends with the current sheriff, Frank McKeithen, whose office runs the camp.

Now, a series of e-mails obtained by The Miami Herald shows that at the same time his agency was investigating the camp, Tunnell kept a running commentary to McKeithen, other sheriffs and his own staff in which he let off steam and disparaged critics of his investigation and the state's boot camps.

He also kept McKeithen abreast of the FDLE's efforts to keep a video -- which showed boot camp guards kneeing and punching the teen hours before his death -- from becoming public.

RUNNING COMMENTARY

He sent McKeithen an e-mail on Feb. 9, the day The Miami Herald published a story quoting two members of the House Criminal Justice Appropriations Committee -- Miami Beach Democrat Dan Gelber, a former federal prosecutor, and Miami Beach Republican Gus Barreiro -- who had seen the video and said Martin had been "brutally" beaten and ``flung around like a rag doll."

The two lawmakers were the first to view the video before its release. Gov. Jeb Bush told reporters he was "constrained" from discussing the tape, and indirectly criticized the two legislators who ``weren't as constrained."

Tunnell sent McKeithen a copy of the Bush's remarks, adding: 'I understand that the Guv was just a `little' sarcastic when he referred to those 'less constrained' from commenting -- such as the two representatives."

DOJ_NMG_0022618

Earlier that day, Tunnell forwarded to the sheriff -- with the brief message "FYI!" -- an e-mail from his spokesman, Tom Berlinger, saying that the FDLE would fight a request from The Miami Herald for a copy of the video under the state's public records law.

Through a spokesman, Tunnell declined to discuss the e-mails Monday.

"We are working side by side with the special prosecutor that was appointed by Governor Bush as well as members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, an agency that is closely scrutinizing the matter from a federal and civil rights perspective," Tunnell said in an e-mail.

``If either of them felt that our agency was conducting anything other than a professional, fair and impartial investigation, I would have every expectation that they would not hesitate to raise that issue with me or others."

Said FDLE spokesman Berlinger: ``Commissioner Tunnell and the rest of our command staff are, by virtue of our jobs, friends with all 67 sheriffs in the state of Florida. That doesn't stop us from being fair and impartial in any of the investigations we conduct."

Hillsborough County State Attorney Mark Ober will decide whether anyone should be charged in the teen's death.

Martin, 14, entered the Bay County Sheriff's Office Boot Camp Jan. 5 after being convicted of joyriding in his grandmother's car. The video of Martin's last hour at the camp shows about eight guards punch, knee and choke the teen. He died the next day.

On Feb. 16, Tunnell sent McKeithen a copy of a Miami Herald article reporting that the U.S. Justice Department had opened a civil rights investigation into Martin's death.

On Feb. 17, Tunnell sent an email to several members of the Florida Sheriff's Association, including McKeithen, who had been briefed by their lobbyist on events two days earlier, when members of the House Juvenile Justice Committee discussed making big changes to the operation of the state's five boot camps.

"I know -- I'm singing to the choir -- just feels good to get it off my chest!," Tunnell wrote. ``For YEARS, we [the Bay County Sheriff's Office] asked for more equitable funding so as to allow us to expand the services, offering transitional phases, step-down, etc., only to be met with more bureaucratic red tape, frustration, etc."

"THERE . . . I DO feel better!," he added.

After Gelber and Barreiro viewed the tape, two other lawmakers sought access to the video, Sen. Stephen R. Wise, a Jacksonville Republican and chairman of the Senate Criminal Justice Committee, and Sen. Rod Smith, an Alachua Democrat and the committee's vice chairman.

"Ain't gonna happen!" Tunnell told several FDLE staffers in a Feb. 9 e-mail.

In response, Assistant FDLE Commissioner Scotty Sanderson then wrote: ``We are in contact with the State Attorney and the Medical Examiner, to expedite the Autopsy report and bring this case in for a landing quickly. Our side will be ready to roll out as we get the toxicology findings."

Tunnell replied: ``Hurry -- BEFORE I get REALLY carried away!"

The FDLE chief also sent an email to the editorial page editor of The News Herald in Panama City, Claude Duncan, who urged the FDLE to release the video..

"Although I'm happy to fade any heat on the part of my good friend, Sheriff McKeithen, I haven't been the Bay County Sheriff for almost two and one-half years. Am I to assume that, as the then-Bay County Sheriff, I was also responsible for the tragic events of Sept. 11, 2001?" Tunnell wrote.

Lawyers for Martin's family, and the two state lawmakers who were the subjects of Tunnell's emails say they have renewed concerns for Tunnell's fairness in the high-profile case.

Gelber said: ``You shouldn't be rooting for either side in an investigation. And these e-mails sort of suggest that. It's very dangerous when you start to root for one side."

Barreiro, who has been a frequent critic of the state's juvenile justice efforts, said he first became concerned about the FDLE's involvement in the investigation on Feb. 8, the day he watched the video at FDLE headquarters.

"They told me before I viewed the tape that Martin did not die of trauma," Barreiro said.

CONCERNS RAISED

DOJ_NMG_0022619

Barreiro said, from the beginning, it seemed the FDLE agents ``were more concerned about the critics of the boot camp than with the officers who beat Martin Anderson to death."

Benjamin Crump, the family's attorney, said he is now more concerned than ever about FDLE's involvement in the case.

"From the beginning, we had concerns about a possible conflict of interest with FDLE doing the investigation," Crump said. ``After reading these, it does not ease our concerns."

``This is worrisome."

Primary Voting-machine Troubles Raise Concerns For General Election (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Problems using voting machines in the Texas and Illinois primaries this month have reinforced fears that the 2006 elections may be beset with glitches.

"There's a lot of evidence that some of those fears are coming to pass," says Doug Chapin, president of Electionline.org, a non-partisan group that studies elections. "The theory that new technology results in error seems to be borne out early in the process."

More than 30 million Americans will be voting on unfamiliar equipment this year, after modernization required by the Help America Vote Act. Congress passed the law in 2002 to address problems stemming from the 2000 presidential election in Florida.

Among early trouble spots:

•The largest jurisdictions in Illinois, Chicago and Cook County, encountered problems in the March 21 primary. In some cases, precinct election judges didn't get hands-on training before the election. There were paper jams, misplaced memory cartridges containing election results and long delays in counting.

Cook County Clerk David Orr says some problems were the result of introducing two new machines in each precinct: a touch-screen ballot and a machine that optically scans paper ballots. "We had our share of problems, but you expect it with new stuff," Orr says.

•In Texas, a candidate for the state Supreme Court will contest the March 7 primary because of what he calls widespread problems using new machines.

In Fort Worth, an initial ballot count showed about 150,000 votes even though there were only one-third that many voters, says David Rogers, campaign manager for the candidate, Steve Smith. And in San Angelo, balky new equipment and a close local race led to a recount that was halted after it appeared some votes were missing.

A spokesman for the secretary of state's office, Scott Haywood, says human factors accounted for any glitches, and they have been fixed. "Anytime you are using a new system, officials have to get used to it," he says. "Our biggest focus now is to increase training."

The next test: 10 states hold primaries in May, including Pennsylvania, which is scrambling to train voters and poll workers.

The state is "a disaster waiting to happen," says John Gideon, director of VotersUnite.org, a group that is skeptical about electronic voting.

The task is manageable, counters Michelle Shafer of Sequoia Voting Systems, an equipment maker that has customers in Pennsylvania and 19 other states. "We have seen this coming and have ramped up as best we can," and will be ready by November, she says.

New Elections Law Designed To Help Disabled To Vote (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 27, 2006

Florida's 2000 election, forever linked with the notorious hanging chads, did more than expose the flaws of the nation's aging voting systems. It cleared the way for Congress to address many lingering problems with how Americans vote.

One politically active group rushed to take advantage of that movement.

DOJ_NMG_0022620

The Help America Vote Act, passed in early 2002, created the first legal guarantees that all disabled voters would be able to participate in the democratic process just as readily as anyone else.

The law, known as HAVA, requires both accessible polling places and voting machines that let disabled voters make their choices privately and independently.

"The whole disability community was pushing for that," said Jim Dickson, vice president of the American Association of People with Disabilities, based in Washington, D.C.

Prior to the 2000 election, several federal laws addressed the need for improvements in voting access, but none had HAVA's weight. If state and local governments don't acquire at least one accessible machine per polling place, they could squander millions in aid and face lawsuits from the justice department.

In Allegheny County, many disabled voters have long had to rely on family, friends or poll workers to help them operate 40-year-old lever machines. Under HAVA, that must change by the May 16 primary election.

"It's about time," said Paul O'Hanlon, an attorney with Pittsburgh's Disabilities Law Project.

Yet the process for purchasing new technology here has been far from smooth.

In November, the county invited several voting machine vendors to put their systems on display for the public. Some disabled voters were given extra opportunities to try machines and offer their opinions.

A few months later, the county came close to settling a deal with Ohio-based Diebold Inc. for touch-screen machines that easily could be adjusted to accommodate a range of disabilities. But many local voting activists raised concerns about Diebold's checkered record in other states. The county scrapped the deal.

Instead, county officials agreed to buy 2,800 electronic machines from Sequoia Voting Systems Inc. of Oakland, Calif., for $11.8 million. The machine, the AVC Advantage, allows its user to see the entire ballot at once, just as the lever machines do.

Some units, however, are as much as 10 years old and need to be fitted with new equipment to meet HAVA's accessibility requirements. Sequoia plans to add audio components that will aid blind voters.

Tomorrow and Wednesday, Pennsylvania's Department of State will conduct tests on the updated Advantage.

Even if the machine passes, Mr. Dickson doesn't think it will be good enough. He argues that dyslexic voters will have problems understanding the full-face ballot.

"Our position is that the AVC Advantage is in violation of HAVA," said Mr. Dickson, who has closely followed Allegheny County's progress in complying with the federal law.

Mr. O'Hanlon also isn't convinced of the Advantage's merits. During the November trial session, held in Downtown Pittsburgh, few disabled voters had chances to try the machine.

It does work, county Manager Jim Flynn said, and the elections division will continue adding accessible polling places over the next year to satisfy HAVA. Back

Housing Segregation Case Enters Remedy Stage (BSUN)

By Eric Siegel

The Baltimore Sun, March 28, 2006

Creating thousands of new opportunities for Baltimore public housing families to live in well-off suburbs was necessary to make "real progress" in overcoming decades of government policies that segregated residents in poor, minority areas of the city, a lawyer for the tenants told a federal judge Monday.

In his opening statement in the remedy phase of a public housing desegregation case, attorney Peter Buscemi said a proposal requiring the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to provide 6,750 special housing vouchers and new and rehabilitated units over 10 years would give public housing families a "better chance at life."

But a lawyer for HUD countered that the proposal was "plagued with problems and should not be implemented in any form."

The judge does not have the authority to order the creation of new housing but can only ask the federal agency to review decisions that he found problematic, said HUD lawyer Peter Phipps.

DOJ_NMG_0022621

In January 2005, U.S. District Judge Marvin J. Garbis found that HUD had violated federal fair-housing laws by failing to "affirmatively further fair housing" by taking a regional approach to the desegregation of public housing in Baltimore.

The ruling stemmed from a class action lawsuit filed in 1995 on behalf of black Baltimore public housing residents that claimed that the city and the federal government had failed to dismantle the segregated public housing system they set up in the 1930s and 1940s. Garbis absolved the city and its Housing Authority of wrongdoing.

Monday, Garbis, who is hearing the case without a jury, expressed skepticism toward HUD's position and sympathy for the public housing residents.

After Phipps told the judge that he could only order HUD to review its decisions, Garbis said, "Why don't you reconsider everything and then we can all go home?"

Earlier, Garbis interrupted Buscemi to muse about what he would do to dilute concentrations of poverty if he had no legal or financial constraints.

"I have a pretty good idea what I would do. I must say, your proposed order doesn't go that far," Garbis said.

Garbis also lamented that the two sides haven't reached a settlement, as was done in several similar cases nationwide.

"It is peculiar that something that is quite obviously better able to be designed by the parties will be designed by the court," he said.

In addition to considering a remedy for the violation of fair housing laws he found, Garbis is also considering whether HUD violated the constitutional rights of public housing residents -- a finding that could provide a stronger legal underpinning for a regional solution. And he has said he would allow HUD to present evidence to convince him that his 2005 ruling was wrong.

In his opening statement, Buscemi argued that by such actions as routinely locating public housing in impoverished, minority areas, "the government has helped segregated housing in Baltimore to persist."

Buscemi noted that the plaintiffs were suggesting that HUD make procedural changes to ensure that the agency take a regional approach to assisted housing in the future but said the creation of a specified number of units was also needed.

"We can't create real progress by [administrative remedies] alone," he said.

Under the plaintiffs' proposal, Buscemi said, only a couple of families a year would need to move into each of more than 200 suburban census tracts identified as "communities of opportunity," too few to affect the quality of those neighborhoods.

"It is not in the plaintiffs' interest to alter the character of neighborhoods," he said.

But Phipps said "HUD has taken extensive efforts to promote fair housing" through housing vouchers and outreach programs and said the plaintiffs' proposal would serve only a limited number of residents.

"Members of the plaintiffs' class have a stronger ally in HUD than the proposed remedy," Phipps said.

Jill Khadduri, a former high- ranking official in the agency's policy and research office, testified as an expert witness for the plaintiffs and said that the creation of several thousand housing opportunities over 10 years would be "completely practical."

But HUD lawyer Judry Subar suggested on cross-examination that the number was far beyond what would be required to remedy any affect of blatant discrimination of the past.

Another former HUD official, Margery Turner, said there was a large amount of evidence that families benefit in a number of ways from moving out of low-income communities.

"As jobs have decentralized, many high-poverty, highly-segregated neighborhoods lack access to jobs," said Turner, now the director of the Metropolitan Housing & Communities Policy Center at the Urban Institute, a Washington think tank.

Justices Review Prison Disciplinary Rules (AP-Y2)

By Toni Locy

AP2, March 27, 2006

The Supreme Court struggled Monday with whether states can keep troublesome inmates from reading secular newspapers and magazines.

Pennsylvania prison officials urged the high court to allow them to use access to newspapers and magazines as an incentive to get inmates to behave themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0022622

The "bottom line" in the case, as Justice Stephen Breyer put it, is whether the court should interfere and tell the state how to manage its inmates, or whether prison officials have gone too far and infringed on the free-speech rights of prisoners.

The case could wind up in a tie because only eight justices are considering it. Justice Samuel Alito did not participate because he wrote a dissenting opinion — siding with Pennsylvania — when he was a member of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Early in the argument, justices appeared concerned about what limits should be placed on states that want to set up high-security segregation units where inmates who can't follow prison rules are kept.

But by the argument's end, several justices seemed willing to give Pennsylvania credit for trying to change its worst-behaved inmates.

Louis J. Rovelli, Pennsylvania's lawyer, told the justices the state's policy is reasonable because inmates can earn back the privilege of receiving newspapers and magazines, as well as personal photographs.

Rovelli said the state designed the special unit because most of the 40 or so inmates held there eventually will be released from prison. Before that happens, he said, the state wants to try to "turn them around."

The unit's inmates are permitted access to religious newspapers, two paperback books of general interest, their legal documents and letters from family.

The argument seemed to take a turn when Chief Justice John Roberts tried to get the inmates' lawyer to identify options for prison officials who have already taken away most of the privileges of a prisoner who continues to act out.

"You are saying they just have to grin and bear it," Roberts told the inmates' lawyer, Jere Krakoff.

Eventually, Krakoff conceded: "There comes a time when you take away so much ... that, yes, you may have to give up. You may have to keep them in segregation."

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said Krakoff's argument made little sense. Kennedy said the state should have the option of trying to change inmates' behavior and not "forgetting about them altogether."

The case's outcome could affect prison operations nationwide if the justices require state officials to prove that their policies serve legitimate security and rehabilitative interests inside prison walls.

The Bush administration is siding with Pennsylvania, saying the state's policy deserves deference from the courts because it involves maintaining order in prisons.

But religious and civil liberties groups say fundamental rights are not mere privileges that can be granted or revoked at the whim of a prison official. They worry prison officials won't stop with newspapers but may one day bar access to the Bible.

The case began in October 2001 when Ronald Banks filed a civil rights lawsuit on behalf of himself and other inmates in the disciplinary unit, then located in Pittsburgh, after prison officials barred him from receiving The Christian Science Monitor, a nonreligious daily newspaper.

By a split vote, a three-judge 3rd Circuit Court panel sided with Banks, ruling that prison officials had failed to show the policy had any effect on inmate behavior.

The case is Beard v. Banks, 04-1739.

Curb On Access To News In Prison Gets Hearing (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — Pennsylvania went before the Supreme Court on Monday to defend its policy of denying most newspapers, magazines and photographs to its most incorrigible prison inmates against claims that the restriction violates the First Amendment. The policy is one of the most restrictive in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0022623

The federal appeals court in Philadelphia ruled last year that prison officials had to provide some objective evidence to show that the policy actually accomplished the twin goals they claimed for it: improved security and "behavior modification" of recalcitrant inmates.

The appeals court's 2-to-1 ruling set aside a federal district court's judgment for the state, leading to Pennsylvania's Supreme Court appeal. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., then a member of the appeals court, was the dissenter on the three-judge panel. He left the Supreme Court bench Monday morning when the argument began, and will not take part in the case, Beard v. Banks, No. 04-1739.

The case is a class-action lawsuit that began when the prison authorities seized a copy of The Christian Science Monitor, to which an inmate, Ronald Banks, had a subscription. The lower courts looked at the policy as a whole, and did not scrutinize its application to individual inmates.

The argument in the Supreme Court was more lopsided than the eventual decision might be. Jere Krakoff, a lawyer from Pittsburgh representing the inmates who had brought the lawsuit, was making his first Supreme Court argument and appeared nonplused by questions from the justices that more experienced lawyers would have taken in stride.

"I'm obviously not framing my argument in a way that's getting my point across," Mr. Krakoff said at one point in a discouraged tone. At another point, he offered, "My brief may be more coherent than I am today."

If Mr. Krakoff was discouraged, the justices who were sympathetic to his legal position, or who at least wanted his position to be articulated, appeared frustrated, intervening to the extent of putting words in his mouth.

For example, Mr. Krakoff got into a discussion with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. about an exception in Pennsylvania's policy that permits inmates to have religious newspapers and law-related reading matter in their cells. One of the state's explanations for the general no-newspaper rule was that inmates might set fire to newspapers. Mr. Krakoff, trying to show that, given the exceptions, the policy made little sense, observed that "The Jewish Forward can burn as quickly as The New York Times."

"Now you're making your clients' situation worse," Chief Justice Roberts said. He said the state had been willing to take "a more circumscribed approach" in exempting the religious and legal papers.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg intervened at this point, addressing Mr. Krakoff. "I thought you were saying that as a security concern, it doesn't hold up, because the materials they are allowed to have in their cells could be put to the same end," she said.

Later, nearing the end of his allotted 30 minutes, Mr. Krakoff told the justices that he would sit down rather than continue. But he was kept on his feet by justices who had more questions.

Seeking to summarize as the red light came on to signal that his time was up, Mr. Krakoff observed that some of the hard-core inmates in the special prison unit under discussion would eventually complete their sentences and go back into society, deprived of knowledge of what had been going on in the world.

"They could read about ancient wars in the Bible, but not about the war in Iraq," he said. "It's not a healthy situation."

Pennsylvania's lawyer, Louis J. Rovelli, executive deputy state attorney general, received his share of skeptical questions but appeared generally unfazed by them, as did Jonathan L. Marcus, an assistant United States solicitor general who also argued on the state's behalf.

Justice Ginsburg asked Mr. Rovelli to explain why the policy permitted inmates to order paperback books from the prison library while prohibiting newspapers and magazines. "The rationality of that line escapes me," she said.

Mr. Rovelli replied that paperbacks were "small and compact and much more difficult to use as weapons" by the "worst of the worst" inmates to whom the policy applies. About 40 inmates fit into this category at any one time, housed in a special "long-term segregation unit" in the state prison at Fayette, Pa.

Chief Justice Roberts asked: "Is a paperback copy of 'War and Peace' less dangerous?"

It was a "difficult line to draw," Mr. Rovelli acknowledged, while turning his concession into an opening. That was where the expertise of prison officials, to which judges should defer, came in, he said.

He explained that the policy was "guided by the experience of prison administrators," who had observed the "high value" that prisoners placed on access to newspapers and magazines. These were therefore removed to give prisoners an incentive to change their behavior in order to gain a transfer to a lower-security area of the prison.

DOJ_NMG_0022624

This was a justification that the appeals court had found insufficient in the absence of any evidence that it worked or had "any basis in real human psychology," the majority opinion said.

The majority added that far from disregarding Supreme Court precedents requiring deference to prison administrators' judgment, it was simply trying to determine "whether an asserted goal is logically connected to the prison regulation."

If the Supreme Court agrees, the case will go back to Federal District Court in Pittsburgh for a trial. A 4-to-4 tie, in Justice Alito's absence, would have the effect of affirming the appeals court's ruling.

Justice David H. Souter told Mr. Rovelli that the state's behavior-modification theory appeared to justify depriving inmates of access to legal papers. Questioning the state's approach, Justice Souter said: "Tell them, 'No, you may not receive any legal material because it's something you very much want to do.' Can the state do that?"

It could, the state's lawyer replied, as long as the prisoner was left with other means of access to court, including the unlimited visits from lawyers that the policy permits for these high-security inmates. Any prisoner who was deprived of a meaningful access to court, a right to which the Supreme Court has given constitutional protection, could bring another lawsuit challenging the policy "as applied," Mr. Rovelli said.

Reading Material For Pa. Inmates Debated (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

A newspaper has many alternative uses -- fish wrap, puppy training. In Pennsylvania, some prisoners fill a rolled-up paper with toothpaste, let it harden -- and use it as a club.

That glimpse of prison reality came at the Supreme Court yesterday, from a lawyer explaining why Pennsylvania denies about 40 of its most violent inmates reading materials unless they obey the rules. The policy, Pennsylvania Executive Deputy Attorney General Louis J. Rovelli said, is "logically connected to both rehabilitation and security."

Prisoner Ronald Banks sued when his Christian Science Monitor was barred, claiming a violation of his First Amendment rights. Last year, a federal appeals court in Philadelphia ruled in his favor. The state appealed, setting up yesterday's oral argument in Beard v. Banks , No. 04-1739. The case will help define how much the Constitution permits officials to restrict inmates' already limited freedom for the sake of order, security and rehabilitation.

At issue is the Long-Term Segregation Unit, located in Pittsburgh until a move in recent years to Fayette County, where inmates from around the state are sent after attempting to escape or assaulting guards. Prisoners may be kept in solitary confinement 23 hours per day. They get no television, radio, newspapers, magazines or photographs, except for religious or legal publications.

Access to reading material is relaxed in return for good behavior. Pennsylvania says this "behavior modification" is consistent with Supreme Court precedent, which says prisons may restrict inmates' rights as long as they have a legitimate reason to do so and have exhausted the alternatives.

The appeals court ruled that Pennsylvania could not enforce the policy without evidence that it achieved its stated purposes. Then-Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. dissented, saying that a prisoner who was subjected to the restrictions for a long time may have a claim, but that in general the rules were reasonable.

Yesterday, now-Justice Alito had to sit out the case, leaving his eight colleagues to weigh the policy.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg seemed skeptical, noting that a religious publication could also be rolled up and fashioned into a club.

Rovelli answered that, in the experience of prison officials, inmates are less likely to use religious materials as weapons.

The Bush administration supports Pennsylvania, and Assistant Solicitor General Jonathan L. Marcus argued on its behalf. Justice David H. Souter told him he was worried that the state's argument could justify almost anything.

"I don't see the logical stopping point if we accept the behavioral-modification theory," he noted. "Why wouldn't it allow for the deprivation of all communication except access to counsel?"

Marcus replied that such an "exaggerated response" would be barred. "There is a reasonableness test," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0022625

But the court's toughest questioning was reserved for Banks's attorney, Jere Krakoff. He puzzled several justices by arguing that the policy was impermissible because the prisoners were so incorrigible that it would never work.

"I'm suggesting there comes a time when you've taken so many things from these prisoners that, yes, you do have to give up," he said.

That prompted a rebuke from Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who said, "The state's position is that it wants to avoid . . . the most extreme circumstances of just forgetting about them."

Krakoff also disputed the state's claim that newspapers are a danger because inmates light them on fire. The same is true of writing paper, which is allowed, he said.

Justice Antonin Scalia replied: "You want to know what kind of fire you can set with the Sunday New York Times? You're going to compare that with writing paper?"

A decision is expected by July.

Georgia Passes Bill To Fund Bible Courses In Public High Schools (LAT)

By Richard Fausset

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

ATLANTA — Georgia's Legislature on Monday passed a bill to fund elective Bible courses in public high schools, sparking concern among 1st Amendment advocates and generating praise from lawmakers worried that children are losing their grasp on one of Western civilization's most influential texts.

The bill — which still must be signed into law by Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue — would fund separate high school courses on the Old and New Testaments in the context of history and literature.

The bill states that the classes should be taught "in an objective and nondevotional manner, with no attempt made to indoctrinate students as to either the truth or falsity" of the works.

The measure passed late Monday, and lawmakers who supported it were unavailable to comment. But Republican state Sen. Tommie Williams, the bill's sponsor, has said in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution that the Bible is crucial to understanding the foundations of American government.

Federal courts have ruled that public school Bible courses do not violate the 1st Amendment principle of church-state separation as long as they are objective and do not promote religion. A number of districts around the country already teach such classes.

But Charles Haynes, a senior scholar with the First Amendment Center, said this was the first time to his knowledge that a legislature had approved such a course on a statewide basis.

Judith E. Schaeffer, deputy legal director of the liberal People for the American Way, said the proposal's constitutionality could only be determined once the specifics of the curriculum were laid out.

But she was troubled by the bill's language. She pointed to a section that says students should learn "the history recorded by the Old and New Testaments." Schaeffer noted that courts have ruled the Bible cannot be taught as history.

"It's setting up a course that's presented from an unconstitutional perspective," she said. "It's starting out by digging a hole for itself."

People for the American Way has successfully sued school districts in Florida and Mississippi for overstepping constitutional guidelines for Bible classes. Schaeffer said the group would prefer to see courses that focus on the range of sacred texts, not just those favored by Christians.

Democratic lawmakers first introduced a Bible literacy bill in Georgia this year. At the time, they said they were keen to show that Republicans do not have a monopoly on issues of faith. But Republicans, who hold a legislative majority in the state, killed the Democratic proposal and introduced their own.

Democrats and Republicans are sparring over competing Bible literacy bills in the Alabama statehouse. Missouri legislators are also considering such a bill.

Microsoft Appeals S. Korean Antitrust Decision (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

Regulator says software maker must unbundle Windows components

SEOUL, South Korea - Microsoft Corp. filed a lawsuit on Monday challenging a set of punitive measures that South Korea's antitrust regulators imposed on the U.S. software company for its alleged unfair business practices.

The suit, filed with the Seoul High Court, has been widely expected as Microsoft said after the December ruling by the Fair Trade Commission that it would take the case to court.

(MSNBC is a Microsoft-NBC joint venture.)

"Microsoft continues to believe that its actions are consistent with Korean law and have benefited Korean consumers and the Korean technology industry," the company said in a statement announcing its appeal.

The ruling, which was finalized in February, said that Microsoft's practice of tying certain software to Windows was an abuse of its dominant position in the market.

The commission ordered the U.S. company to pay a fine of $33.6 million and provide two separate versions of Windows: one stripped of the Windows Media Player and Windows Messenger, and the other carrying links to Web pages that allow consumers to download competing versions of such software.

"Microsoft would no longer be able to offer in Korea the existing version of Windows that is available everywhere in the world," the company said.

The commission's decision "would create complexities for Korean hardware and software manufacturers in a way that would erode their competitiveness in the global market," it said.

Regulators began investigating Microsoft after a local Internet portal, Daum Communications Corp., filed a complaint with the commission in 2001. Microsoft reached a $30 million settlement with that company in November 2005.

Lucent, Alcatel Work Up A Plan To Ease U.S. Security Concerns (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel SA are moving toward a plan to place some of Lucent's most sensitive defense-related research under the eye of a separate board composed only of Americans, people familiar with the matter said.

Appeasing U.S. government security concerns is a crucial part of negotiations between the two telecom-equipment companies, which hope to complete a merger agreement later this week. Both Congress and elements within the U.S. defense establishment have taken a skeptical view to foreign takeover plans of late, fearing that national security could be compromised in the process. The companies' final plans, however, still could be changed.

As the home of Bell Labs, Lucent has a pedigree that includes the development of the microchip, the laser and some of the world's most widely used computer-programming languages. But the conditions that created those advances -- massive funding from the AT&T phone monopoly until its 1984 breakup -- have dissipated considerably in the past 20 years.

A small portion of the research is directed to classified projects either funded by the government or designed for its use, according to people familiar with the matter. The total funding for those projects is less than $100 million, according to these people. During 2005, Lucent spent about $1.2 billion on research and development, according to company filings.

Despite the small scope of defense research, Lucent, of Murray Hill, N.J., sits in a critical place in the nation's telecom infrastructure. Technology and know-how to wiretap phone calls, monitor wireless communication or intercept a fiber-optic line are Lucent's domain. And for that reason, the two companies are working to devise a plan that would pass U.S. government scrutiny.

Chief among the plans is to create a "proxy board" that would oversee the security-related research. Staffed only by Americans, it would oversee the programs and essentially block any French access to the work.

Creating such a board is just the start of the process. The two companies still must figure out how to select which programs fall under proxy control, how their technology could be converted into commercial use and how a combined Lucent-Alcatel would fund the efforts. That could make a final agreement both a complex and time-consuming exercise.

Nortel Networks Corp., of Brampton, Ontario, devised a similar structure last year when it acquired PEC Solutions. Now called Nortel Government Solutions, the group is a wholly owned subsidiary of the company's U.S. arm, Nortel Networks Inc., and has its own management and a separate board.

Even with a security plan, Lucent and Alcatel still would need to pass muster with the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., the secretive body that came under intense fire for its handling of Dubai Ports World's plan to purchase port facilities across the U.S. Lucent and Alcatel declined to comment.

Lucent Talks Raise Issue Of Security (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

As merger talks between Lucent and Alcatel continue to advance, attention is turning to the role Lucent's fast-growing work for military and intelligence agencies may play in securing government approval for the trans-Atlantic deal.

With a long history of contributing to military efforts like ballistic missile technology and submarine sonar, the famed Bell Labs unit of Lucent is widely expected to become a focal point when the deal is presented to regulators in Washington for approval.

Though the companies have said that they are discussing a "merger of equals," experts say the deal will probably be treated as an acquisition of an American company by a foreign entity because Alcatel of France is one and a half times the size of Lucent and the combined company will probably be based in Paris.

An Alcatel spokesman said yesterday that the company's board would meet on Thursday, but declined to comment further. People close to the negotiations said the deal could be finished as early as this week, though they said a formal announcement might be pushed into the weekend.

National security concerns related to Bell Labs are among the unresolved issues being discussed by executives, these people said. Options said to be considered include completely spinning off the division, which has about 9,000 employees, or separating a unit that does classified work, using a corporate structure frequently employed in the military industry. But they said the companies hoped that none of those remedies would be necessary.

The Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, overseen by the Treasury Department, reviews deals that give foreigners control over operations involving classified matters, export-controlled information, American infrastructure regarded as vital or a sole-source supplier to the Defense Department.

The committee starts with a 30-day formal review, which can be expanded into a 45-day investigation, and if the matter is still unresolved, the deal could be forwarded to the White House for a presidential decision.

Bell Labs was created by American Telephone and Telegraph in 1925 as a wide-ranging research and development center for new technologies in conjunction with its equipment subsidiary, Western Electric, which evolved into Lucent, based in Murray Hill, N.J.

The unit, whose researchers helped develop groundbreaking technologies like the transistor and the Unix computer system, was called upon by successive administrations to aid the military during World War II and the cold war.

"It was the equivalent of the national laboratories," said Narain Gehani, a 23-year Bell Labs veteran who wrote "Bell Labs: Life in the Crown Jewel" (2003, Silicon Press).

After the 1984 breakup of A.T.&T., Bell Labs' involvement in military work started tapering off and fell off more sharply when it became part of an independent Lucent in 1996. A year later, Lucent sold one of its last military businesses, a unit that made submarine surveillance systems based in Greensboro, N.C., to General Dynamics for $284 million.

In recent years, however, Lucent has given new emphasis to government business, largely as a source of lucrative and stable military and intelligence communications contracts, after many of its commercial customers went bankrupt or severely scaled back spending on equipment.

At a November meeting with Wall Street analysts, for instance, Lucent executives said its business running communications networks for governments had grown 50 percent in 2005 and 100 percent in 2004. It highlighted a $100 million contract to rebuild and modernize Iraq's communications system and a $242 million contract to modernize a United States Army network.

But when asked to quantify the company's business with the government, a spokesman said yesterday that Lucent did not break that information out.

Loren Thompson, a military analyst at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va., said, "Compared with the cold war, Lucent's activity today has much less of a military cast."

But he also noted that the Bush administration's drive to modernize the military into a more agile and responsive force was greatly benefiting Lucent and other communications vendors. "The technologies which Lucent is engaged in are at the cutting edge of military innovation," Mr. Thompson said.

Some of the work has a decidedly futuristic focus, like an $11.5 million grant from the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency to develop high-speed wireless networks that can be quickly assembled to allow troops to communicate with one another on battlefields.

Several former Lucent and Bell Labs officials said that over the years a small Bell Labs team based in Whippany, N.J., had been dedicated to classified projects and that even senior executives were not fully aware of the group's work because they lacked the requisite security clearances.

Former Bell Labs researchers say the government is financing an increasing share of the basic research done at the labs, because scarce corporate dollars are reserved for commercial product development.

"Unlike the rest of the company, in research, the major funding comes from the government," said Robert W. Lucky, who worked at Bell Labs for three decades before leaving in 1992. He sits on the Defense Science Board, which advises the Pentagon.

Mr. Lucky and other experts said that they expected that Bell Labs' close ties to the government would mean extra scrutiny especially from an increasingly protectionist Congress, but that the merger would ultimately be approved.

So far, the Alcatel-Lucent talks have not given rise to the kind of concerns voiced after the Bush administration approved a deal for a company owned by the government of Dubai to manage some terminal operations at six American ports.

DOJ_NMG_0022629

A spokesman for Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, said yesterday that the two deals were not comparable, because Alcatel was not a government-owned entity. (The French government owns 4.8 percent of Alcatel's shares.)

Charles Walston, the spokesman, said Mr. Lautenberg was looking to see whether the deal was truly a merger of equals, "and whether Lucent has a lot of control and if it is structured such that Bell Labs would be autonomous."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who took a leading role in opposing the ports deal, issued a brief statement that said, "The Bell Labs are some of the premier research institutions in the country, and we should watch this proposed merger carefully."

Harry L. Clark, a lawyer at Dewey Ballantine who specializes in getting federal approval for foreign transactions, said the "political dimension" could play a role. "For a century, Bell Labs has been a crown jewel of American research," he said.

Alcatel Board To Review Lucent Talks (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

PARIS — Alcatel SA's board will meet Thursday to review the company's merger talks with U.S. rival Lucent Technologies Inc., the French telecom equipment maker said Monday.

Alcatel board members will be briefed on the "ongoing discussions" with Lucent at the meeting, company spokesman Mark Burnworth said.

"There won't necessarily be any conclusions," he said, declining further comment.

Alcatel and Lucent announced Friday that they were making a second attempt to negotiate a merger, after previous talks in 2001 ended without a deal.

Analysts say the deal would give Alcatel a foothold in the U.S. telecoms market and help the combined company cope with growing price pressures, as larger phone and Internet operators emerge from a new wave of consolidation and demand economies of scale on their equipment purchases.

Shares in Lucent Technologies rose 2 cents, to finish at $3.08 Monday on the New York Stock Exchange, building on Friday's 8.5 percent gain after the talks were announced.

But Alcatel's American depositary shares dropped 27 cents, or 1.7 percent, to close at $15.43 on the NYSE, erasing Friday's 1.6 percent gain.

Oil Sector Mergers Hit $160bn Last Year (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, March 28, 2006

Mergers and acquisitions in the oil and gas industry tripled in value last year to $160bn - the highest level since the boom year of 1998 when Exxon and Mobil merged, BP took over Amoco, and Total bought PetroFina.

Deals by Chinese oil and natural gas companies, meanwhile, are expected to have grown sixfold to $6bn in 2005 as they became big international players, buying assets from Ecuador to Sudan and Syria, according to an authoritative industry study.

The report, released tomorrow, suggests oil industry executives and government leaders have been on a frantic global buying spree, under rising pressure to secure the oil and gas needed to fuel economic expansion.

The study by Harrison Lovegrove, the UK-based corporate advisers, and John S Herold, the US research firm, is widely regarded by the industry as the most comprehensive report on M&A activity in the sector. It is expected to show that last year oil companies were willing to pay 54 per cent more for acquisitions in North America as executives bet that high oil prices were here to stay. Acquisition prices in the rest of the world shot up 350 per cent.

Excluding the former Soviet Union, prices outside North America jumped 155 per cent. But the highest prices were attracted by Canada because of its political stability and favourable tax environment.

The report found that more than 240 deals had been struck worldwide, a 40 per cent jump from the preceding year. Much of the activity was among publicly traded companies. It included Chevron's $20bn purchase of Unocal and ConocoPhillips's acquisition of Burlington Resources for $36bn.

DOJ_NMG_0022630

The companies being snapped up were mainly mid-sized – too big for modest drilling successes to deliver good growth results but not large enough to compete with national oil companies or to venture into tough new terrain.

National oil companies also had busy mergers and acquisition programmes.

Deals by state-controlled companies totalled $30bn, three times up on 2004.

Moscow's consolidation of its power over Russia's energy interests involved its purchase of a 10 per cent stake in Gazprom, the natural gas monopoly, and Gazprom's $13bn acquisition of Sibneft, among others. The value of the deals totalled about $20bn.

Despite last year's boom, executives of the biggest oil groups continue to argue publicly that potential acquisitions are currently too expensive. And behind the scenes, regulatory hurdles have been sharpened by the political backlash over the industry's record earnings.

At least one big oil company has said it will be on the prowl for takeover targets once oil prices drop to about $45 a barrel. This price fall, it is hoped, will remove the gloss of high revenues to reveal those companies struggling to keep costs in check and unable to grow.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Big Businesses Have New Take On Warming (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The global warming debate on Capitol Hill is focused on whether the federal government should impose stricter emissions rules. But a key Senate panel is shifting the discussion from "whether" to "how."

The Senate Energy Committee is hearing from industry and activists about how a mandatory plan to control carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases could work. Many big businesses that resisted efforts to fight global warming are sending blueprints and companies like Southern Co. -- an Atlanta utility opposed to new controls -- have filed detailed proposals.

"We feel strongly that if there is going to be a mandatory program, it really has to be economy-wide," said Chris Hobson, a senior vice president at Southern. "To do it any other way would be unduly burdensome to our customers."

"What's interesting here is the diversity of companies and their willingness to respond in some detail," said Jonathan Pershing, a climate-change expert for the World Resources Institute, a nonprofit environmental think tank. Concern about the damage caused by climate change and industry's thirst for regulatory certainty, he predicts, could lead to passage of some form of mandatory carbon-dioxide controls within five years.

The energy committee has received 160 plans from companies and organizations, and members will hold a "roundtable" next Tuesday to sift through them. It will be Congress's first review of possible regulatory mechanisms of a system of mandatory controls.

President Bush has opposed anything other than a voluntary approach. Congress has debated and rejected climate-change regulation, but last fall the Senate opened the door a crack, with advocates mustering 53 votes for a resolution backing mandatory controls if they "will not significantly harm the United States economy."

The corporate proposals are part of an attempt to explore what is feasible along those lines. "There will be more good things put down by smart people on this effort than there have been at the beginnings of most processes like this," said Sen. Pete V. Domenici, (R., N.M.) chairman of the Senate panel.

One of the most ambitious plans comes from Arkansas retailer Wal-Mart Stores Inc., which last fall announced goals to make its stores greener. Andrew Ruben, Wal-Mart's vice president for corporate strategy, said the company wants the federal program to cover electricity generators, large industrial companies and the entire transportation sector. He said Wal-Mart won't wait for Congress to act and is planning a program to cut its emissions.

The company, which operates one of the nation's largest truck fleets, has set goals to make it 25% more efficient within two years and to double its fuel efficiency within 10 years.

Some of the most detailed plans are coming from utilities and other companies that would bear the economic brunt of new rules, including some who have lobbied against more regulations.

A number of major companies, including Southern and DuPont Co., favor what they call a "downstream" approach, which has an effect midway between fuel producers and the ultimate energy consumer. It would impose a cap-and-trade program for utilities and big manufacturers. The government would assign companies a "cap" -- a number of permits or credits to emit carbon dioxide -- which they could trade. Operators who emit less than their quota would have leftover credits to sell to those who need them to keep from exceeding their cap.

These companies also suggest that Congress add an "upstream" approach to cover the millions of cars and trucks in the transportation sector, which would be difficult to control driver-by-driver. So here the controls would shift up the chain of production, to oil refiners in the form of a higher fuel tax, or to auto makers, in the form of more stringent efficiency standards for new cars. The upstream approach would let market forces change consumer behavior.

"The U.S. could show a lot of leadership here because nobody else has figured out how to do this," said Richard Rosenzweig, chief operating officer of Natsource LLC, an emissions-trading firm in New York. He noted that ways to curb emissions in the transportation sector, which generates about 30% of the nation's carbon-dioxide emissions, will be needed in any program to lower U.S. emissions.

Duke Energy Corp., a Charlotte, N.C., electricity producer, is among companies suggesting that Congress apply the upstream approach to all economic sectors in the form of a tax on the carbon content of fuel. The approach would provide "price certainty, gradual timing and administrative simplicity," Duke's plan says. Under some forms of carbon tax, the government would use a portion of the income for research and development of cleaner energy sources and more efficient ways to use energy.

The American Iron and Steel Institute argues in its filing that neither the upstream nor downstream approach will work unless heavy energy users, such as steelmakers, get some form of relief from higher energy prices. Otherwise, they say, companies may shift production overseas. "Companies are very nervous about this," said Jim Schultz, a vice president of the institute. He said the price of carbon credits under the European Union's cap-and-trade system have climbed so high that European steelmakers are considering moving more production to countries such as Brazil, which doesn't have carbon-dioxide controls.

The Senate panel also is looking at systems being developed by Canada and Japan, both of which must comply with the Kyoto Protocol. That agreement among 38 industrial nations, not including the U.S., to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions went into force in February 2005, after Russia ratified it. The treaty requires most industrial nations to reduce emissions by an average of 5.2% below 1990 levels by 2012.

It isn't clear how the plans submitted to the Senate energy panel will compare with Kyoto's goals in reducing emissions. The blueprints U.S. lawmakers are considering focus more on the nuts-and-bolts of how the systems would work, rather than their precise effects in lowering greenhouse gases.

Japan will rely on voluntary emissions reductions at home and major government purchases of carbon credits from abroad to help Japanese companies meet their Kyoto targets.

Canada's system would cover about 10,000 plants in major industries, but, unlike Europe's, it has a "safety valve" that would allow the government to freeze the price of carbon-dioxide credits if market trading drives prices too high.

Some environmental groups argue the safety-valve approach will weaken mandatory controls. Jason Grumet, executive director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy, counters that it could be key to U.S. passage.

"With a safety valve you can go into a politician's office and assure him or her that the price will go no higher than X amount," said Mr. Grumet. Getting the U.S. to launch a program, he said, may be crucial to getting other big world emitters, such as China and India, to brave the political pain of mandatory controls. "You can't let the perfect become the enemy of the good."

An Ice Day For A News Conference (WP)

By Art Buchwald

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

President Bush is covering all his bases. He is traveling around the United States defending his policies.

DOJ_NMG_0022632

The White House is scripting his appearances, and, of course, they depend on press coverage.

Bush's handlers pointed out to the president that he had not said anything about global warming, and it was becoming a sore point with the public.

One adviser says, "Let's set up a news conference and advertise the fact that the president will talk about global warming."

The president agrees that it is a good idea and asks, "Where should we hold the conference?"

Another adviser answers, "What do you think about holding a fundraiser on the Arctic Ocean?"

Someone else says, "What about on the Titanic?"

"And we'll have a big banner saying, 'Mission Accomplished.' "

"I like it," the president says. "What do I say about my stand on global warming?"

"You can say that the press only writes about the bad things, like the Earth getting warmer and polar ice caps melting. You will announce that your environmental adviser, who formerly worked for the Petroleum Institute, said that scientists don't know what they're talking about."

Bush says, "I have never trusted scientists. They just stick with the numbers, and all they want to do is hurt us politically."

"Then, Mr. President, you will assure the country that the Titanic will never hit an iceberg as long as you're president. And even if you do, you will stay the course."

The president nods. "Can I talk about greenhouse gases that are melting the ice at both poles?"

"We think it's a good idea to say that, although the emissions may be responsible for the melting, American corporations are dependent on carbon dioxide to keep their factories going. You should also say warm weather will cut down on the use of heating oil."

The president says, "This would be a good place to attack the environmentalists."

An adviser says, "If any of the scientists try to make us look silly on global warming, we'll censor their reports and forbid them to attack our position."

The president asks, "Can I promise we can bring the boys home by Christmas?"

"Good idea."

An aide says, "Mr. President, your second term is only the tip of the iceberg, and you will do whatever is necessary, even though it hurts you in the polls."

Another adviser adds, "The temperature changes can't but help your popularity. You'll go down in history as the American president that warmed the world."

An environmental adviser says, "We will announce that we believe in a preemptive strike against floods, droughts, heat waves and hurricanes -- because you think it's the right thing to do."

An adviser says, "The country will remember that you were the captain of the Titanic, and if it weren't for you, the ship would have struck an iceberg."

"Sir, this global warming news conference on the Titanic will be remembered in a league with the Gettysburg Address."

"Mr. President, this will be a great photo op."

The president asks, "Who will we put on the deck of the Titanic to cheer me on?"

"Conservatives, anti-environmentalists, polar bears, seals and penguins."

At The U.N.: This Virus Has An Expert 'Quite Scared' (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

Dr. David Nabarro, chief avian flu coordinator for the United Nations, has become gun-shy about making predictions — in particular about if and when the A(H5N1) virus, now devastating bird populations around the world, will do the same to humans.

But Dr. Nabarro describes himself as "quite scared," especially since the disease has broken out of Asia and reached birds in Africa, Europe and India much faster than he expected it to.

"That rampant, explosive spread," he said, "and the dramatic way it's killing poultry so rapidly suggests that we've got a very beastly virus in our midst."

DOJ_NMG_0022633

Dr. Nabarro, the former chief of crisis response for the World Health Organization, admits that he has been accused before of being an alarmist.

On his first day in his current job, he was quoted as saying the avian flu could kill 150 million people.

In December 2004, when he was in charge of the health organization's response to the Indian Ocean tsunami, he warned that if help did not arrive quickly, cholera and malaria could kill twice as many people as the waves had just swept away.

In Darfur the same year, he said that 10,000 people a month were dying in refugee camps because the Sudanese government was rebuffing aid.

And earlier that year, he warned that Israeli roadblocks were endangering Palestinians who needed drugs for diabetes and high blood pressure.

Asked to reflect on those warnings, he answers: About Darfur, he was dead right. On the Palestinians, he was also right, but massive infusions of aid kept death rates down. On the tsunami, he said, he made his dire forecast when only 40,000 people — not 300,000 — were believed dead, and the world's abundant generosity paid for the clean water and mosquito control that prevented the worst from coming true.

On avian flu, he notes, he predicted 5 million to 150 million deaths — the same range the World Bank was using — but headline writers quoted only the higher figure.

And how many does he now say could die? "I don't know," he said. "Nobody knows."

But he repeatedly said that he is more scared than he was when he took the job in September. In October, he predicted that the virus would reach Africa, where surveillance is so poor that deaths of chickens or humans could easily go undiagnosed for weeks. Last month, he was proved right.

The infection of millions more birds in many more countries "has led to an exponential increase of the load of virus in the world," he said. And influenza is a fast-mutating virus. Each infected bird and person is actually awash in minutely different strains, and it takes lengthy genetic testing to sequence each one — so if a pandemic strain were to appear, "it might be quite difficult for us to pick up that change when it happens."

To skeptics who doubt that the A(H5N1) strain will become a threat to humans because it has existed for 10 years without doing so, he counters that it had the same 10 years to move out of Southeast Asia but did not until last year, when it shot across half the globe.

The skepticism reminds him of his stint in East Africa in the 1980's. No one realized then how widespread the AIDS virus was, and it was still unclear whether it was transmitted by sex. Some experts argued that sex was such an inefficient method of disease transmission that it would never be much of a threat. It has now killed 20 million people, and 40 million more are infected.

"We failed to give it the proper focus, right at the beginning," he said.

Like early AIDS, he said, avian flu has too many unanswered questions, like: Why did the disease, after years of smoldering in poultry, suddenly start hitchhiking in migratory birds? Why does the northern China strain — the one now spreading westward — turn up so many false negatives in diagnostic tests? Why did so many people fall sick so quickly in Turkey?

"Bits of the puzzle are missing," he said. "In six months, will we be cursing ourselves for missing some key phenomena now?"

He fears that the virus will soon be endemic in birds everywhere, rendering containment fruitless and condemning the world to mounting a perpetual vigil for human outbreaks. Its movement into cats frightens him even more because humans routinely curl up with them.

Mutations making it less lethal to humans may, paradoxically, be bad news, he said. A disease that kills half of those it infects often burns out before it reaches new victims, while one that leaves 98 percent of its victims alive, as the 1918 flu did, rapidly reaches hundreds of millions because it has so many carriers.

As a public-health bureaucrat, the 56-year-old Dr. Nabarro, who is British, wants to come across as "honest, accurate, down-to-earth, someone who can translate complex facts in a way that makes emotional sense to those receiving them."

Still, there is something about his voice. Experience has made him wary of misquotation, so he chooses his words as carefully as a surgeon picks through his tray of instruments. But his enunciation is chilling — reminiscent of Basil Rathbone as Sherlock Holmes, describing with slow, awful precision how a body was mutilated.

Even his lighthearted similes come across that way. An Oxford graduate and the son of a prominent doctor, he knows the value of a yard chicken because he has worked in Nepal, northern Iraq and East Africa fighting malaria and malnutrition.

Each bird that lays eggs until it ends up in the pot, he said, "is a short-term savings account with a high rate of growth and a yield that no bank can match."

Culling ruins third world farmers the same way canceling Social Security would devastate the American working class. It forces the poor to hide their flocks and thus protect the virus.

Dr. Nabarro rejects "gloomy" as a description of his outlook, but if he were an oncologist, his patients would flee.

He works out of rented United Nations offices in the Chrysler Building in Manhattan and spends much of his time traveling. But if human spread of the disease starts, that will end abruptly. There will be, he predicted, a "period of wonderment," while authorities figure out whether the first cases are real, then borders will close, airports will shut down, and travelers everywhere will be stranded.

"Assuming I'm here," he said, "I'll just camp down, probably in the Secretariat, and stay there for 6 to 10 weeks."

That means he will not be with his wife and five children, who are still in Switzerland, where he was posted with the health organization, or in college in England. He has not stockpiled Tamiflu for them or for himself, he said — though he does carry a box of it to show at meetings. They, too, will have to hunker down where they are.

"But they know the job I'm doing," he said. "They see me as I'm plotting the virus on maps."

The one aspect of his job that makes him more optimistic is that the world is waking up. In January, Dr. Nabarro went to a summit in Beijing hoping to raise $1.2 billion for the fight. He got $1.9 billion.

Still, that is just a beginning, he said.

"We spend billions to protect ourselves from threats that may not exist, from missiles, bombs and human combatants," he said. "But pathogens from the animal kingdom are something against which we are appallingly badly protected, and our investment in pandemic insurance is minute."

On The Front: A Pandemic Is Worrisome But 'Unlikely' (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

OXFORD, England — The Hospital for Tropical Diseases in Ho Chi Minh City, where Dr. Jeremy Farrar works, has treated about two dozen people with avian influenza in the last three years.

With that tiny number, Dr. Farrar and his Vietnamese colleagues probably have more clinical experience than any other doctors with the A(H5N1) virus — the dreaded germ that international health officials fear may ignite the next flu pandemic.

Yet, Dr. Farrar notes, this trickle of humans infected with bird flu — 186 in all since 2003 — has provoked a flood of scientific meetings on pandemics, accelerating in recent months.

"The ratio of meetings to patients is probably 10 to 1: Hawaii tomorrow. Geneva and Singapore next week," said Dr. Farrar, in jeans and carrying a red backpack, on a break from a conference where he was — naturally — speaking on the topic.

"The interest is phenomenal," he said, clicking at his popular PowerPoint presentation.

Still, Dr. Farrar is not sure that this intensity is entirely rational:

Having observed A(H5N1) for many years in Asia, he thinks it is unlikely that the virus is poised to jump species, becoming readily transmissible to humans or among them. Nor does he believe the mantra that a horrific influenza pandemic is inevitable or long overdue. He points out that the only prior pandemic with a devastating death toll was in 1918, and he says that may have been "a unique biological event."

"For years, they have been telling us it's going to happen — and it hasn't," said Dr. Farrar, director of the Oxford University Clinical Research Unit at the hospital in Vietnam. "Billions of chickens in Asia have been infected and millions of people lived with them — we in Asia are intimate with our poultry — and less than 200 people have gotten infected.

DOJ_NMG_0022635

"That tells you that the constraints on the virus are considerable," he continued. "It must be hard for this virus to jump."

Still, a part of Dr. Farrar is terrified of A(H5N1) — "a very nasty virus," he calls it — which he has watched kill healthy young people, devouring their lungs.

In the last year, the virus has extended its range in birds from Eastern China to Western Africa. Over time, it has expanded the variety of species it can infect, including ferrets and cats.

"That is alarming," he acknowledges in the understated British way.

Like all responsible scientists, Dr. Farrar believes the world should prepare. But schooled in places where people die of real and present diseases like malaria and tuberculosis, he finds the "doomsday" predictions sketched out by some international officials unhelpful, more fantasy than fact.

And even if these officials' dire forecasts were to come true, he says, many of their elaborate pandemic preparedness plans are unworkable in developing countries, which do not have the resources or medical facilities to comply.

"I think you have to say we really don't know the odds of pandemic, and people are not comfortable with that," Dr. Farrar said. "It could fizzle out and kill 98 people — one more than the number dead today. Or it could be something like 200 million," closer to an estimate once made by Dr. David Nabarro, chief avian flu coordinator for the United Nations.

"It's terrifying if it happens, but it is very, very unlikely, I think — and it is difficult to balance those facts."

At the Tropical Disease Hospital in Vietnam, doctors have been doing just that, bracing for a pandemic that may never come, since long before it became fashionable in the West.

Before Vietnam began vaccinating poultry in mid-2005, the disease was rampant among birds there. Of the world's 186 confirmed human cases, 93 are from Vietnam. There have been no new cases this year.

But in the Tropical Diseases Hospital, doctors and nurses still don full bio-protective gear when they evaluate suspected cases, because "you don't know if the next one will mark the start of human to human transmission," Dr. Farrar said.

With each new patient, they assiduously try to follow international scientific recommendations. But their on-the-ground experience reveals holes in the neat strategies coming from United Nations experts in Geneva and Rome.

The World Health Organization suggests that it might be possible to contain a pandemic by quickly diagnosing index cases, identifying contacts, prescribing all antiviral drugs, and quarantining, for example.

In response, Dr. Farrar shows a picture of the home of a patient: a hut on stilts by the Mekong River. When that patient fell ill, he took a boat to the local health station, and was transferred to the district hospital, Dr. Farrar says. Later, an ambulance took him to Ho Chi Minh City, where genetic analysis showed that he had avian influenza, instead of typical pneumonia. If bird flu ever gained the ability to spread easily among humans, that patient would have infected thousands before diagnosis.

"You've got to act quickly, but the process now takes many days," Dr. Farrar said, suggesting that more money for clinics, labs and experts should be flowing to developing nations.

"Then you're supposed to go back to the village and saturate it with oseltamivir?" he asks, using the generic name for the antiviral drug Tamiflu. "What do the villagers do when they hear the man has bird flu? They don't sit still; they get on buses and flee and stay with relatives in other villages," potentially spreading it there.

For doctors in Vietnam, human cases of avian influenza have been a frightening reality for more than three years, and Dr. Farrar vividly remembers the initial terror of the devoted hospital staff, unsure if they could catch bird flu from patients.

"Look at this lung — there's nothing there," he said pulling up the X-ray of a patient who is back at the university, but whose left chest shows a vast empty cavern. Studies from the hospital have taught the world much about A(H5N1): humans took longer to clear this virus than normal influenza, for example, and Tamiflu can quickly breed resistant strains.

But, to Dr. Farrar's chagrin, the treatment options have not really improved.

Flu vaccines are still manufactured by an "ancient strategy" that involves injecting eggs with virus, he complained, even as other vaccines rely on more sophisticated methods. As a result, flu vaccines — including experimental versions aimed at A(H5N1) — are cumbersome to produce, and target just one strain.

"What we need is a vaccine that is effective across strains because the virus can be different each year," he said. "My mom in the U.K. can get a shot every year, but that is not realistic in rural Asia."

DOJ_NMG_0022636

More remarkable still, he said, Tamiflu is still the only drug useful against avian influenza, "and we all know that one drug is not adequate to treat any viral disease," he said, noting that multiple drugs are used in AIDS.

Patients at Dr. Farrar's Hospital are given Tamiflu, and it appears to help some. "It's all that we have," he said. "So if I was sick, I'd certainly want to get it."

But, he rues the lack of international research and coordination to tackle a disease that has been in Asia for nearly 10 years. For example, he said, although Vietnam has greatly reduced the number of bird flu outbreaks by vaccinating poultry, no one knows if the vaccine puts pressure on A(H5N1) to mutate to develop resistance to the shot, which could cause a rebound of disease in the coming years.

Personally, Dr. Farrar remains optimistic, believing a pandemic will not come. If A(H5N1) changed so that it readily infected people, it would probably become less deadly, he said.

But if disaster happens, he says: "People will look back and say: 'This was a nasty virus that you knew could sometimes infect other species. Why didn't you do something? All you had was a single effective drug and no vaccine?' "

With Every Epidemic, Health Officials Face Tough Choices (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman, M.d.

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

To warn. Or not to warn.

That classic dilemma in public health has been brought into sharp focus by the A(H5N1) avian influenza virus that is spreading around the world and has led to the death of tens of millions of birds in Asia and Europe.

For health officials, few decisions can be as crucial as deciding if and when to sound early warnings when they believe that an epidemic is possible but do not know whether it will become a real catastrophe.

The dilemma often concerns the influenza virus because it continually mutates, leading to human pandemics that predictably occur unpredictably. Although scientists lack the knowledge to predict when and what strain will cause the next influenza pandemic, they say they are convinced that another one is inevitable and so preparation must start as soon as a threat is detected.

That kind of immediate action occurred in 1976 after four cases of swine influenza were detected at Fort Dix, a military base in New Jersey. Fearing that the cases represented an early warning of an impending pandemic of influenza, Public Health Service officials rushed President Gerald R. Ford, who was running for re-election, into recommending a swine influenza shot for every American.

Mr. Ford proposed a $135 million program to make enough vaccine to immunize 200 million people, about 95 percent of the United States population at the time. It was the government's first effort to immunize all Americans against one disease in one program, and Congress authorized it.

But the effort was suspended shortly after it began because a paralyzing ailment, Guillain-Barré syndrome, occurred among a small number of the 42 million vaccine recipients.

A few cases of the syndrome had been linked to influenza vaccine, but government officials failed to mention the risk in the consent form or to discuss it publicly.

The feared killer disease never came. But by the time the effort ended, 535 cases of Guillain-Barré had been diagnosed, including 23 deaths, outnumbering the mostly mild 230 cases of swine flu at Fort Dix. The virus did not spread. The immunization plan was a fiasco. Health officials were dismissed, some say unfairly.

The episode has become a textbook case in training a new generation of health officials about the dangers of sounding warnings too early without having a well-thought-out plan.

The opposite problem — failing to warn about preparations for an outbreak — occurred in 2001.

Shortly after Sept. 11, Tommy G. Thompson, then the secretary of health and human services, went on national television to assure Americans that the government was fully prepared to respond to any bioterrorism attack.

DOJ_NMG_0022637

Within days, the deliberate release of anthrax spores through the postal system proved him wrong. The outbreak was small — 22 cases, including 5 deaths. But it showed how poorly the government communicated in a timely way to doctors and the public. It left many government officials wanting never to be perceived as underreacting to a health threat.

The two episodes led many people to lose trust in government health warnings, or in the lack of them.

Warnings about A(H5N1) avian influenza began in 1997, when scientists in Hong Kong discovered that that strain of virus had jumped directly to cause disease in humans without first mixing in pigs, which had been the pattern until then. With the spread of the virus among birds, officials have warned that it could mutate, combine with a human influenza virus and create a new one to cause a human pandemic.

That has not happened, although 105 of the 186 people in the world who have developed A(H5N1) avian influenza have died.

Should health officials risk issuing stern warnings that may frighten people? Or should officials play it safe, going about their business and informing the public only when a pandemic becomes real?

If officials do issue early warnings, and nothing happens, they stand to lose credibility among people who say that scientists promoted the worst possibilities to grab more grants and waste taxpayer dollars.

If officials do not issue early or timely warnings, and a pandemic occurs, critics will say the public was not informed and protected in time.

The situation also leaves health officials vulnerable to charges of "I told you so," even though there is often no way to prove that the Monday morning quarterbacks actually made their criticisms known at the time key decisions had to be made.

Two types of dilemmas are often involved in deciding when and what warning to give, said Dr. Harvey V. Fineberg, who wrote a book with Richard E. Neustadt in 1978 analyzing the government's and industry's responses to the swine flu immunization program.

One is like a Category 5 hurricane with long odds on its occurring, but with devastating consequences if it does.

"In such cases, the naysayer is most often going to be right," said Dr. Fineberg, president of the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences, said in an interview, referring to those who contend preparation is unnecessary.

The second dilemma involves a tension that can arise when scientists believe that political leaders and the public do not understand risk as well as scientists do. Problems can arise if an expert believes action is needed because the risk of an outbreak is, say, 10 percent, but perceives that government officials will consider 10 percent to be too low for action to be taken.

So the scientist may choose a way to present the facts and estimates to persuade government officials to do what the scientist believes is correct.

In deciding whether to warn and act, the tendency is often "reluctance to do something that may cause harm as opposed to allowing nature to create its own harm," Dr. Fineberg said.

Last year, the Bush administration released a comprehensive plan to counter an influenza pandemic. Even with it, the dilemma of when to warn will remain.

Making A Ferret Sneeze For Hints To The Transmission Of Bird Flu (NYT)

By Denise Grady

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

ATLANTA — One way to collect nasal secretions from a ferret is to anesthetize it, hold a petri dish under its snout and squirt a little salt water up its nose so that it will sneeze into the dish.

At the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, ferret sneezes are frozen in tiny vials and locked up in a high-security chamber called an enhanced biosafety Level 3 laboratory. It takes a fingerprint scan to get in, and an iris scan to open the freezer. Scientists wear scrub suits, gowns, double gloves and hoods, breathe filtered air and open vials only by reaching into a safety cabinet designed to keep germs from escaping into the air.

The vials are in this lab because the animals have been exposed to A(H5N1), the notorious avian flu virus that has swept across Asia, Europe and Africa, wiping out flocks of poultry and sometimes killing people as well. Researchers at the disease centers and in other labs are studying the transmission and virulence of bird flu in ferrets and mice, trying to answer questions that take on more urgency as the virus advances.

"We have never had a situation like the world is experiencing today, such an unprecedented spread among poultry," said Dr. Timothy Uyeki, an epidemiologist and influenza expert at the disease centers. "The geographic spread is unprecedented, and the mortality unprecedented as well, and this virus has been clearly confirmed to transmit directly from poultry to people and to cause severe and fatal illness."

The big question is, will A(H5N1) cause a human pandemic? Many scientists think the world is overdue for one and find it worrisome that this dangerous virus has popped up now. Even so, in its present form this flu does not seem to be a pandemic germ because it does not spread easily from birds to humans, and because infected people rarely transmit it to others. But everything could change if the virus were to mutate in a way that made it easier for people to catch and spread.

"Why would a particular virus be transmitted easily human to human, and another not?" asked Dr. Peter Palese, chairman of microbiology at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York. "Even though I am 35 years in this field, we do not have molecular parameters or signatures which make that clear, although many groups, including my own, are working on this exact question."

The virus is a moving target, and two distinct subsets of it have developed, one from Vietnam and one from Indonesia, that differ enough to make scientists think separate vaccines will be needed. Scientists are trying to understand how a virus can be wildly contagious among birds but almost impossible to spread in mammals — and what type of mutation could change that. They are also comparing different strains of A(H5N1) to see if it is becoming more virulent, and they are examining the structure of the virus in hopes of figuring out what makes it so deadly.

Ferrets are used for some studies because, unlike mice, they easily catch human flu viruses and get sick, and so are considered a better model for people. At the disease centers, Taronna Maines and Terrence Tumpey have infected ferrets with A(H5N1) and then monitored them to see if the severity of the disease varies by strain and by dose, and to see if the infected animals cough up the virus or sneeze it out and spread it to healthy ones.

It turns out that ferrets do not transmit the disease easily, though some healthy animals develop antibodies to the virus, indicating that they have been exposed. If a strain comes along that is contagious in ferrets, it might be bad news for people.

Research like this may help determine whether (A)H5N1 is heading down the path to becoming a pandemic strain, and may also help to guide the development of vaccines and drugs.

Aside from the virus's recent horrible track record, several other things about it can help explain why some scientists worry that it has pandemic potential. The A means it belongs to a larger group known as Type A influenza viruses, which cause many of the human flu epidemics that occur every winter. But more ominously, Type A also includes the only viruses ever known to have caused human pandemics, in 1918, 1957 and 1968.

Flu viruses mutate a lot, and pandemics occur when a Type A virus undergoes a big genetic change to produce a new type of virus to which people have little or no resistance. Sometimes the change occurs when a person or a pig acts as a "mixing vessel" for two flu viruses — maybe a human one and a bird one — which swap genes to produce a new virus. That kind of change is believed to have caused the 1957 and 1968 pandemics. But the 1918 pandemic, the worst by far, is thought to have occurred without a gene swap, when a bird flu somehow mutated enough to jump into humans.

All Type A viruses are found in birds. They probably originated in wild birds and usually do them little or no harm. Only a few evolved into strains that could easily infect people. A(H5N1) is not adapted to people, and researchers suspect that human victims so far may have been infected because they were exposed to enormous amounts of the virus from birds.

The letters H and N stand for two proteins on the outside of all Type A viruses. The H, hemagglutinin, helps the virus get into cells, which it must do to reproduce. The N, neuraminidase, helps it get back out to infect more cells. There are 16 kinds of H and 9 kinds of N; they mix and match, and so can produce 144 possible Type A strains. The worrisome thing about H5 is that H5 viruses are avian flus and have not been known to cause human epidemics, so many people may have little or no resistance to them.

Not long ago, A(H5N1) may well have been what scientists call a perfect parasite, meaning one that does little harm to its host, Dr. Ruben Donis, a flu expert at the disease centers. said. Some wild ducks seem to carry it without getting sick at all, so scientists think that ducks were probably its original host and that the two evolved together into a peaceful coexistence: the virus did not hurt the duck, and the duck's immune system ignored the virus. Thriving in the bird's intestines, the virus multiplied rapidly and was spread far and wide by droppings. Other aquatic birds may have adapted in a similar way.

Not so for chickens or other domestic fowl: A(H5N1) attacks their lungs and other organs, and it quickly kills them. But the chicken's immune system tries to fight back, and that battle may alter the virus. The bird may fight off some viruses, ones with certain mutations. Other viruses survive, multiply and become more common. And since they have beaten out the chicken's immune system, they may also be nastier.

It is just a theory, but some scientists suspect that its forays into huge poultry flocks may have brought out more virulent forms of A(H5N1), which may explain why the virus now seems to be killing off more wild birds than in the past. At the same time, the virus has begun to invade more species, including mammals — infected cats, pigs and dogs have been reported. Researchers consider that a bad sign.

"The more opportunities this virus has to mutate during replication in a mammalian host, the more likely it is to mutate," said Dr. Nancy Cox, director of the influenza branch at the disease centers.

In the laboratory, Dr. Maines and Dr. Tumpey have found that the virus seems to have become more virulent over time. With some strains, an unbelievably small amount of virus will kill a mouse, Dr. Tumpey said. Last September, in the Journal of Virology, they reported that viruses from people infected in 2003 and 2004 were more deadly in mice and ferrets than were samples taken from 1997 victims. But there is not enough information about the human cases to tell whether the disease in people has gotten more severe.

Recent studies by several research teams have focused on hemagglutinin. The virus can attach only to cells that have the right receptors — compatible molecules on their surfaces. Many scientists think hemagglutinin, and mutations that change its structure, may control where the virus can go and what it can do. For instance, hemagglutinin may determine which species the virus can infect and which tissues it can invade.

The more organs and tissues a virus can attack, the more likely it is to cause severe disease. Scientists are especially interested in a part of the hemagglutinin that sets A(H5N1) apart from many other bird flu viruses by enabling it, in some species at least, to latch onto many types of cells and thus to cause systemic disease.

Studies published recently in Science and Nature by two research groups suggested that one reason A(H5N1) is not transmissible among people is that the virus can latch on only to cells deep in the respiratory tract, too far down to be coughed up or sneezed out to infect other people. They discovered that only the deeper cells had the right type of receptors.

But if the virus were to mutate so that it could connect with cells higher in the respiratory tract, then it might become transmissible. Several mutations would be needed, and virologists disagree about whether they are likely to occur.

Another major unanswered question concerns how severe bird flu really is in people. Based on cases in hospitals, it looks like a horrific disease with a 50 percent death rate.

But what if some people get infected and recover without seeing a doctor, or never get sick at all, and so are not counted? Then, the death rate would be lower.

A study published in January in The Archives of Internal Medicine suggests that there may be mild, unreported bird flu cases. Over a three-month period in 2004, researchers studied 45,478 residents in a rural district in Vietnam that had A(H5N1) outbreaks to find out how many had contact with sick birds and how many had flulike illnesses.

They found that statistically, those exposed to sick birds were most likely to have gotten sick, and of 8,149 who had a flulike illness, 650 to 750 probably caught it from birds. The study was not conclusive because the researchers did not test their subjects to find out for sure whether they had A(H5N1).

But if human cases are more common than previously thought, it could be both good news and bad news: good if not everyone becomes deathly ill, but not good if more people are infected and might act as the dreaded "mixing vessels" that could let A(H5N1) trade genes with an ordinary human flu virus and produce a new, highly contagious strain that could turn into a pandemic.

"The viruses are changing, and in ways of concern to me and other scientists," Dr. Cox said.

DOJ_NMG_0022640

She said scientists had a unique window of opportunity now, in which they could see the disease in both birds and people and try to stop it or at least slow it down.

"Could we quench an incipient pandemic?" Dr. Cox asked. "I don't know, but we could try."

From The Chickens' Perspective, The Sky Really Is Falling (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

The A(H5N1) influenza strain circulating the globe now may never seriously threaten humans, but for another subset of the earth's living creatures, it is already a disaster.

"If you're a chicken," Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said at a recent conference on avian flu, "this is a pandemic. We have to be aware that other species are thinking about this differently."

By some estimates, more than 200 million domestic chickens, ducks and geese have already either died of the disease or been killed on the order of public health authorities to prevent its spread.

But scientists are scratching their heads over how much of a threat the virus presents to the world's birds.

All birds are thought to be susceptible, said P. Patrick Leahy, acting director of the United States Geological Survey, which tracks wild bird movements in the country. The survey's National Wildlife Health Center lists all the 87 species from which infected birds have been found in Asia, Africa and Europe. The species include sparrows, eagles and flamingoes. But in most cases, it has been a dead bird here and a dead bird there.

While the virus can race through a chicken farm, killing tens of thousands of birds in a few days, there have been very few die-offs of large numbers of wild birds in any one spot. Nor have ornithologists who net live birds along international flyways and take samples from birds shot by hunters found many infections.

And bird experts cannot yet point to any species they think is likely to become extinct.

"As a conservationist, I'm not concerned about it wiping out whole populations," said Colin Poole, director of the Asia program for the Wildlife Conservation Society, which runs the Bronx Zoo and others. "I'd say the biggest threat is things like Russian politicians saying people should go to the borders and shoot migrating birds. There's plenty of that kind of nonsense going around."

In May 2005, Chinese researchers reported that 6,000 dead birds had been found in Qinghai Lake nature reserve, among them many bar-headed geese (Anser indicus). In theory, that could mean that 5 percent to 10 percent of the world's population of bar-headed geese was wiped out, but foreign teams were not allowed near the lake, and several bird experts said that the sampling data China released was sketchy about which species were affected.

Shortly afterward, reports of a large die-off at Erkhel Lake in Mongolia were investigated by Wildlife Conservation Society veterinarians. They found only 100 dead birds, many of them swans, and counted 6,500 live ones of 55 species. Only one sample from about 800 they gathered turned out positive for the virus.

"It had a very low impact," Dr. William Karesh, one of the veterinarians, said at the time. "The disease is self-limiting in wild birds."

According to Birdlife International, a bird-protection group based in England, members of two other threatened species, the red-breasted goose (Branta ruficollis) and the Dalmatian pelican (Pelecanus crispus), have been found dead of the disease. But only a handful were found, and there are an estimated 88,000 of the geese and 15,000 of the pelicans remaining.

There are at least 15 types of avian flu, and wild ducks are a natural host. The viruses, which are shed in feces and linger in water, turn Arctic breeding ponds into a duck soup of influenza, and migratory birds carry antibodies to many strains.

But when a new virus gets into a barn packed with thousands of young chickens that have been genetically selected for their plump breasts rather than their ability to survive in the wild, it leaps from bird to bird, mutating slightly each time, and sometimes morphs into a lethal strain — just as the 1918 Spanish flu was believed to become more deadly as it passed through crowded American military camps during the cold winter of 1917.

The new, lethal virus may then be passed back to migratory birds when they visit ponds or rice paddies used by domestic flocks — or perhaps through intermediaries like crows or mynahs that steal food from poultry operations. But then, that wild infection may snuff itself out again because dying birds cannot fly far.

This may help account for the unpredictable hopscotch pattern the virus is following, experts said.

"It's hard to know what's going on," said Rob Fergus, science coordinator for the National Audubon Society. "But we're not seeing many wild birds dying nearby every time we find outbreaks in poultry."

Another possible route is the international trade in day-old chicks. After the outbreak in Nigeria, the Nigerian agriculture minister, Adamu Bello, said poultry producers there import chicks from China and Turkey, where the disease is widespread. Although the river deltas of southern Nigeria shelter many birds that migrate from Europe, ducks there are not dying, and the first infected poultry operations were in the arid north.

The chick trade "has made the chicken the most migratory bird in the world," said Adrian Long, a spokesman for Birdlife International. "When the United Nations puts every outbreak on wild birds, they're not exactly being Sherlock Holmes in their inquiries."

Two localized die-offs of wild birds, one in Azerbaijan and one in Germany, have been reported. And from Italy to Sweden, small numbers of dead, infected swans have been found, while many other species sharing waters with them appear healthy.

Many of the dead were mute swans (Cygnus olor), Mr. Poole said, which often live close to humans in park lakes. Unlike whistling swans, which migrate thousands of miles to the Arctic, mutes tend to circle Europe following food crops, the way Canada geese circle North America, and might have caught their infections from poultry in Turkey or Romania.

Human overreactions have proved more of a threat. In January 2004, the Thai government briefly laid plans to kill 70,000 open-billed storks in two nature reserves, fearing they were spreading the disease after 200 of them died. It canceled the plan a month later after only two of the dead birds turned out to have had the flu.

In Romania, villagers were reported to have attacked exhausted wild birds on an icy lake. In Maine, Kathleen F. Gensheimer, the state epidemiologist, said her department had fielded calls from citizens asking if they should shoot all the Canada geese landing in their backyards.

No bird with the deadly A(H5N1) strain has yet been found in North or South America.

The disease is endemic in China's poultry, and many species migrate over those flocks. Authorities in Hong Kong, Japan, South Korea, Australia and New Zealand have tested thousands of those migratory birds in the last two years, Mr. Poole said. Not a single infected one has been found. (Most of the tests were of feces, not blood, so the birds were not shedding the A(H5N1) virus. Blood tests might have shown antibodies to the virus, meaning the birds had been infected but survived.)

In Hong Kong, 16 birds found dead have tested positive, he said, "but they were all chickens or resident species, not migratory, and all from species associated with humans — crows, magpies, mynahs."

A huge study of swabs and fecal samples from 13,000 wild ducks in marshes in Hong Kong and eastern China and 51,000 ducks in wet markets around China, reported last month by virologists in Asia and from St. Jude Research Hospital, showed that some healthy looking wild ducks were shedding a form of the virus that was lethal to domestic birds. And the A(H5N1) strains in domestic poultry had mutated into such distinct regional clades that the authors believed most of the spread in those flocks was from farm to farm, not from wild birds.

The study suggested that wild ducks were probably responsible for moving the virus to Mongolia, Russia and Europe, but that they were probably getting infected by strains percolating in the domestic flocks of southern China.

The 1918 Flu Killed Millions. Does It Hold Clues For Today? (NYT)

By Gina Kolata

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

Flu researchers know the epidemic of 1918 all too well.

It was the worst infectious disease epidemic ever, killing more Americans in just a few months than died in World War I, World War II, the Korean War and the Vietnam Wars combined. Unlike most flu strains, which kill predominantly the very old and the very young, this one — a bird flu, as it turns out — struck young adults in their 20's, 30's and 40's, leaving children orphaned and families without wage earners.

So now, as another bird flu spreads across the globe, killing domestic fowl and some wild birds and, ominously, infecting and killing more than 100 people as well, many scientists are looking back to 1918. Did that flu pandemic get started in the same way as this one? Will today's bird flu turn into tomorrow's human pandemic?

And what, if anything, does that nearly century old virus and the pandemic it caused reveal about what is happening today?

The answer is: a lot and not enough. The 1918 pandemic showed how quickly an influenza virus could devastate American towns and cities and how easily it could spread across the globe, even in an era before air travel.

It showed that a flu virus could produce unfamiliar symptoms and could kill in unprecedented ways. And it showed that a bird flu could turn into something that spreads among people.

But the parallels go only so far, researchers say. For now, they are left with as many questions as answers.

In the fall of 1918 flu struck the United States and parts of Europe hard and traveled to every corner of the world except Australia and a few remote islands. A few months later, it vanished, burning itself out after infecting nearly everyone who could be infected.

The virus arrived at even the most improbable places, like isolated Alaskan villages. In one such village, Wales, 178 of its 396 residents died during one week in November, after a mailman arrived by dog sled, bringing the virus along with the mail.

Public health officials tried in vain to contain its spread. In Philadelphia, people were exhorted not to cough, sneeze or spit in public.

But the virus spread anyway. On Oct. 3, Philadelphia closed all of its schools, churches, theaters and pool halls. Still, within a month, nearly 11,000 Philadelphians died of influenza.

Anyone who doubts that flu deaths can be horrific need only read the memoirs of physicians like Dr. Victor C. Vaughan, who treated influenza victims in 1918.

Dr. Vaughan, a former president of the American Medical Association, was summoned by the surgeon general to Camp Devens, near Boston, where the flu struck in September. He later described the scene in his memoirs.

The men, Dr. Vaughan wrote, "are placed on the cots until every bed is full, yet others crowd in."

"Their faces soon wear a bluish cast; a distressing cough brings up the blood stained sputum," he continued.

"In the morning, the dead bodies are stacked about the morgue like cord wood," Dr. Vaughan said. "This picture was painted on my memory cells at the division hospital, Camp Devens, in the fall of 1918, when the deadly influenza virus demonstrated the inferiority of human inventions in the destruction of human life."

Still, scientists are left with an abiding mystery: Where did the 1918 virus come from?

Investigators know more than they once did. They know exactly what the virus looked like, thanks to Dr. Jeffrey Taubenberger, chief of the division of molecular pathology at the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology, and his colleagues, who obtained snippets of preserved lung tissue from three victims of the 1918 flu and managed to fish out shards of the virus and piece together its genes. Although the 1918 virus was a strain different from the A (H5N1) virus that is now killing birds, it was, Dr. Taubenberger found, a bird flu.

What is not known is how the 1918 virus moved from birds to humans.

One clue could come from knowing what flu viruses existed before the 1918 pandemic. Perhaps the 1918 virus entered the human population before 1918 in a more benign form then mutated to become a killer. Or perhaps it suddenly showed up in humans, jumping directly from birds to people.

To find out, Dr. Taubenberger and Dr. John Oxford of the Royal London Hospital are looking for human flu viruses that existed before 1918. London Hospital has a collection of human tissue obtained from 1908 to 1918. Dr. Taubenberger is searching for flu viruses in lung tissue from people who died of pneumonia in those years, hoping to use the same methods that allowed him to piece together the 1918 virus to resurrect a flu virus that was in humans before 1918.

The 1918 virus also is teaching researchers about experimental vaccines that scientists hope will protect against a variety of influenza strains. The plan had been to make a sort of universal flu vaccine that would protect against various flu viruses. Then people would not need a flu shot each year, and the vaccine might stop pandemic flu strains from ever gaining a toehold.

DOJ_NMG_0022643

But, says Dr. Terrence Tumpey, a microbiologist at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, although the experimental vaccines protect against ordinary human flu viruses, they do not protect against the 1918 virus. Nor do they protect against today's A(H5N1) bird flu virus.

That leaves scientists with a puzzle. If they are worried about a 1918-like flu, they want a universal vaccine to protect against it, and they wonder what makes these bird flus so impervious? At this point, no one knows, Dr. Tumpey says.

Another abiding mystery is that neither the 1918 influenza pandemic nor any other human influenza pandemic began with a flu pandemic that killed birds. And, scientists add, if the 1918 pandemic had begun that way, it would have been noticed. Even if the deaths of wild birds went undetected, the deaths of domestic fowl would have been recorded.

Wild birds are inured to most flu viruses — clouds of the viruses normally infect them, living in their gastrointestinal tracts but causing little or no disease. Sometimes, those flu viruses infect poultry and, while they usually cause little illness, some flu strains can be lethal to fowl and economically devastating to farmers.

That, Dr. Taubenberger says, "has been recognized for 150 years." In the 1920's, scientists even isolated viruses from what they used to call fowl plague and what is now known to be bird flu. They were not the same viruses that infected humans.

The problem is in deciding what all this means.

The history of the 1918 flu can take scientists only so far, Dr. Taubenberger said.

"We don't know how the 1918 pandemic evolved and how the virus emerged into a form that was the finished product," he said. "What we sequenced was a virus that was ready for prime time, not its precursor."

"Ultimately," Dr. Taubenberger said, "the answer to the big question is, We don't know. There is no historical precedent for what is going on today."

Woman Jailed In Havre On Charge Related To Fatal Shooting In Hays (HAVREDN)

By Krista Corner, Havre Daily News

Havre (MT) Daily News, March 28, 2006

A fatal shooting in Hays on Saturday left one man dead and his daughter in custody, an FBI official said this morning.

Neil Gray, 43, was shot to death in his residence in Hays on the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation, FBI spokesman Patrick Kiernan said today in an interview from Salt Lake City. Gray's daughter, Ashley Lynn Gray, 21, of Hays is being held in connection with the crime, Kiernan said. According to the Hill County Sheriff's Office, Gray is being held in county jail on charges of disorderly conduct and obstructing a peace officer.

"I anticipate additional or different charges will be filed" against Gray, Kiernan said.

The spokesman said he could not release any additional details regarding the incident.

Gun Case Against Firefighter Spotlights Interrogation Policy (RMN)

By Kevin Vaughan, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, March 27, 2006

While the majority of law enforcement agencies routinely record interviews with suspects during criminal investigations, one of the biggest and most powerful ones all but refuses to tape interrogations.

The exception to a law enforcement trend now more than two decades old? The Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The argument against taping is simple: If agents record interviews, suspects won't talk candidly.

Not true, said Denver police Lt. Jon Priest, who helped usher his department's homicide unit into the era of video recording in 1983.

"That was the same argument that came out in 1966 when the Supreme Court ruled that you had to advise people of their rights. 'Oh my God, they'll never talk to us again,' " Priest said. "But you know what, they still do, and they still confess."

DOJ_NMG_0022644

The FBI's long-standing practice is in the spotlight again in the case of a Denver firefighter facing federal charges of selling illegal machine guns. Stan Ford, 35, was arrested last November after a two-year investigation. After his arrest, Ford sat down with an FBI agent and a Denver police officer.

But exactly what he said is in dispute. The FBI agent wrote a report, slightly longer than three pages, summarizing the interview. That report includes several quotations.

At a court hearing earlier this month, Ford's attorney, Will Hood, won the right to examine the FBI agent's notes. He then pointed to a number of inconsistencies between the notes and the report.

In one instance, for example, the notes quote Ford as saying he liked to "buy and sell guns legally" - but the word "legally" was not in the report. In other examples, direct quotations in the report are not in the agent's notes.

"We wish that we actually had some kind of recording of it so that there was a verbatim record of exactly what words were exchanged," Hood said. "We feel disadvantaged by the absence of that."

Supervisory Special Agent Stephen Kodak of the FBI's national office in Washington, D.C., acknowledged that taping is rare. Kodak read a section from the bureau's manual: "FBI policy does not prohibit recording witness statements; rather, such recordings are permissible on an extremely limited, highly selective basis, and only when authorized" by the special agent in charge.

"Have I ever seen it done in my 15 years as a street agent?" Kodak said. "No. But to say it's not authorized would be a misstatement."

The policy is based on the belief that taping, "if instituted right away, when the witness does not wish to be tape recorded, can inhibit full and frank discussion."

But Priest believes taping in major cases insures accuracy.

"Certainly," he said, "there's no question about what was said, there's no question about how it was said, and in the custodial situation, there's no argument about the circumstances of the interview. Was he properly advised of his rights? Did he waive his rights? Was there any coercion or threat involved?"

Denver police aren't alone in their position.

"The bottom line on that is documentation," said Steve Davis, spokesman for the Lakewood Police Department. "You're documenting not only what an interviewee is saying, but what your people are saying to them . whether it's reading them their rights or clarifying a question asked of a suspect, it's documented.

"There's no misinterpretation because of somebody taking notes. It's all there on tape."

Hood is likely to raise the accuracy of the FBI's report at trial. He said he does not know why the FBI rarely tapes interviews.

Not taping, he said, could give agents "more latitude" in their characterization of statements. But it also opens agents up to challenges about their accuracy.

Kodak declined to discuss the controversies that can arise.

Among those who have encountered the FBI's policy are Randy and Judy Brown, a couple who have frequently battled with authorities in the Columbine case. When they were interviewed by FBI agents, they assumed - incorrectly, it turned out - that they were being recorded.

But when the report of an hours long interview came out, the Browns questioned some of the statements. They were told there wasn't a tape.

"My advice to everyone is if you're being interviewed by the FBI, tape it yourself," Judy Brown said.

19 Named In Meth Indictment (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, March 27, 2006

Nineteen people were indicted in San Diego in an operation that allegedly used children to carry methamphetamines over the U.S.-Mexico border.

The Drug Enforcement Administration, in a release Monday, said the group led by Jorge Arreola-Gomez smuggled large amounts of methamphetamines into the United States. Among those named in indictment are Arreola, his two sisters, his wife, his mother and two brothers-in-law.

DOJ_NMG_0022645

Authorities said they seized more than 140 pounds of methamphetamine, 20 pounds of pseudoephedrine used to make methamphetamines and a large amount of U.S. currency.

Federal agents say they stopped several individuals crossing the border, including a juvenile taking 20 pounds of pseudoephedrine into Mexico and another youngster trying to sneak 8 pounds of methamphetamine into the United States. The first seizure authorities listed was last September when they netted 75 pounds of methamphetamines. The most recent arrest was March 6.

All of the defendants, 17 of whom are from California and two are from Mexico, were charged with conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, which carries a maximum sentence of life in prison and a $4 million fine. Three defendants were also charged with a firearms violation, which could result in a life-in-prison and $250,000 fine sentence.

Nineteen In Southern California Charged In Meth Smuggling Case (AP)

AP, March 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO - A Chula Vista man suspected of leading a methamphetamine trafficking ring that used juveniles to sell or smuggle the drug was in federal custody Monday after being charged in a two-count indictment, authorities said.

Jorge Arreola-Gomez was among 19 people named in the indictment unsealed Friday by the U.S. Attorney's Office alleging that the defendants used numerous couriers, many of them teenagers, to smuggle methamphetamine across the U.S.-Mexico border.

An investigation led to the seizure of more than 140 pounds of methamphetamine, more than $25,000 in cash, a firearm and 20 pounds of pseudoephedrine, a nasal decongestant authorities say is commonly used to make methamphetamine.

Among those charged were Arreola-Gomez's wife, mother, two sisters and two brothers-in-law. Most of the defendants were from Southern California, with one man identified as a Mexican national.

All 19 faced one count of conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine. Arreola-Gomez and two others also were charged with carrying a firearm during a drug trafficking crime.

The penalties range from 10 years to life in prison and fines of $250,000 to $4 million.

The defendants were scheduled to appear at a detention hearing on Wednesday, said Assistant U.S. attorney Peter Ko.

Ex-BR Officer Pleads Not Guilty, Will Remain In Jail (ADV)

Advocate, March 28, 2006

A former Baton Rouge police officer accused of drug-trafficking will remain in jail until trial.

Daryl W. Davis, 38, 18030 Manning Drive, Prairieville, pleaded innocent Monday afternoon in Baton Rouge federal court and his court-appointed attorney, John McLindon, did not request bond.

Davis is being held in West Baton Rouge Parish Prison.

A federal grand jury indicted Davis last week on one count of possession with intent to distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine.

He faces a minimum of 10 years in prison up to life if convicted as charged.

U.S. Magistrate Christine Noland said Monday that Davis likely would not have been eligible for bond anyway “because there’s such a high quantity of drugs involved.”

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents investigated Davis for more than a year before arresting him last week.

An affidavit claims investigators seized cocaine from a garbage can in his garage, as well as a loaded .38-caliber revolver, ammunition, an electric money counter and money-packaging materials from elsewhere on the property.

Davis spent 13 years on the Baton Rouge police force. He was sentenced to five years in prison in February 2001 after being convicted on one count of obstruction of justice and one count of public bribery.

Davis was arrested in 1999 and accused of stealing a cell-phone cloning device from the Police Department evidence room and selling it for $1,000 to the man from whom officers seized it.

Davis was fired when he refused to answer questions posed by Internal Affairs investigators.

Lopez's Testimony Leaves Questions (TCI)

Tucson Citizen, March 27, 2006

Lourdes Lopez's friends didn't believe everything she said.

Federal agents didn't, either.

Now, jurors will weigh Lopez's credibility when they decide whether Dr. Bradley Alan Schwartz ordered the death of Dr. Brian Stidham.

Guessing if Lopez was telling the truth about a particular issue became a game among her friends, according to testimony before the Pima County Merit System Commission last year.

Last week, Lopez swore under oath that she didn't know Schwartz had gotten a third prescription for the painkiller Vicodin in her name in August 2001.

"I had no knowledge of that, sir," Lopez told defense attorney Brick P. Storts III.

According to a July 2002 Drug Enforcement Administration report, when Lopez was asked if she knew Schwartz tried to pick up Vicodin in her name, she "answered in the affirmative."

The July 2002 admissions came after Lopez lied to the DEA about the Vicodin scam and her relationship to Schwartz.

Lopez told Storts last week that she didn't know why the DEA wanted to talk with her.

"They just said there was a matter that they needed to speak with me about," Lopez said.

"Your testimony now is that an agent asked to speak to you at the Pima County Attorney's Office, but you didn't know why they were coming," Storts asked.

"I was a deputy county attorney," Lopez said. "I assumed it was concerning one of my cases or something. They didn't say exactly what it was about. It was on my voice mail that they needed to speak with me."

Not according to the July 2002 DEA report.

"(An agent) informed Ms. Lopez that she was not a good liar. Ms. Lopez agreed, and . . . stating that she was 'caught off guard,' " the report states. "The investigators asked Ms. Lopez how she was caught off guard, when the purpose of the visit was explained in detail."

When investigators told Lopez her answers "did not make any sense," she "started to cry uncontrollably," according to the report.

In testimony last week, Lopez said she lied to the DEA "to make sure Brad would not get into trouble."

Lopez told DEA agents she would not tell Schwartz that she had talked with them.

Nine months later, Lopez told them that she did tell Schwartz about the encounter.

Lopez testified last week that she didn't lie to protect herself and that she didn't think about the repercussions to her.

She said being on the brink of a federal indictment led her to come clean with the DEA and County Attorney's Office.

County Attorney Barbara LaWall's office told Lopez to resign or else she'd be fired because of the indictment.

Licensed to practice law in 1997 after getting her degree from the University of Arizona, Lopez first worked as a prosecutor for the Pascua Yaqui Indian Reservation.

In 1999, the tribe fired her, she testified last week. She did not say why.

Lopez worked as an associate attorney for Richard Gonzales for a year after she left the County Attorney's Office in August 2002. Since then, she's been in private practice. Records show the State Bar is currently investigating her professional conduct.

Lopez met Schwartz in December 2000, when he performed eye surgery on her foster daughter. They soon struck up a friendship that turned romantic. Schwartz was still married at the time.

"But I didn't know that," Lopez testified last week.

It turned out that Schwartz, who proposed to Lopez in January 2004, the same month as his divorce, was not faithful to her either.

Women in his life included:

• Stephanie Nagel testified she met Schwartz at the end of 2003 or early 2004. Schwartz flirted and asked her out, but Nagel declined because "he wasn't my type."

• Aisha Henry, who met Schwartz in drug rehab in October 2002, testified she renewed her friendship with him in March 2004 and slept with him to spite her husband.

• Carmen Fernandez testified she met Schwartz in April 2004 and they became intimate the next month.

• Lisa Goldberg, who dined with Schwartz and alleged hit man Bruce Bigger on the night Stidham died, testified Schwartz contacted her through the Internet in April 2004 and they later dated.

Medical Marijuana Focuses On Right To Life (AP)

By David Kravets, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, March 27, 2006

PASADENA, Calif. --A lawyer for an ill California woman whose doctor says marijuana is the only medicine keeping her alive asked an appeals court Monday to prevent federal drug agents from ever arresting her.

The case, focusing on whether the gravely ill have a right to marijuana to keep them alive when legal drugs fail, is likely to reach the U.S. Supreme Court soon. Yet each time the high court has ruled on medical marijuana it has come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life.

The latest legal wrangling once again highlights the tension between the federal government, which declares marijuana an illegal controlled substance with no medical value, and the 11 states, including California and Rhode Island, allowing medical marijuana for patients with a doctor's recommendation.

"Medical cannabis is necessary for the preservation of Angel Raich's life," said Randy Barnett, the Oakland woman's lawyer. He later told the three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that, "If she obeys the law, she will die."

Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two, suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. On her doctor's advice, she uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite.

Last year, the Supreme Court came down against Raich, in what was the court's second ruling against medical marijuana since 2001. Because Congress decided marijuana was illegal under the 1970 Controlled Substances Act, the justices ruled, medical marijuana users and their suppliers could be prosecuted for breaching federal drug laws, even if they lived in a state where medical marijuana was legal.

Because of that ruling, the legal issue has narrowed to the so-called right to life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan could not guarantee to the court that Raich or other serious ill patients using medical marijuana would not be prosecuted. Over the years, the government has raided dozens of medical marijuana dispensaries, mostly in California.

Quinlivan told the judges that nobody has a right to use marijuana, and said a ruling in Raich's favor would open the floodgates to "people who want to use other substances" that are not approved for medical purposes.

Judge Harry Pregerson asked Quinlivan whether it was OK for Raich to die or succumb to "unbearable suffering."

"So go ahead and die. That would be all right?" he asked.

"Congress has made that value judgment," Quinlivan responded.

Another judge, Arlen Beam, suggested that Raich could only make a defense that marijuana is medically necessary if she's prosecuted. He said she would likely prevail by stating she was only breaking the law to stay alive.

"It seems to me, if this was a criminal prosecution," Beam told the government's lawyer, "you would lose your argument."

After the hearing, Raich said, "I think I'm gonna win."

During the 70-minute hearing, Barnett likened Raich's plight to women being allowed to have an abortion even after the fetus has become viable, if the abortion was necessary to safe the woman's life.

"This is a new argument which they have come up with," Quinlivan told the judges.

Pregerson responded, "There was nothing wrong with that." Pregerson added that "You got to go back to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That takes care of it all."

Voters in 1996 made California the first state to authorize patients to use marijuana with a doctor's recommendation. Ten other states have since followed suit, including Rhode Island this past January.

In 2001, the Supreme Court ruled that Raich's supplier, the Oakland Cannabis Buyer's Cooperative, could not lawfully dispense marijuana despite California voters approving its medical use.

DOJ_NMG_0022648

The court did not indicate when it would rule on a case that both sides expect would be appealed to the Supreme Court. The case is Raich v. Gonzales, 03-15481.

City Detective Defends Himself At Drug Trial (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan

The Baltimore Sun, March 28, 2006

One of two Baltimore narcotics detectives accused of selling illegal drugs testified at his federal trial Monday that confiscated heroin he gave to a confidential informant was part of an off-the-books, but acceptable, policing technique designed to apprehend some of the city's top drug dealers.

In front of an expectant jury who had only before heard the officer's voice on wiretap recordings, Detective William A. King answered questions from the witness stand for more than four hours. But his calm demeanor turned testy and defensive when prosecutors called his tactics criminal, leading to the most combative moments of the two-week trial.

"I never robbed anybody," King said, leaning forward in his chair, his arms crossed slightly, testifying for the first time. "I gave [an informant] drugs but in return, he gave me the information I needed."

At one point, U.S. District Judge J. Frederick Motz ordered a brief recess because the heated cross- examination of King by Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Peters had turned into a shouting match.

"Why didn't you write a report?" Peters asked King, one of many times the prosecutor hammered the officer for failing to document his activity with his sources.

King responded that only some of his drug seizures needed to be reported officially, while others could be channeled to his informants.

King's account offered the first detailed counterpoint to the complex public corruption case presented by federal prosecutors. King's attorney Edward Smith Jr. called two other witnesses -- both former city police officers -- as part of the first day of testimony from the defense.

Relying on testimony from cooperating witnesses and hours of secretly recorded conversations by the FBI, prosecutors accused King and his partner, Antonio L. Murray, of conspiring to rob and extort cocaine, heroin and marijuana -- as well as drug-related proceeds -- from suspects they pursued on city streets in late 2004 and early 2005.

King maintained that he never robbed anyone, never sold drugs for money and never brandished his weapon, as charged. He argued that prosecutors misinterpreted his taped conversations. King defended his drug enforcement strategy with informants as a "deceit" to keep them happy and productive.

He agreed that he might have broken department rules and regulations when he gave seized drugs and money to informants Antonio Mosby and Davon Mayer. Mosby earlier pleaded guilty to related drug charges and testified against King.

King called his policing tactic an "acceptable procedure," which had been tacitly approved inside the Police Department under former Commissioner Kevin P. Clark.

DOJ_NMG_0022649

Clark had created the department's beefed-up Organized Crime Division -- a unit of largely plainclothes officers that focused on undercover drug buys where Murray and King both served -- but it was de-emphasized after Clark was fired in November 2004. Mayor Martin O'Malley hired Clark from New York in 2002 to eradicate open-air drug markets.

King said that after he received training from police officials in New York, he changed the way he submitted evidence.

"Sometimes you submit the [seized drugs and money]," he said. "Sometimes you don't."

Several current police officials testified earlier in the trial on behalf of the government, saying that under no conditions would an officer be allowed to take seized drugs and hand it over to an informant as a reward.

King said he never shared the profits from the drugs he provided to his informants, and his only reward was information about large stashes of illegal drugs and high-level drug dealers, largely on the city's west side.

His take, King explained, was no take at all. He said he held the money for his informants only because they were too quick to spend their money on drugs, and he was concerned about their welfare.

If he had been a drug dealer, King argued, he would have been wealthier. King said FBI agents found $221 on the detective when they arrested him in May 2005. His bank accounts were almost dry, he owed the IRS money in back taxes and a local jeweler thousands of dollars for purchases still unpaid, according to his testimony and financial records.

King had been presented by prosecutors as a law-breaking police officer who had carved out a side business as a drug dealer. But in his testimony Monday, King, a West Baltimore native, had his first chance to tell jurors his side.

"I wanted to follow in my father's footsteps," King said Monday, describing why he wanted to become a city police officer after a stint in the Army. "I wanted to give back to the community I grew up in."

King said the training from police experts in New York was a transformational moment. King said he employed the new tactics during his successful drug busts.

His testimony is expected to continue Tuesday morning.

Report: U.K. Cheated Afghan Poppy Growers (UPI)

By GARETH HARDING, UPI Chief European Correspondent

United Press International, March 28, 2006

BRUSSELS, March 27 (UPI) -- The British government has failed to honor its pledge to compensate Afghani farmers for eradicating poppy crops, causing widespread anger in the volatile south of the country and leading to increased support for Taliban insurgents, a new report by the Senlis Council think tank claims.

Afghanistan is the world's leading producer of opium. Ninety percent of the heroin found on the streets of Europe and the United States can be traced to poppy crops in the mountains of the war-torn central Asian state.

After the Taliban government was removed by U.S. forces following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Britain was put in charge of the international community's counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan. Although thousands of acres of poppies have been destroyed, the former Soviet vassal state now produces more opium than ever.

The Senlis Council, a respected international security and development think tank with offices in Kabul, says Britain is to blame for pursuing counter-productive anti-drugs policies that have alienated local farmers and fueled support for Taliban and al-Qaida insurgents in the south of the country.

Based on interviews with farmers in the Helmand province, where 3,300 British troops will arrive over the coming months, the group claims that U.K. counter-narcotics officers promised local farmers $350 for every fifth of a hectare of poppies they destroyed.

"These farmers kept their side of the deal and eradicated their crops, but the British Government did not keep their word," said Mohammad Gull, a local representative from the Sharwali District in Helmand who was involved in the initial negotiations with the British representatives. "In our culture this is very dishonorable and we are very angry."

Gull told the Senlis Council he had over 400 checks in his possession which farmers had been unable to cash because of insufficient funds in the account. In total, the farmers allege they are owed $21 million and are planning to sue the British government for the money that was promised them.

DOJ_NMG_0022650

British soldiers have started arriving in the south of the country as part of a 21,000-strong NATO peacekeeping force that is slowly fanning out from the capital Kabul. Securing the lawless province of Helmand is key to the reconstruction process in Afghanistan, not only because it is one of the main poppy-growing regions but because of the strong Taliban presence.

The Senlis Council, which Sunday released a report on the escalating security crisis in Afghanistan, believes British troops are in for a rude reception from furious locals when they arrive.

"The farmers of Helmand province are telling us that they mistrust the British and that they are angry at not being paid as promised," said Executive Director Emmanuel Reinert. "This makes the latest British plan for securing Helmand a military and political fantasy. They will not gain support from local farmers due to the wholesale elimination of any good will for the British presence there as a result of this bad debt."

The security situation in the south of the country, where Taliban and al-Qaida forces have re-established strongholds four years after they were almost crushed by U.S. forces, has worsened dramatically in recent months. In the last year, over 1,500 people have been killed by the hardline Islamist groupings, with suicide bombings increasingly used to bring death and destruction. Most of the victims have been Afghan soldiers and civilians, but American and European troops are also being targeted with increasing frequency. Earlier this month, a roadside bomb killed four U.S. marines on patrol in eastern Afghanistan.

The security situation in the south of the country, which provoked a lengthy debate in the Netherlands about whether to send 1,200 troops to the Uruzgan province, risks becoming worse before it becomes better.

The senior Taliban commander in the Helmand province has vowed to unleash a brigade of 600 suicide bombers against the British Army when it arrives. "We are happy that they are coming to Helmand," Mullah Razayar Noorzai told Britain's Daily Telegraph newspaper. "It is both a trial and a great honor for all Muslims. We will now get a fair chance to kill them."

In a telephone interview from Kabul, Jane Francis, Director of Communication at the Senlis Council, described the security situation in the south of Afghanistan as "terrible."

"People say they are totally against the idea of Westerners coming in. There is total mistrust and they think the troops are just arriving to destroy their crops and bomb them. British soldiers will find themselves in a pretty volatile situation when they arrive in Helmand."

The Taliban has picked up support from the local population by pledging to protect the opium trade and the farmers whose livelihoods depend on the sale of poppies. "Men are coming to sign up to fight at the frontline," claimed Mullah Razayar. "Women are bringing their sons, and giving us their jewelry to sell and buy weapons to enable us to fight these infidel invaders. We have so much support here from the locals -- more, probably, than the British soldiers have back in London."

Francis believes the Afghan government and the NATO countries that enthusiastically back it are making a historical mistake by focusing on opium eradication at all costs. "It is counter-productive to take people's livelihoods away from them and not give them anything in return. It is a policy that just doesn't work."

The think tank, which also has offices in Brussels, Paris and London, favors a policy of licensing opium crops for medicinal use, as in many Western countries. If regulated strictly, the group says the policy could lead to cheaper morphine supplies for developing countries, steady incomes for Afghan farmers and less heroin in European and American cities.

The British Ministry of Defense was asked to comment on the Senlis Council's allegations of broken promises to Afghan farmers but failed to reply.

Lawmakers Call On Feds To Release Gun Data (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. -- Two federal legislators from New Jersey said Monday they will introduce proposals to once again make public data that is collected about firearms used in crimes.

Sen. Robert Menendez and Rep. Steve Rothman, both Democrats, said they would introduce legislation this week to undo restrictions on the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms' ability to share information on gun tracing with the public.

"There is absolutely no good reason to hide gun crime data from the public," Rothman said in a joint statement with Menendez. A member of the House Appropriations Committee, Rothman added that he would work to see the ATF use its resources to inform the public about gun trafficking and help prosecutors enforce the law.

DOJ_NMG_0022651

While New Jersey has some of the strictest gun control laws in the nation, ATF data from 2001 _ the last time the bureau publicly released the information _ indicated that firearms used in Garden State crimes overwhelmingly came from out of state.

The author of the amendment that Menendez and Rothman are seeking to overturn said ATF already is permitted to release that information to the public.

Chuck Knapp, a spokesman for Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., told The Associated Press on Monday that the ATF is free to release aggregate information about guns used in crimes, such as percentage breakdown of where federal registries say guns were originally sold.

Knapp said Tiahrt's concern was that names and addresses of police officers and informants could be released with the data, and that the congressman introduced information in the 2005 appropriations bill clarifying that aggregate data may be released.

Regional ATF spokesman John Hagemen, however, said that's not his understanding. A 2005 directive to his agency states: "No funds appropriated under this or any other Act with respect to any fiscal year may be used to disclose part or all of the contents of the Firearms Trace System Database maintained by the National Tracing Center of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco Firearms and Explosives."

Prosecutors in Camden County two weeks ago released ATF information to a reporter. It showed that of the 252 traceable guns used in crimes there in 2003-2004, 36 percent came from Pennsylvania, and 50 percent from the Carolinas, Florida, Virginia and Georgia.

But Hudson County Prosecutor Edward DeFazio said that data has not been forthcoming to him since the 2001 data was released.

"There was no big announcement," he said. "We don't get it in the normal course. We have to make a specific request, if you have a certain targeted investigation."

DeFazio said the information would be useful for his office and should be open to the public as well.

"It's a public right-to-know situation. This data is being compiled with taxpayer dollars. The general public should know where these guns are coming from that are flooding our cities."

ATF: "Strong Similarities" Between Colorado Bombs And One In Tennessee (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

GRAND JUNCTION, Colo. Federal investigators say "strong similarities exist between three bombs that blew up near some Colorado homes and another that exploded last month in Murfreesboro (Tennessee.)

No injuries have been reported in any of the explosions, but that hasn't diminished efforts to locate the prime suspect -- 54-year-old Robert Burke.

He was fired two years ago from the Serco Group, a British firm which operates the air traffic control tower at Walker Field Airport in Grand Junction, Colorado.

The bomb that exploded on February first in Murfreesboro was on the roof of the Serco project management office.

Federal officials say bombs placed near homes in Grand Junction went off near of Serco and Federal Aviation Administration workers.

And authorities say there's a "strong, strong similarity" among the components and makeup of all of the devices.

Anyone with information on Burke or his whereabouts is urged to contact the A-T-F at 1-888-ATF-BOMB.

Arsonist Receives 20 Years For Church Fires (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

SPARTA, Tenn. (AP) -- A man who pleaded guilty to burning two churches in a string of arsons has been sentenced to 20 years in prison.

Henry Dibrell, 48, was charged with setting fires at two predominantly black churches and five houses in Sparta, a town of 5,000 people about 75 miles southeast of Nashville. No one was hurt in the July 8 fires.

District Attorney Bill Gibson said Dibrell pleaded guilty March 16 in White County. He was sentenced to serve two consecutive 10-year sentences for the church fires.

DOJ_NMG_0022652

Dibrell also was sentenced to serve six years concurrently on the other five arson counts.

Dibrell was arrested within days of the fires after an investigation led by the FBI, federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and state bomb and arson investigators.

Investigators ruled out a racial motive. Dibrell's relatives said he was mentally ill and addicted to drugs at the time.

Dibrell had previously served time in prison for arson.

The two churches, Roberts Church of Christ and Kynette United Methodist Church, are rebuilding.

IMMIGRATION:

Bill To Broaden Immigration Law Gains In Senate (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — With Republicans deeply divided, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted on Monday to legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants and ultimately to grant them citizenship, provided that they hold jobs, pass criminal background checks, learn English and pay fines and back taxes.

The panel also voted to create a vast temporary worker program that would allow roughly 400,000 foreigners to come to the United States to work each year and would put them on a path to citizenship as well.

The legislation, which the committee sent to the full Senate on a 12-to-6 vote, represents the most sweeping effort by Congress in decades to grant legal status to illegal immigrants. If passed, it would create the largest guest worker program since the bracero program brought 4.6 million Mexican agricultural workers into the country between 1942 and 1960.

Any legislation that passes the Senate will have to be reconciled with the tough border security bill passed in December by the Republican-controlled House, which defied President Bush's call for a temporary worker plan.

The Senate panel's plan, which also includes provisions to strengthen border security, was quickly hailed by Democrats, a handful of Republicans and business leaders, as well as by the immigrant advocacy organizations and church groups that have sent tens of thousands of supporters of immigrant rights into the streets of a number of cities to push for such legislation in recent days.

But even as hundreds of religious leaders and others rallied on the grounds of the Capitol on Monday, chanting "Let our people stay!," the plan was fiercely attacked by conservative Republicans who called it nothing more than an offer of amnesty for lawbreakers. It remained unclear Monday night whether Senator Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, would allow the bill to go for a vote this week on the floor or would substitute his own bill, which focuses on border security. His aides have said that Mr. Frist, who has said he wants a vote on immigration this week, would be reluctant to move forward with legislation that did not have the backing of a majority of the Republicans on the committee.

Only 4 of the 10 Republicans on the committee supported the bill. They were the committee chairman, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, and Senators Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Mike DeWine of Ohio and Sam Brownback of Kansas. All eight Democrats on the committee voted in favor of the legislation.

The rift among Republicans on the committee reflects the deep divisions in the party as business groups push to legalize their workers and conservatives battle to stem the tide of illegal immigration. Mr. Specter acknowledged the difficulties ahead, saying, "We are making the best of a difficult situation." But he said he believed that the legislation would ultimately pass the Senate and would encourage the millions of illegal immigrants to come out of the shadows.

"We do not want to create a fugitive class in America," Mr. Specter said after the vote. "We do not want to create an underclass in America."

"I think this represents a reasonable accommodation," he said, referring to the divergent views on the panel. "It's not a majority of the majority, but it's a good number."

Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said Monday night that President Bush was "pleased to see the Senate moving forward on legislation." Mr. Bush has repeatedly called for a temporary worker program that would legalize the nation's illegal immigrants, though he has said such a plan must not include amnesty.

DOJ_NMG_0022653

"It is a difficult issue that will require compromise and tough choices, but the important thing at this point is that the process is moving forward," Mr. McClellan said.

Lawmakers central to the immigration debate acknowledged that the televised images of tens of thousands of demonstrators, waving flags and fliers, marching in opposition to tough immigration legislation helped persuade the panel to find a bipartisan compromise.

"All of those people who were demonstrating were not necessarily here illegally," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who sponsored the legalization measures with Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. Mr. Kennedy described the people who would benefit from the bill as "our neighbors," adding: "They're churchgoers. They're the shop owners down the street. They're the people we know."

The protesters were rallying in opposition to the security bill passed by the House. The House bill would, among other things, make it a federal crime to live in this country illegally, turning the millions of illegal immigrants here into felons, ineligible to win any legal status. (Currently, living in this country without authorization is a violation of civil immigration law, not criminal law.)

The legislation passed by the Judiciary Committee on Monday also emphasized border security and would nearly double the number of Border Patrol agents over the next five years, criminalize the construction of tunnels into the United States from another country and speed the deportation of illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico. But it also softened some of the tougher elements in the House legislation.

Addressing one of the most contentious issues, the panel voted to eliminate the provisions that would criminalize immigrants for living here illegally and made an amendment to protect groups and individuals from being prosecuted for offering humanitarian assistance to illegal immigrants.

Conservatives on the committee warned that the plan would generate a groundswell of opposition among ordinary Americans who had been demanding tighter controls at the border and an end to the waves of illegal immigration.

Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, said the Judiciary panel "let the American people down by passing out a blanket amnesty bill."

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, said the foreign workers would take American jobs during a recession. "Get ready for a real tough time," Mr. Kyl said, "when American workers come to your office and say, 'How did you let this happen?' "

Under the proposal, participants in the temporary worker program would have to work for six years before they could apply for a green card. Any worker who remained unemployed for 60 days or longer during those six years would be forced to leave the country. (Employers could petition for permanent residency on behalf of their employees six months after the worker entered into the program.)

The legalization plan for the nation's illegal immigrants would require those without documents to work in the United States for six years before they could apply for permanent residency. They could apply for citizenship five years after that. Immigrants would have to pay a fine, back taxes and learn English.

Mr. Graham called it an 11-year journey to citizenship.

"To me that's not amnesty," he said. "That is working for the right over an 11-year period to become a citizen. It is not a blanket pardon."

"The president believes and most of us here believe that the 11 million undocumented people are also workers," Mr. Graham said. "We couldn't get by as a nation without those workers and without those people."

Senate Committee Supports Overhaul Of Immigration Law (USAT)

By David Jackson And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Judiciary Committee gave a strong bipartisan endorsement Monday to President Bush's plans for overhauling immigration laws, opening the way for turbulent Senate floor debate.

The panel voted to expand opportunities for foreigners to work in the USA and to allow 11 million people working here illegally a chance at citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0022654

Under the Senate measure, undocumented immigrants who could prove they were in the USA by Jan. 7, 2004, would pay a $1,000 fine, undergo a background check and prove they were employed. After six years, they could apply for a green card, when they would pay another $1,000 fine and prove they had learned English.

Only then could they apply for citizenship. "They will go to the end of the line," said Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., emphasized the hurdles immigrants would have to overcome. "To me, that's not amnesty," he said, referring to opponents' charges that the approach would reward those who have entered the country illegally. "That's working for the right to become an American citizen."

Opponents were unconvinced. "It's not fair to those who have been playing by the rules," said Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz. "It will not become law."

The committee's action opened the way for full Senate debate to begin on an issue that has divided Republicans and put the president at odds with much of his party.

The panel approved the bill 12-6. All six "no" votes came from Republicans. Four Republicans and eight Democrats backed the Bush approach.

The Senate bill runs counter to a bill passed by the House of Representatives with heavy support from Republicans who oppose Bush's immigration policy. The House bill stresses enforcement and deportation rather than allowing immigrant workers to stay. Such tensions are likely to dominate the Senate debate.

The Senate committee met as protesters massed outside the U.S. Capitol to oppose the House immigration bill.

President Bush again endorsed some kind of temporary "guest worker" program to allow workers to stay in the USA. He urged a "civil and dignified" debate.

"No one should play on people's fears, or try to pit neighbors against each other," Bush said after a naturalization ceremony for 30 new U.S. citizens.

Judiciary Committee members were working against a tight deadline set by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who had said he planned to open floor debate today whether the committee produced a bill or not. Late Monday, Frist postponed the debate but left open the possibility that it could begin later today.

During its daylong session Monday, the committee approved a proposal that would add up to 400,000 slots for low-skilled guest workers who could petition for green cards after four years.

The committee also agreed to legalize 1.5 million agriculture workers. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said the farming industry "is almost entirely dependent on undocumented workers."

Other provisions of the legislation would:

•Increase visas for high-tech workers to at least 115,000 a year, up from 65,000.

•Expand detention facility space by 10,000 beds.

•Exempt from prosecution people who provide humanitarian assistance to illegal immigrants.

Many organizations that help immigrants, including the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, say the House bill could criminalize some of their charitable work.

The president, laying down his marker on immigration, said Monday that immigration changes "will require all of us in Washington to make tough choices and make compromises."

He also called for more security on the border and better enforcement of immigration laws.

Senators Back Guest Workers (WP)

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

A key Senate panel broke with the House's get-tough approach to illegal immigration yesterday and sent to the floor a broad revision of the nation's immigration laws that would provide lawful employment to millions of undocumented workers while offering work visas to hundreds of thousands of new immigrants every year.

DOJ_NMG_0022655

With bipartisan support, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 12 to 6 to side with President Bush's general approach to an immigration issue that is dividing the country, fracturing the Republican Party and ripening into one of the biggest political debates of this election year. Conservatives have loudly demanded that the government tighten control of U.S. borders and begin deporting illegal immigrants. But in recent weeks, the immigrant community has risen up in protest, marching by the hundreds of thousands to denounce what they see as draconian measures under consideration in Washington.

"There is no issue outside of civil rights that brings out the kind of emotions we have seen," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), one of the bill's primary sponsors, who called the controversy "a defining issue of our times."

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) rushed committee members to complete their work to meet a midnight deadline imposed by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who favors a tougher approach more in line with the version passed by the House last December. But once the committee had acted, Frist declined to say last night whether he would substitute the committee's legislation for his own, which includes no guest-worker program.

Frist's efforts to wrest control of the issue from the Judiciary Committee could produce a power struggle among Republicans once the majority leader brings up the issue for debate and votes in the full Senate, probably this week. Specter and the other committee leaders may have to muscle their bill through as an amendment if Frist refuses to back down.

Frist, a presidential aspirant whom Bush helped elect as majority leader, favors tightening control of the nation's borders without granting what he calls amnesty to the approximately 11 million illegal immigrants living in this country. But Bush favors a comprehensive approach, which he says must include some program to answer business's need for immigrant labor.

"Congress needs to pass a comprehensive bill that secures the border, improves interior enforcement, and creates a temporary-worker program to strengthen our security and our economy," Bush said yesterday at a ceremony to swear in 30 new U.S. citizens from 20 countries. "Completing a comprehensive bill is not going to be easy. It will require all of us in Washington to make tough choices and make compromises."

Polls indicate about 60 percent of Americans oppose guest-worker programs that would offer illegal immigrants an avenue to lawful work status, and three-quarters of the country believe the government is doing too little to secure the nation's borders.

But the immigrant community has been galvanized by what it sees as a heavy-handed crackdown on undocumented workers by Washington. The House in December rejected calls for a guest-worker program and instead approved a bill that would stiffen penalties on illegal immigrants, force businesses to run the names of each employee through federal databases to prove their legality, deploy more border agents and unmanned aerial vehicles to the nation's frontiers and build massive walls along sections of the U.S.-Mexican border.

At least 14,000 students stormed out of schools in Southern California and elsewhere yesterday, waving flags and chanting to protest congressional actions. About 100 demonstrators, including members of the clergy, appeared at the Capitol yesterday in handcuffs to object to provisions in the House bill that would make illegal immigrants into felons and criminalize humanitarian groups that feed and house them. More than a half-million marchers protested in Los Angeles on Saturday, following protests in Phoenix, Milwaukee and Philadelphia.

"The immigration debate should be conducted in a civil and dignified way," Bush said. "No one should play on people's fears, or try to pit neighbors against each other."

A confrontation between the Senate and House Republicans now appears inevitable.

"We are eager, once the Senate passes this bill, to sit down and talk with them, but there are certain fundamental principles which we simply cannot compromise on," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who cosponsored the bill that passed the Judiciary Committee largely intact last night. "It has to be a comprehensive approach. As we all know, just building walls and hiring more border patrols are not the answers to our immigration problem."

Specter, the committee chairman, had tried for weeks to find a middle ground between senators advocating a generous guest-worker program and those categorically rejecting amnesty for illegal immigrants. In the end, that search for a compromise failed because advocates of the guest-worker program had more than enough votes to overcome conservative opposition.

The panel voted to accept a bill largely patterned on the measure sponsored by Kennedy and McCain. Specter and Republican Sens. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Mike DeWine (Ohio) joined the committee's Democrats to win passage.

The panel's bill would allow the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in this country to apply for a work visa after paying back taxes and a penalty. The first three-year visa could be renewed for three more years. After four years, visa holders could apply for green cards and begin moving toward citizenship. An additional 400,000 such visas would be offered each year to workers seeking to enter the country.

Senators also accepted a proposal by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would offer 1.5 million illegal farmworkers a "blue card" visa that would legalize their status. The committee also accepted a provision by Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) that would shield humanitarian organizations from prosecution for providing more than simple emergency aid to illegal immigrants, rejecting an amendment by Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) to require humanitarian groups providing food, medical aid and advice to illegal immigrants to register with the Department of Homeland Security.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) protested that the Feinstein proposal was more focused on offering illegal immigrants a path to citizenship than meeting the labor demands of agriculture. Cornyn suggested the Judiciary Committee bill was moving toward creating a caste of second-class workers.

But Cornyn may have summed up Senate fears when he referred to energized voters protesting what they see as amnesty for people who violated the nation's laws and made a mockery of its borders.

"The American people are thinking, 'Fool me once, shame on you, fool me twice, shame on me,' " he said. "The only way we can get the confidence of the American people is to convince them we are absolutely serious about border security and law enforcement."

Immigration Fight Heats Up (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Senate committee voted Monday to create a path for some of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to become citizens without first leaving the country, and to allow additional foreign workers to enter the United States temporarily under a program that also could lead to citizenship.

With its votes, the Judiciary Committee sided with advocates of liberalized immigration laws and moved the Senate closer to a contentious fight among GOP lawmakers. A large and vocal faction of Republicans — in Congress and throughout the party — believes that illegal immigrants are lawbreakers who should not be rewarded with citizenship and that a temporary worker program would only draw more illegal workers to the country.

The fight over proposals to tighten immigration laws, which have provoked massive demonstrations in Los Angeles and elsewhere, now moves to the Senate floor; debate is expected to begin this week.

The Senate is headed into "a difficult and visceral debate," said Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.).

In a sign of how difficult passing legislation could be, the Judiciary Committee approved its immigration package even though most of its Republican members were against it. The vote was 12 to 6, with all six dissenting votes coming from Republicans; four GOP senators sided with the panel's eight Democrats to support the measure.

Monday's vote marked a victory for immigrant advocates and for President Bush, who has urged Congress for two years to create a temporary worker program but has argued against allowing those immigrants to gain citizenship.

White House reaction was upbeat.

"We are pleased to see the Senate moving forward on legislation," spokesman Scott McClellan said in a statement. "The president believes comprehensive reform is needed if we are going to have a rational, orderly and secure immigration system…. It is a difficult issue that will require compromise and tough choices, but the important thing at this point is that the process is moving forward."

The Senate panel's bill differs significantly from an overhaul of immigration laws approved last year by the House, which focused on tightening security at the border and on toughening law enforcement and did not include a temporary worker plan, a proposal that is unacceptable to many House Republicans.

The Senate panel also voted to eliminate a proposal, contained in the House legislation, that would make being an illegal immigrant a felony, rather than a civil immigration offense as it is currently.

DOJ_NMG_0022657

In addition, the Senate committee killed a measure that would have made it a felony to offer assistance to illegal immigrants other than in emergencies. That proposal had been denounced by humanitarian groups and some religious leaders, including Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles, who had said he would instruct his priests to defy it.

Supporters of the committee's bill hailed it as a comprehensive effort that includes measures to improve border security by adding technology and agents, and provisions to make it harder for businesses to hire illegal workers.

"What has passed is much tougher enforcement and a way to take the 12 million out of the shadows," Brownback said, referring to illegal immigrants already in the country.

"I think we have produced a bill that is the product of serious debate," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

One opponent on the committee, Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), said: "I voted against this committee bill because it rewards illegal immigrants and will be considered an amnesty by Americans. It will encourage further disrespect for our laws and will undercut our efforts to shore up homeland security."

The committee worked against a steady drumbeat of pressure that echoed from the White House to the marble hallways outside their hearing room.

Bush on Monday attended a naturalization ceremony for 30 new citizens, using the event to give the latest of several speeches in favor of a temporary worker program. Meanwhile, nearly 1,000 religious leaders and advocates for immigrants gathered on the West Lawn of the Capitol. Imams, preachers and rabbis led a bilingual, interfaith prayer service before marching to the panel hearing room in handcuffs to protest measures under consideration in Congress that they said were unduly harsh.

"It's clear that the majority of the legislative options on the table — and I don't use this word lightly — are immoral," said the Very Rev. Ernesto Medina, provost of the Cathedral Center of St. Paul in Los Angeles. Red-eyed but energized, the Episcopal pastor had flown overnight from his Echo Park parish to join church leaders from 38 states. "I have seen the religious community come together before, but never like this," he said, attributing their ability to get plane tickets on short notice to "some great miracles."

It was unclear whether the rallies in recent days in Los Angeles and other cities affected the Senate committee vote. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) remarked on the "peaceful demonstrations in L.A., nearly the population of my state in number. That tells us how important this [legislation] is."

Others reacted differently. "I don't think they're helpful to resolving the debate," Cornyn said of the protesters. "If anything, they could well polarize people. You in effect have people who come to our country in violation of immigration laws, demanding amnesty. Rather than making demands, they ought to be asking for fairness and a way out of their current dilemma."

Also unclear was when the Senate would take up the immigration overhaul. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had insisted earlier that Specter force his committee to complete its work by Monday so that the full Senate could begin debate today. But there were indications that Frist would not schedule debate until later in the week. A potential presidential candidate in 2008, Frist has proposed his own immigration bill, which does not include a guest-worker plan and emphasizes border security and improved enforcement of immigration law.

In contrast, the committee bill would allow up to 400,000 new visas annually for foreign workers to enter the United States for three years. The visas could be renewed once for a total stay of six years. The program would allow visas for the worker's family and a path to permanent resident status if the immigrant learned English, among other requirements.

Obtaining permanent resident status, also known as obtaining a green card, is a step toward citizenship under current law.

The plan was proposed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who has been working closely with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Under the bill, immigrants who already are awaiting a green card would be considered ahead of those who enter the United States and apply under the new guest-worker program.

The committee approved an additional guest-worker program sponsored by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) intended exclusively for agricultural workers. It would offer 1.5 million "blue cards" to workers who would have to work in the fields for at least 100 days a year and at most 150. Those who did so and met other requirements could apply for permanent residency.

DOJ_NMG_0022658

"The thrust of this proposal is to create a legalized workforce for the agriculture industry," Feinstein said. The program would end after five years.

Some of the most intense debate among panel members came over the fate of the 12 million undocumented workers already in the United States. One proposal had allowed them to indefinitely renew special visas, called "gold cards," that would permit work and residency in the United States for as long as they liked. It would not have allowed them to become citizens.

But the committee instead adopted an amendment sponsored by Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) that would allow illegal immigrants to start on a path to citizenship by registering, paying a fine, getting fingerprinted and learning English, among other requirements.

"Now there's a rough draft of a workable bill going to the floor of the Senate. The question now is what Frist will do," said Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute, a pro-business think tank that backs a guest-worker program. "It's hard for me to imagine how Sen. Frist could ignore this product coming out of the committee."

Those who voted in favor of the bill were Republicans Graham, Brownback, Specter and Mike DeWine of Ohio, and Democrats Leahy, Kennedy, Feinstein, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Herb Kohl and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, Charles E. Schumer of New York and Richard J. Durbin of Illinois.

Voting against the bill were Republicans Cornyn, Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, Jon Kyl of Arizona, Jeff Sessions of Alabama and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma.

Senate Panel Approves Immigration Bill (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, March 27, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved sweeping election-year immigration legislation Monday that clears the way for 11 million illegal aliens to seek U.S. citizenship without having to first leave the country.

After days of street demonstrations that stretched from California to the grounds of the U.S. Capitol, a coalition of Democrats and Republicans also agreed to strip out proposed criminal penalties for residents found to be in this country illegally.

"All Americans wanted fairness and they got it this evening," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), the Massachusetts Democrat who played a pivotal role in drafting the legislation.

The 12-6 vote was unusual, with a majority of Republicans opposed to the measure even though their party controls the Senate.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., voted for the bill but signaled that some of the provisions could well be changed by the full Senate once debate begins there Tuesday.

In general, the bill is designed to strengthen the Border Patrol, create new opportunities for so-called guest workers and determine the legal future of the estimated 11 million immigrants living in the United States illegally.

At several critical points, committee Democrats showed unity while Republicans splintered. In general, GOP Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike DeWine of Ohio, who is seeking re-election this fall, sided with Democrats. That created a majority that allowed them to shape the bill to their liking.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., won approval for a five-year program to permit as many as 1.5 million agriculture workers into the country. "It will provide the agriculture industry with a legal work force and offer agriculture workers a path to citizenship," she said. The vote was 11-5, with Republicans casting all the votes in opposition.

In addition, Kennedy prevailed on a proposal to allow an additional 400,000 green cards for future immigrants, regardless of the industry where they find jobs.

Sen. Jon Kyl (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., and other conservatives said anything but a requirement for illegal immigrants to return home amounted to amnesty, and he said he had national opinion on his side.

"Well over 60 percent of Americans in all the polls I see think it's OK to have temporary workers, but you do not have to make them citizens," said Kyl, who is seeking re-election this fall.

"We have a fundamental difference between the way you look at them and the way I look at them," Kennedy observed later.

DOJ_NMG_0022659

The committee met as several thousand demonstrators rallied at the foot of the Capitol. Many were members of the clergy who donned handcuffs and sang "We Shall Overcome," the unofficial anthem of the civil rights era.

"The first Christian value is love thy neighbor," read some of the signs.

After a weekend of enormous rallies — as many as 500,000 in Los Angeles — thousands of students walked out of class in California and Texas to protest proposals in Congress to crack down on illegal immigrants.

In Detroit, protesters waved Mexican flags as they marched to a downtown federal office building.

"Do you see the community? Do you see how many people didn't go to work today," asked Janet Padron, a 22-year-old resident of Allen Park Mich.

Her remark underscored one of the complexities confronting Congress and the Bush administration as they grapple with the issue of immigration.

Senators on all sides of the issue agreed that illegal workers hold thousands of jobs that otherwise would go unfilled at the wages offered.

The agriculture industry is "almost entirely dependent on undocumented workers," said Feinstein. "It is unrealistic to think the workers will go home because they work here and the agriculture industry is dependent on them."

In purely political terms, the issue threatened to fracture Republicans as they head into the midterm election campaign — one group eager to make labor readily available for low-wage jobs in industries such as agriculture, construction and meatpacking, the other determined to place a higher emphasis on law enforcement.

That was a split Bush was hoping to avoid after a political career spent building support for himself and his party from the fast-growing Hispanic population.

"America should not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society," said the president. "We can be both at the same time."

Bush has said he favors a guest worker program, but it is unclear whether the administration would insist on a provision to require illegal immigrants already in the country to return home before they are allowed to apply for citizenship.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., chairman of the committee, said he was "trying to thread the needle" to produce a bill that could command widespread support.

At one point, he outlined a proposed compromise on illegal immigrants and citizenship. Neither Kyl nor Kennedy sounded supportive, though, and it receded as the debate continued.

The panel agreed with ease to double the size of the Border Patrol over the next several years, and decided on a closer vote to make sure that humanitarian organizations are sheltered from prosecution if they provide non-emergency assistance to illegal residents.

Whatever the outcome of the committee's debate the prospects for legislation clearing Congress before the elections did not appear strong. The House has cleared legislation that consists of provisions to toughen enforcement against violators of immigration laws. It contains no guest worker program.

Immigration Reform Can't Reward Illegal Behavior (HC)

By Sens. John Cornyn And Jon Kyl

Houston Chronicle, March 28, 2006

The U.S. Senate has begun its debate to improve border security and reform immigration laws — one of the most urgent priorities to be considered this year.

It is critical that any solution restore respect for the law and provide sufficient resources to control the border. And because there can be no amnesty, reform must not reward illegal activity.

Last summer, we introduced the Comprehensive Enforcement and Immigration Reform Act of 2005, which would dramatically bolster our border enforcement and comprehensively reform our immigration system.

The need for reform is clear. Today, there are approximately 12 million illegal aliens in the United States. Approximately 40 percent have arrived here since 9/11. This is unacceptable. U.S. national security demands that we know who is entering our country, and our sovereignty requires that we have control over our borders; we therefore believe that any comprehensive reform proposal must be based on the following principles:

•Border security is the No. 1 priority. The men and women who secure the border at the ports of entry and in remote locations should be commended for the job they do every day. But they do not have the necessary resources or tools to effectively control the border. Through a combination of physical barriers in high-traffic areas, increased technology and additional Border Patrol agents, the Department of Homeland Security must apprehend and deport every illegal alien caught at the border.

•Border security and interior enforcement go hand in hand. Approximately one-third of the current illegal population first entered the United States legally, then stayed after their visas expired. So immigration reform must enable the government to apprehend, detain and deport illegal aliens who are caught inside the country. State and local law enforcement officials must be allowed to support the federal government in identifying illegal aliens; and, special emphasis must be placed on deporting criminal illegal aliens who already fill U.S. prisons.

Employer accountability will protect U.S. worker wages and create a level playing field. Immigration reform will certainly fail if an underground workforce is allowed to exist. Every employer must be required to verify whether a new hire is legal, but the U.S. government must be responsible for providing the tools an employer needs to comply with the law.

The magnet of illegal employment can be eliminated through more secure documents and a quick electronic verification system, not unlike the one used by businesses every day for credit card transactions.

For security reasons, it would be irresponsible to ignore the 12 million illegal aliens already in the United States. But we cannot grant them amnesty. While many contribute to our work force, they must do so within the law.

The Cornyn-Kyl bill would require illegal aliens to come forward and register, but offers no reward for breaking the law. Workers would have five years to depart the country, and then be allowed to return in any legal status. The objective is not to strand workers outside the country or disrupt businesses, but to recognize that permanent resident status and citizenship are very special benefits and all immigrants who receive them should be asked to enter legally and go through the same process.

There are no simple solutions to the issue of immigration reform. But one thing is clear: Immigration reform ultimately must be about legal immigration — not creating a new process that only benefits illegal aliens. Immigrants must abide by the rule of law and receive equal treatment.

We hope to build consensus around reform that will restore integrity to our immigration system and meet the needs of society, the economy and national security.

Cornyn, R-Texas, is chairman of the Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship subcommittee. Kyl, R-Ariz., is chairman of the Terrorism, Technology and Homeland Security subcommittee. Together, their states represent 80 percent of the southern border.

Panel OKs 'Amnesty' Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee last night approved a plan that would put millions of illegal aliens on a path to U.S. citizenship, would let them stay here while applying and would not punish their unlawful entry as a felony, contrary to a House-passed bill.

"A path to earned citizenship is what this bill is all about," Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said after joining all Democrats and three other Republicans on the panel to approve the plan, which many consider an "amnesty."

The sudden approval -- after weeks of negotiations that often had appeared fruitless -- likely will lead to a showdown with the House, which last year approved an immigration bill that only tightened border security.

"If the bottom line is that all people that came here illegally have got to be made citizens, then we should have the vote now," Sen. Jon Kyl, the Arizona Republican who fought the proposal, said in the seven-hour committee meeting yesterday.

"That's amnesty, and that won't work. And the House won't even go to conference with something like that," he said.

The plan approved by the committee -- taken from a bill written by Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat -- would fine current illegal aliens $2,000 each. The bill also would require aliens to undergo criminal background checks and mandate that they maintain employment over the six years they wait to get in line for full citizenship, a process which takes several more years.

"All Americans wanted fairness, and they got it this evening," Mr. Kennedy said after the vote last night.

Many House Republicans -- and most U.S. voters -- oppose any new immigration legislation until the borders are secured and existing immigration laws are enforced. The vast differences between the House bill and the Senate Judiciary Committee proposal must be worked out before any legislation can go to President Bush for his signature.

It was still not clear last night whether the bill would even make it to the floor of the Senate, which yesterday began debating legislation offered by Majority Leader Bill Frist that bypasses the Judiciary Committee and deals only with border security.

"A nation that can't secure its borders can't secure its destiny or administer its laws," said Mr. Frist, who introduced his bill yesterday. "And the situation along our southern border now ranks as a national security challenge second only to the war on terror."

Mr. Frist's "Securing America's Borders Act" would hire more border-patrol officers, build limited fencing in high-traffic areas and toughen the penalties for being in the U.S. illegally. The bill does not, however, have the guest-worker provisions included in the committee bill.

The Tennessee Republican -- is widely expected to seek his party's nomination for president -- has made clear to the Judiciary Committee that he would not consider adopting any guest-worker or "amnesty" provisions that didn't garner a majority of the Republican vote in committee.

The panel proposal failed to get that majority, but Mr. Frist said yesterday that he hasn't decided whether he will consider the committee's bill. He was in negotiations last night with committee Chairman Arlen Specter and other panel members.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, has implored Mr. Frist to take whatever the committee approves and has threatened filibusters if the Republican leader bypassed the committee with his security-only bill.

"We need comprehensive immigration reform that secures our borders, protects Americans and addresses the 11 million undocumented immigrants currently living here today," Mr. Reid said yesterday. "I congratulate Chairman Specter, Ranking Member [Patrick J.] Leahy and the Judiciary Committee for reporting out a bipartisan bill today that does just that. I hope Senator Frist will immediately substitute this comprehensive approach for his wrongheaded bill as the full Senate begins debate tomorrow."

In addition to Mr. Specter and Mr. Graham, Republican Sens. Mike DeWine of Ohio and Sam Brownback of Kansas supported the committee proposal.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, the Utah Republican who faces a tough primary fight this year, missed yesterday's vote.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who has led the fight against illegal immigration, said the committee's proposal "provides nearly universal amnesty" for the more than 11 million illegal aliens in the U.S. and adds hundreds of thousands of foreign workers to a background-check system that is "already on the brink of collapse."

"If the Senate follows the Judiciary Committee's lead, the prospects of getting a reform bill to the president's desk this year are slim, to say the least," he said.

"No plan with amnesty and a massive increase in foreign workers will pass the House. Amnesty and foreign workers are fundamentally incompatible with the House's approach and, according to every recent poll, they are not what Americans want. Americans want enforcement first, and disagreement over foreign workers should not prevent us from securing our borders," he said.

Senate Committee Supports Guest-worker Program For Immigrants (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate Judiciary Committee, rushing to craft a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws, voted Monday to create a guest-worker program that would admit up to 400,000 low-skilled foreigners a year.

DOJ_NMG_0022662

The workers could stay up to six years, then they'd have to return home unless they'd petitioned and been accepted for permanent residency and eventual U.S. citizenship. The panel approved those terms in an amendment sponsored by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

The committee also agreed to a pilot program that would allow 1.5 million undocumented immigrants over a five-year period to hold agricultural jobs under temporary visas. They, too, could apply for green cards to become permanent residents. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said that program would ensure a source of legal workers for thousands of agricultural jobs now largely held by undocumented workers drawing low wages.

With Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., pressing to finish a bill before the full Senate plunges into the immigration debate Tuesday, the panel struggled to find middle ground between those calling for tougher enforcement and pro-immigrant groups who seek to protect the estimated 12 million aliens now in the United States illegally.

The panel approved an amendment by Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., to shield church and charitable groups from criminal prosecution for providing aid to illegal immigrants, rejecting a more hard-line approach in a bill that the House of Representatives passed.

It also voted to nearly double the number of border patrol agents, calling for 12,000 more over the next five years, to bring the force to 23,000.

At one point, Specter unveiled a "potential, theoretical" compromise that offered a path to permanent residency for many - but not all - illegal aliens who met certain conditions. But he dropped it after finding few takers.

"It was worth the effort, but it's not going to come to fruition," Specter lamented, underscoring the immense challenge of trying to find accord on a volatile issue that's dividing Congress and the American people.

Nearly 60 percent of U.S. citizens oppose allowing illegal aliens to apply for legal temporary-worker status, according an NBC News-Wall Journal Street poll. A Time survey found that three-fourths of Americans favor more border safeguards.

Continuing a chain of recent massive demonstrations across America, several thousand immigrants and activists gathered at the sunlit West Front of the Capitol to demand greater legal protections and denounce the House bill, which that threatens illegal immigrants with felony prison sentences.

Demonstrators joined hands to sing "We Shall Overcome," the anthem from America's civil rights protests, and brandished signs proclaiming "We are America" and "We are all immigrants." Many were undocumented immigrants who spoke little or no English.

Specter's committee had one day to finish its work under a deadline imposed by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who planned to start Senate debate with his own measure - a tough border-enforcement plan - if Judiciary didn't produce a more comprehensive proposal by the start of business Tuesday.

Kennedy's amendment was drawn from a comprehensive bill that he's sponsoring with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. Their bill, which a broad coalition of immigrant advocacy groups and business organizations embraces, would enable illegal immigrants now in the U.S. to apply for permanent residency and citizenship after paying fines and fees totaling $2,000 and meeting other conditions.

Under the guest-worker plan, foreigners must pay fees of up to $500 and show that they have U.S. jobs waiting. They would receive three-year visas, which could be renewed for another three years. After four years, they could apply for green cards.

Feinstein's proposal would allow undocumented immigrants who've worked in the United States two years to obtain "blue cards," which would enable them to work legally in agricultural jobs for three to five years. They could apply for green cards after paying $500 fines and back taxes.

President Bush, calling immigration one of the most important issues of his presidency, is urging Congress to enact a three-pronged approach comprising improved border security, aggressive enforcement at the workplace and a guest-worker program to give U.S. business a steady supply of low-skilled workers.

Bush hasn't fully defined his plan, but administration officials have said his guest-worker plan would cover both foreigners who want to come to the U.S. to work and aliens now in the country illegally, provided they pay substantial fines and meet other conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0022663

The president underscored his demand for revisions in a speech Monday before several dozen newly naturalized citizens in Washington.

"Completing a comprehensive bill is not going to be easy," he said. "It will require all of us in Washington to make tough choices and compromises. And that is exactly what the American people sent us here to."

Tougher Enforcement May Jeopardize Support (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

Both Republicans and Democrats risk alienating coveted supporters as they attempt to find the right balance between toughening enforcement and expanding legal opportunities for millions of low-skill foreign workers to take jobs in the United States.

As the Senate begins debate on revamping the nation's immigration laws, the issue poses multiple challenges for both political parties, while offering no clearly expedient solution. Two huge electoral prizes, the Southwest and Florida, are potentially up for grabs, as are millions of Hispanic votes elsewhere. But also in play are the votes of angry residents in border states and beyond who feel overwhelmed by the rising tide of illegal immigration.

"In some ways, the rhetoric of this debate is as important politically as the policy that eventually emerges," said Roberto Suro, director of the Pew Hispanic Center, a Washington research organization. "If there is an impression that the leadership of one party or another is really harsh and punitive, you open up possibilities."

A sudden spate of rallies on the streets of Phoenix, Los Angeles, Detroit and elsewhere -- all in protest of a possible federal crackdown on illegal workers -- suggests that immigration may be an issue that galvanizes this increasingly vital, but difficult to reach voting bloc.

Immigration has mobilized Hispanic voters in the past, most notably in California after the 1994 passage of Proposition 187, a voter initiative to cut off public services for illegal immigrants. Enactment of the law was blocked by the courts, but the fact that then-Republican Gov. Pete Wilson supported the measure swung California's huge Hispanic vote firmly into the Democratic camp for years.

At the same time, however, lawmakers face the potential ire of voters who want more done to crack down on the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants now in the country. The problem led Democratic governors in both Arizona and New Mexico to declare states of emergency in counties along the border with Mexico to combat illegal immigration. Talking points circulating among Democrats on Capitol Hill stress, "if you do not seem credible on enforcement, you may lose credibility which will jeopardize other components of immigration reform."

Tougher enforcement is an idea that resonates among frustrated voters, particularly in parts of the country where public services including schools and hospitals are strained by the influx of new residents. In 2004, Arizona voters ratified a ballot initiative similar to 187, despite the opposition of Gov. Janet Napolitano, a popular Democrat, and Sen. John McCain, a popular Republican.

Views on immigration break into two camps. At one end are law-and-order types, mostly conservative Republicans, who want to tighten border security and step up enforcement against illegal workers. The business community, the Roman Catholic Church, many Republicans and most Democrats occupy the other camp -- joined, notably, by President Bush. Although they generally support tougher enforcement, they also want to change federal law to allow illegal workers to gain legal status so they can continue to fill many low-skill jobs that they believe would otherwise go vacant. Moreover, they say, welcoming outsiders is a core American ideal.

"Each generation of immigrants brings a renewal to our national character and adds vitality to our culture," Bush said in a speech yesterday. "Newcomers have a special way of appreciating the opportunities of America, and when they seize those opportunities, our whole nation benefits."

But Bush's position has split Republicans. Former White House aide David Frum, writing on the Web site of the National Review, said of the president's proposal: "His version of immigration reform can only pass Congress with Democratic votes, and there is zero possibility that the Democrats will help him -- but every likelihood that they will egg him on to incite a Republican civil war on the issue that most bitterly divides the president's party."

The competing camps on overhauling immigration laws do not break down along the usual ideological or regional lines. In Arizona, for instance, the two Republican senators -- Jon Kyl and McCain -- both consider themselves conservatives. But McCain champions a bill that includes the guest-worker program Bush has outlined, which would allow participants to apply for legal residency without returning to their home countries. The bill also would substantially increase the number of green cards, granting permanent U.S. residency to low-skill workers.

Kyl, meanwhile, supports a guest-worker program but would provide no avenue for citizenship and would force workers to go home for a year before reapplying. He also wants to build fences in urban areas, hire more border control agents and crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants, to get a handle on illegal immigration.

Kyl's view is that the current economic pressures for immigrant labor could subside in the future, costing legal American workers jobs. "Get ready for a real tough time when American workers come to your office and say, 'How did you let this happen?' " he admonished colleagues on the Judiciary Committee as they debated the bill yesterday.

Many advocates believe that any successful legislation would have to bridge both camps. "I don't believe this is a zero-sum issue for us," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. "It is absolutely possible for us to be pro-immigrant and pro-law enforcement."

Brent A. Wilkes, national executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, an advocacy group, said a balanced approach is the only one that would be accepted by much of the Hispanic community.

"The average Latino immigrant cannot understand why if they work hard and play by the rules, they can't be treated like previous immigrants and be given a legal avenue to come here." Members of both parties believe that at the root of the immigration debate is a fear among voters that illegal immigration is a piece of a bigger, more threatening force: a loss of control over national security as a result of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. What "motivates most Americans is the border insecurity problem that we have," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), who is trying to thread the needle between the two camps.

Democrats have mostly stood back from the debate and allowed the warring Republican factions to simmer. Documents circulating among senior Democratic Senate staffers note that Republican voters view immigration as a much bigger problem than do Democrats.

The Senate is expected to debate the immigration bill for two weeks -- an exceptionally long time for legislation, particularly in an election year, and only the beginning of a long road of negotiations with the House, which passed legislation cracking down on illegal immigrants but offering no guest-worker program.

The tenor and time allotted to the debate reflect a broad consensus that immigration is one of the most urgent and fundamental issues confronting Congress. "This is a complex problem," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.). "Where is home and where do we want home to be?"

GOP To Stress Immigration Reform (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, March 28, 2006

With Senate Republicans debating the next course of action on immigration reform, GOP leaders in the House are hoping to get out in front on the issue by reminding voters that they have already passed a series of tough bills to crack down in illegal immigration.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is expected to address immigration reform in a speech later this week before the National Urban League, and the Republican Conference office has distributed talking points lauding border-security legislation that has passed the House.

"Our message in this debate is that the House passed a border-security bill with the understanding that America is a nation of immigrants, a nation at war and a nation of laws," Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said. "This is a complex issue, and the House looks forward to working with the Senate and the administration as the process moves forward."

The recent political maneuvering illustrates the political difficulties facing members of both chambers on how to update the current immigration laws, with the Senate expected to vote on its bill later this week.

Reform is particularly difficult for Republicans because the president's proposal to expand current guest-worker programs would include a path to citizenship for undocumented workers already in the country, angering many conservative-base voters who argue that these workers are taking jobs from citizens born in the United States.

Guest-worker advocates took to the streets in large numbers this past weekend, holding sizable rallies in cities across the country to protest the move toward tougher enforcement. On the other side, guest-worker opponents have overwhelmed congressional offices with e-mails, letters and phone calls.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) gave members of the Judiciary Committee until last night to work out a compromise on guest-worker legislation before he would bring his own enforcement-only bill to the floor as a replacement.

The House Republican Conference office distributed talking points to press staff last Friday about the Real ID Act and the border-security bill that House members approved late last year, conference spokeswoman Gretchen Hamel said. The goal is to remind members and their staffs about the bills the House has passed as grassroots groups on both sides of the debate continue flooding offices on Capitol Hill with telephone calls.

In addition, the House Republicans' theme of the week is "Securing our Borders" and members have been encouraged to hold one-minute speeches and special orders on the floor.

Immigration reform divides more along geographic lines than partisan ones, but Democrats last year agreed, in principle, that any major overhaul should be comprehensive and include a guest-worker program in addition to enhanced border security.

In a nominally unrelated event that echoes the immigration debate, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) are scheduled to hold a press conference tomorrow afternoon at Union Station to unveil their own comprehensive national-security plan, titled "Real Security."

Hastert is expected to address immigration and border security in his speech to the National Urban League on Thursday, Bonjean said.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) is also expected to address immigration during his weekly press briefing this afternoon, according to a spokesman. Boehner is supportive of the tougher enforcement penalties, but he voted against a House version of the bill late last year because he felt the employer-verification program places an unnecessary burden on small-business owners.

If legislation emerges from the Senate, advocates on both sides of the issue will pay close attention to those members named to the House-Senate negotiations as an indication about the direction a final bill might be headed.

The initial strategy was for House leaders to marry their enforcement-only bill to the Senate's guest-worker compromise, but the gulf between the two camps has made compromise extraordinarily difficult.

Senate Panel Clears Immigration Bill (WSJ)

By June Kronholz

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Against a backdrop of massive demonstrations by immigration advocates and pressure from the White House, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved legislation to create two guest-worker programs and a plan for legalizing the status of millions of immigrants now in the country illegally.

The measure is the most generous of several immigration proposals before the panel, and passed with the support of committee Democrats and some of the Senate's most conservative Republicans.

In accepting the measure, which among other things offers guest workers the chance to eventually become U.S. citizens, senators rejected another bill sponsored by two border-state Republicans that would have required guest workers and illegal immigrants to eventually return home.

The bill passed only hours after President Bush made his strongest appeal yet for a law that would provide employers with enough immigrant workers to keep the economy humming. Appearing at a naturalization ceremony for new citizens, Mr. Bush attempted to head off arguments within his party that a border-security law must come before any effort to help immigrants or their employers.

He called a temporary-worker program "vital to securing our border" by providing a legal channel for workers and freeing up border agents to patrol for criminals and terrorists.

Even with the president's backing, though, immigration overhaul faces an uphill fight this week when it reaches the Senate floor, where Majority Leader Bill Frist may bring up a tough workplace-enforcement and border-security measure. Democrats said they might try to block the Frist bill on a procedural vote today unless it is broadened.

Any measure that passes the Senate must then be reconciled with a House bill -- pushed through by the Republican leadership -- that requires the government to build a fence across the U.S.-Mexican border and makes felons of illegal immigrants now in the country. House leaders have said they won't accept a compromise bill that includes a guest-worker program or deals with current illegal immigrants.

The Senate-passed measure is largely based on language offered by John McCain, an Arizona Republican, and Edward Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat. Their temporary-worker plan, passed on an 11-6 vote, would grant visas to 400,000 immigrants a year initially. They would be able to bargain for wages, change jobs, unionize and would be allowed to travel home and return.

Separately, the committee passed a pilot guest-worker plan for agriculture workers that would be capped at 1.5 million workers and cut off after five years. That measure was passed at the insistence of California Democrat Dianne Feinstein, who said she feared that workers admitted under a general guest-worker program would spurn farm jobs for easier work in service or construction industries.

The committee also deferred to the McCain-Kennedy bill in its plan for dealing with an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants now in the country. Those people would have to pay a $1,000 penalty, pass a background check and get a work permit in order to stay in the U.S.

Those who worked for six years could apply for a five-year extension and after that, permanent residency and eventual citizenship, by paying another penalty and proving they have paid their taxes, held a job, are learning English and haven't committed any deportable crimes.

Republicans have been sensitive to charges that any measure that offers legal status to those who entered the country illegally is an amnesty -- an argument that's certain to roil floor debate. But South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham, among others, insisted "it is not a blanket pardon. You have to work for it....That's what America is about."

The committee left the key issue of worker verification to be hammered out on the Senate floor. That measure, requiring employers to check the identity of new workers against Social Security and Department of Homeland Security databases, ran into a jurisdiction squabble with the Finance Committee.

Bush Defends Role Of Migrant Workers (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Edward Alden

Financial Times, March 28, 2006

President George W. Bush on Monday issued a strong defence of the role of immigrants in American history as he warned legislators not to “play on people’s fears or try to pit neighbours against each other” in the intensifying debate about immigration reform.

“We have a chance to move beyond tired choices and the harsh attitudes of the past,” Mr Bush said at a naturalisation ceremony for 30 new US citizens in Washington. “Creating a comprehensive bill is not going to be easy. It will require all of us in Washington to make tough choices and make compromises.”

Mr Bush has proposed tightening border security alongside a guest worker programme to address the problem of the 12m illegal immigrants in the US, a proposal that has exposed sharp divisions within the Republican party.

The Republican-controlled House of Representatives last year approved a bill that would crack down on illegal immigration without offering new channels for legal workers.

DOJ_NMG_0022667

The Senate judiciary committee on Monday night approved legislation, by a 12-8 vote, that will be debated by the full Senate this week. The bill was approved despite opposition from several Republicans on the committee. Some Republicans, including Senate majority leader Bill Frist, favour a bill focused narrowly on border security

But on the key issue of guest workers, the judiciary committee sided with the president, on Monday approving an amendment offered by Senator Edward Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat, that would allow up to 400,000 temporary workers into the country each year, and offer them a path to permanent citizenship.

That provision is also supported by Republican Senator John McCain, a 2008 presidential hopeful.

But the committee also pledged to beef up enforcement by hiring as many as 14,000 additional border patrol agents over the next five years and increasing detention facilities for those caught in the country illegally.

Mr Bush has argued that increased security cannot succeed without a new guest worker provision.

"A temporary guest worker programme is vital to securing our border," he said on Monday. "By creating a separate legal channel for those entering America to do an honest day's labour, we would dramatically reduce the number of people trying to sneak back and forth across the border."

Immigration reform was initially put on the agenda by Mr Bush's advisers as a way of attracting Hispanic voters, helping to forge a permanent Republican majority. The House bill, however, has threatened to alienate Hispanics in November's congressional elections.

According to the Pew Hispanic Research Centre, about 7.2m of unauthorised migrants are employed, representing 4.9 per cent of the workforce. Mr Bush noted on Monday that many foreign workers "fill the jobs that Americans are unwilling to do".

Later this week Mr Bush will meet Vicente Fox, president of Mexico, in Cancún, where immigration will be discussed.

Bush Asks Congress To Boost Green Cards (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

President Bush yesterday told Congress to increase legal immigration and temporary visas as part of the debate over illegal aliens and enforcement.

"I've called on Congress to increase the number of green cards that can lead to citizenship," Mr. Bush said. "I support increasing the number of visas available for foreign-born workers in highly skilled fields like science, medicine and technology."

At a naturalization ceremony, Mr. Bush also made a strong statement against amnesty, telling 30 new citizens at DAR Constitution Hall that it would be unfair to them to let illegal aliens jump the line for citizenship.

"All of you are here because you followed the rules, and you waited your turn in the citizenship line," Mr. Bush said. "Yet some violate our immigration laws and enter our country illegally, and that undermines the system for all of us."

Mr. Bush wants to shape the immigration debate on Capitol Hill, but he is walking a fine line. He wants a temporary-worker program but no special path to citizenship for illegal aliens.

"Granting amnesty would be unfair, because it would allow those who break the law to jump ahead of people like you all, people who play by the rules and have waited in the line for citizenship," he told those who took the oath of citizenship.

The president first called for more green cards in 2004 when he announced his guest-worker proposal. Green cards signify permanent legal residence and are the key intermediate step toward citizenship.

Mr. Bush has not said how big an increase he seeks.

The House passed an immigration bill last year that deals only with enforcement. The Senate begins its immigration debate today.

Yesterday evening, the Senate Judiciary Committee cleared a bill that would legalize almost all illegal aliens in a multistep path to citizenship and increase yearly legal immigration by hundreds of thousands of people.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan would not say whether Mr. Bush would veto a bill that addresses only border security.

"It's way too early to jump ahead in the legislative process," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0022668

Mr. Bush last week told proponents of a guest-worker plan that he expects to have the most influence on the debate when the House and Senate go to conference on their bills.

For now, Mr. Bush's tactic has been to highlight the accomplishments of immigrants. The naturalization ceremony gave him and other top administration officials a chance to do that.

Emilio T. Gonzalez, director of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, administered the oath, and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales helped present naturalization certificates.

"Today we all leave this great building as equal citizens," Mr. Gonzalez said. "There is nothing more valuable than your American citizenship. Cherish it, nourish it, promote it and defend it."

All 30 new citizens were from Virginia, which is part of the Washington district. No D.C. residents took part because, as a federal territory, D.C. residents must be administered the oath by a federal judge.

Protests Go On In Several Cities As Panel Acts (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — Tens of thousands of immigrants here and in several other cities continued a wave of angry protests on Monday over Congressional proposals to arrest illegal immigrants and to fortify the Mexican border.

In Los Angeles, about 22,000 mostly Hispanic students walked out of school. As some 2,000 gathered at City Hall, others marched through the streets chanting, "We are not criminals!" Students elsewhere in the Los Angeles area, including the communities of Inglewood, Alhambra and Montebello, followed suit.

In San Francisco, about 1,000 demonstrators marched to the offices of Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which later on Monday approved an overhaul far more favorable to illegal immigrants than a measure already passed by the House.

About 4,000 people turned out for a rally in Detroit, where Hispanic business owners closed their shops in protest. A crowd of several hundred Hispanic immigrants rallied on Boston Common.

The protests, having first flared late last week, spread Monday to the Capitol as the Judiciary Committee worked on its version of the legislation. As approved later in the day, the bill, contrary to the House measure, would not make illegal immigration a felony and in fact would clear the way to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants already in the country.

About 1,000 demonstrators gathered on the west lawn of the Capitol as clerics of many faiths denounced a House provision that would make it a crime to give aid to illegal immigrants. The crowd cheered at the news that this provision had been stricken from the Senate bill. But about 100 of the clerics, who had bound themselves with plastic handcuffs, marched to a Senate office building and chanted, "Let our people stay!"

The continuing demonstrations underscored the stakes for illegal immigrants in whatever legislation emerges from Congress. Some conservative commentators, on the other hand, have argued that the protests reflect the kind of social disorder they fear illegal immigration brings.

Massive Student Walkout Spreads Across Southland (LAT)

By Cynthia H. Cho And Anna Gorman

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

Nearly 40,000 students from across Southern California staged walkouts to protest proposed immigration legislation Monday, blocking traffic on four freeways and leaving educators concerned about how much longer the issue will disrupt schools.

The protests are believed to eclipse in size the demonstrations that occurred during the anti-Proposition 187 campaign in 1994 and even a famous student walkout for Chicano rights in 1968.

Some principals put their schools on lockdown Monday to keep students from leaving campus, and Los Angeles Unified School District officials said all middle and high schools will be on lockdown today.

Monday's demonstrations appeared to start in Los Angeles but quickly spread to San Diego, Riverside, San Bernardino, Orange and Ventura counties. Though the protests were mostly peaceful, there were a few clashes and several arrests.

DOJ_NMG_0022669

Motorists were left in gridlock as youths marched down Sunset Boulevard, Melrose Avenue, Laurel Canyon Boulevard and other major thoroughfares.

At one point, protesters marched onto the Hollywood Freeway in downtown Los Angeles and two sections of the Harbor Freeway, downtown and in San Pedro, briefly halting traffic.

Students in Orange County briefly blocked the Riverside Freeway and Santa Ana Freeway in Fullerton, waving Mexican flags and tossing a rock that smashed the window of a CHP cruiser.

By noon, thousands of youths had gathered in front of Los Angeles City Hall, with student leaders meeting privately with Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa. The rally took on a festive tone, with many waving Mexican flags and yelling, "Latinos Stand Up!" and "Viva Mexico!"

"It was my dad's and grandfather's sweat and tears that built the city of Los Angeles," said Marshall High School senior Saul Corona, whose father came to the United States illegally before getting a green card. "People like them did things no one else wanted to do because they wanted me to have a better future."

The protests appeared to be loosely organized, with students learning about them through mass e-mails, fliers, instant messages, cellphone calls and postings on myspace.com Web pages. By contrast, the massive rally Saturday that drew 500,000 people to downtown Los Angeles was highly organized, with demonstrators urged to wear white and bring American flags.

Many students said they were marching in opposition to a bill sponsored by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that passed the House in December. The bill would give police more power to enforce immigration law and would lead to 700 miles of additional fencing along the border.

Even as the students marched, a Senate committee approved an immigration package Monday that would enable some of the about 12 million undocumented immigrants in the country to become U.S. citizens.

As immigrants or children of immigrants, several marchers said they would be personally affected by Sensenbrenner's pending bill.

"If this law passes, what will happen?" said Yadira Pech, 16. "There would be no more Los Angeles High School. Nearly all of us are immigrants."

Added Antonio Chavez, an eighth-grader at University Heights Middle School in Riverside: "Our parents, our families came here from Mexico. We want other families to be able to come here too."

Some students said they did not know exactly what the bill said but believed that it was part of an anti-immigrant movement taking hold nationwide.

"We just walked out because we didn't want to be at school," said Diana Hernandez, a senior at Dorsey High School in Los Angeles. "But we also believe [the legislation] is wrong."

The demonstrations became violent in some areas. In San Diego County, two dozen protesters were arrested in Escondido after refusing orders from police to disperse. Two patrol cars were reportedly vandalized.

In Riverside, a peaceful student protest unfolded downtown as six youths and one adult were arrested across town after scuffles with police clad in riot gear and carrying nightsticks, authorities said. After following students throughout the city and calling for them to disperse, officers confronted the group. Students responded by hurling rocks and bottles at police.

"They're pushing us around," said Pati Sanchez, a Norte Vista High School senior. "People should be able to say what they think."

In Santa Ana, officers used nightsticks and pepper spray to control students throwing bottles and rocks. They also set up barricades to prevent the protesters from disrupting traffic. One student was arrested and a few others suffered minor injuries, police said.

Four adults were arrested during a protest in Van Nuys, but no major violence occurred in Los Angeles County. The demonstrations prompted a tactical alert by Los Angeles police so the department could deploy officers to areas where they were needed.

"They're noisy but well-behaved," said LAPD Chief William J. Bratton as he walked through the downtown crowd. "Let them have their say."

DOJ_NMG_0022670

In a district with about 358,000 middle and high school students, an estimated 26,000 walked out of more than 50 Los Angeles Unified campuses. Teachers, principals and school police urged students to demonstrate on campus, but students flooded through gates and onto city streets and sidewalks.

"It's very disruptive," said Ellen Morgan, a spokeswoman for the Los Angeles Unified School District. "We want them to express their opinions, but there are venues, there are forums for them to do so. We'd like them to stay in school and get an education."

Not only did the mostly high school students miss class time, administrators said, but the district could lose money if students did not show up. And with postings on myspace.com promoting more walkouts today, principals were doing whatever they could to encourage students to stay on school grounds.

All L.A. Unified middle and high schools will be on lockdown today, which means no one will be allowed to leave school once they enter, officials said. The district plans more stringent measures this morning, prohibiting students from going from class to class as usual.

Teachers are planning lessons on the immigration issue, and administrators are setting aside spots on campus for rallies and sit-ins. Some school officials plan to punish students who left campus with enforced attendance at Saturday school.

In Los Angeles, principals sent notes home that urged parents to tell their children to stay on campus and warned of disciplinary action for those who did not.

On Monday, some principals locked down their campuses in an attempt to prevent students from leaving school grounds. Nevertheless, students from at least one campus climbed over a fence to leave.

Lucy Delgadillo, whose children attend South East High School in South Gate, said she knows that lockdowns promote school safety.

"There are some kids who don't know what the protest is about," she said. "But there are kids who understand and feel strongly about this, and I think they should be allowed to protest."

At some campuses where students did walk out, staff members marched alongside the youths to ensure their safety, officials said. In addition, Los Angeles school administrators dispatched about 30 buses to City Hall and other locations to ferry students back to their campuses in the afternoon.

In a noontime speech outside City Hall, Villaraigosa told the students that he opposed the Sensenbrenner bill.

"I know that all of you are fearful about what's going on," Villaraigosa said, referring to the pending legislation. "I know it would criminalize 12 million people."

But later in the afternoon, when he came out to tell students to go home, he was met with chants of, "Hell no, we won't go."

Administrators expressed differing views on the protests, which took place on the Cesar Chavez holiday. Some complained about a wasted day, while others praised the youths' activism.

"What pleases me is that our kids are politically active," said Ventura Unified School District Supt. Trudy Arriaga. "Isn't that what we want for the future?"

But Oxnard Union High School District Supt. Joy Dunlap said she hoped that it was over and that students had fulfilled their need to express their opinions.

"They've had that opportunity and now they'll come back and get back to studies on a normal basis," she said.

Santa Ana Unified School District Supt. Al Mijares said the students should use the classroom to engage in the immigration debate.

"The students are generally interested in the subject," he said. "But our quest is to make sure they're safe. We don't want them to miss school."

For the most part, students were met with support from honking motorists and cheering observers. (The demonstrations occurred a week after HBO premiered a movie about the 1968 student walkouts in East Los Angeles to protest the treatment of Chicanos.)

"I'm so proud of these kids," said social worker Robin Sheiner, as she watched the crowd pass on Melrose. "They're showing what they believe in."

Immigration Bill Decried (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

About 150 Virginia high school students cut their school day short yesterday to show support for immigration advocates who this weekend protested federal legislation that would impose harsher penalties on illegal aliens and their employers.

Among them were 30 Salvadoran students from Freedom High School in Woodbridge who conducted a "peaceful, orderly" protest outside the school, which grew to include community members and students from two other local high schools, Principal Dorothy McCabe said.

They had not asked for permission before protesting outside, the principal said, adding that students who skipped classes will face routine disciplinary measures.

"They know some illegal aliens, and that certainly is a very important concern for them," Miss McCabe said. "They were very respectful. They had a purpose, and I was just so proud of the way they handled themselves.

"We always want students to be involved in what's going on in the world, [and] we always encourage students to practice their rights," she said. "I think that's an important part of their education, [but] I want them in the classroom."

Meanwhile, hundreds of immigration advocates rallied at the U.S. Capitol yesterday against H.R. 4437, an immigration-enforcement bill that passed the House last year and comes before the Senate this week.

An interfaith prayer service at the Capitol followed weekend rallies that drew thousands in Chicago, Phoenix, Milwaukee, Dallas and Ohio, and an estimated 500,000 in Los Angeles.

The District-based Center for Community Change organized the event with help from the National Capital Immigration Coalition, an umbrella for immigrant-advocacy groups.

Crowd estimates yesterday ranged from U.S. Capitol Park Police officers' 1,000 to organizers' 3,000.

Labor union members, students and church groups from several states, including Kentucky, New York and California, wore blue shirts emblazoned with "We are America."

Clergymen handcuffed themselves to protest a provision in the bill that would imprison for up to five years anyone who knowingly assists or allows illegal aliens to remain in the United States, under a broadened definition of alien smuggling.

The clergymen marched to the Dirksen Senate Office Building to visit their senators, who will take up the measure today.

Sponsored by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, the bill calls for up to $40,000 in fines for nonprofit groups and others that fail to check the legal status of immigrants while helping them find work.

The Senate Judiciary Committee debated its own version of the bill yesterday.

Critics have called the protests an attempt to generate sympathy for illegal aliens who drain public services.

Though Sensenbrenner spokesmen have said the bill is aimed at employers who hire illegals -- not churches and day laborer centers -- clergymen yesterday said they were "absolutely" willing to risk incarceration if Congress passes the Sensenbrenner measures.

Cristina Lopez, deputy executive director of Center for Community Change, said yesterday's rally will help to bolster support for an April 10 National Day of Action on Immigrant Rights, where advocates will call for comprehensive immigration reform and mobilize immigrant voters.

The National Capital Immigration Coalition is helping plan the event. Protests are scheduled for the District, Chicago, Denver, Los Angeles, Milwaukee, New York, Philadelphia, San Antonio, Las Cruces, N.M., and Tucson, Ariz.

"We want immigration reform that provides a pathway to citizenship, family reunification, workers' rights and civil rights and liberties for immigrants -- nothing less," Miss Lopez said.

A New Corps Mobilizes Over Immigration (CSM)

By Jeff Oliver

The Christian Science Monitor, March 28, 2006

GREELEY, COLO. - For the Latinos of this northern Colorado farming community, it was the final straw.

DOJ_NMG_0022672

A proposal for a federal immigration office in town was supposed to help with gang and meth problems. Hispanics felt it unfairly targeted immigrants.

Sylvia Martinez, the daughter of a migrant Mexican worker, mobilized fellow Latinos. Three rallies ensued, and the proposal was all but quashed. "We saw this anti-immigrant stuff on a national level and then on a local level, and we said: 'OK, that's it. We do something now,' " says Ms. Martinez.

Local flash points like the one in Greeley, often born of hometown concerns about an influx of immigrants, are sparking the rise of a new corps of Hispanic activists. Now this corps is mobilized as never before to do battle on a national level - uniting legal and illegal, old guard and fresh faces - to oppose tough immigration reforms moving through Congress.

The strength of "Latino power" has been evident in recent days at protests in many US cities. Martinez and her group from Greeley, for one, were among the demonstrators, joining a 50,000-strong rally in Denver last weekend.

Granted, Hispanic political activism certainly isn't new. But this time its voice is different. The divide that usually exists between Hispanic-Americans born in the US and undocumented Hispanics is fading, say advocacy-group leaders, and fresh faces are joining old hands in the trenches of political organizing.

"There used to be a kind of divide" between native-born US Latinos and undocumented immigrants, says Raul Yzaguirre, former president of the National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Latino advocacy group. "Now, there is a sense that we're in this together."

In fact, some are saying that Latino political activism has not reached such a level of intensity since 1994, when a California ballot initiative to deny social services to illegal immigrants rallied that state's Hispanic population against it. This time, however, the intensity is on a much broader scale, as groups from Atlanta to Milwaukee to Los Angeles follow closely any government moves that could affect them.

"I have to say, it makes life easy for us," says Pablo Alvarado, a Salva-dorean immigrant and leader of the National Day Labor Organizing Network in Los Angeles. "An environment of fear means people are more willing to come together. I guess it's the same anywhere in the world."

Still, many Latino organizers remain troubled. "Sure, this accelerates people's incursion in the political system," says Clarissa Martinez de Castro, director of state-local public policy for the National Council of La Raza. "But in the long term, I think we are doing great damage." That is, she worries that any short-term increase in political activism and unity could be negated by anti-Latino sentiment - even if it's only a matter of perception - that results in long-term alienation and disillusionment.

And at times, some of the national rhetoric on immigration issues has left many Latinos feeling beleaguered. "We take it very personally," says Verónica Dahlberg, head of a Latino advocacy group in Ohio. "We have to turn off the TV because the words 'illegal alien' have begun to sound like the 'n' word."

In Greeley, however, activist enthusiasm shows little sign of waning since the protests against establishing an Immigration and Customs Enforcement office. Those rallies happened late last year, after Martinez and others canvassed neighborhoods with fliers and radio spots.

"I asked everyone to leave their identification at home," she remembers. "That way we would all be undocumented."

One rally drew 600 protesters - some immigrants, some native-born citizens - to a local Catholic church. The sudden show of unity moved public officials to apologize for not vetting the proposal with the Hispanic community.

Now, Martinez's group, Latinos Unidos, is putting together a voter-registration drive.

"This has been very invigorating," says Rebecca Safarik, Greeley's community development director. Latinos, she says, are now speaking up at city council meetings and are attending a weekly leadership training session. "We teach residents how to participate in local government," Ms. Safarik says. "At our last meeting, two-thirds were Latinos."

Still, for Martinez, success has come with a price. "I've exhausted two years of vacation time in two months," she says over a lunch of fajitas at a Mexican restaurant near her home. She adds that her efforts have also taken time from her husband and two children.

As she pauses, however, a fellow Latino quietly approaches and in Spanish says, "Congratulations on our victory. We're with you."

Martinez smiles and reminds the man to listen to the radio for information on future rallies.

"Sometimes I get people crying and giving me kisses for standing up for them," she says. "That guy just gave me fuel for two more months."

Coast-to-coast 'Movement' Rages On (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

The Roman Catholic Church, dozens of grass-roots coalitions and Spanish-language radio disc jockeys have helped fuel protests nationwide against congressional efforts to tackle illegal immigration.

One protest organizer described the effort as "the beginning of an immigration civil rights movement."

"This is the tip of the iceberg," said Marissa Graciosa, a political organizer at the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, one of several groups that rallied about 300,000 people into the streets of Chicago on March 10.

As activists rallied outside the U.S. Capitol yesterday, Daniel Sharp, legal director for the Central American Resource Center of Los Angeles -- a key group behind the 500,000-strong demonstration in that city Saturday -- called on Congress to act responsibly.

"If Congress doesn't address the problem in a realistic way, the demonstrations will continue," said Mr. Sharp at the event organized by District-based Center for Community Change and the National Capital Immigration Coalition, an umbrella immigrant-advocacy group.

Demonstrators, who have also gathered in Detroit and Cleveland, oppose legislation already passed by the House that would make it a felony to be in the U.S. illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal aliens and build fences along part of the U.S.-Mexico border.

The Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday approved legislation that would allow millions of undocumented workers to seek U.S. citizenship without having to first leave the country. It also stripped the felony penalty for illegal aliens. The full Senate is scheduled to begin debate today.

The Catholic Church has played a key role in opposing legislation to restrict immigration and rallying protesters.

"As we've been able to reach more and more people, they're waking up to the ills of the proposals made to date and seeing the need to be vocal about the kinds of reforms that would be more acceptable," said Mark D. Franken, executive director of migration and refugee services for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The bishops conference in May began "Justice for Immigrants," a campaign focused on activating a network of grass-roots movements against punitive immigration-reform legislation.

Mr. Franken said all the nation's 197 Catholic dioceses are in some way backing the campaign, with more than 70 being particularly active. Disseminating pamphlets and networking, community-level groups tied to the campaign are operating "in churches and everywhere they can gain access," he said.

Protest organizers also credit popular disc jockeys on Spanish-language radio stations for helping turnout, particularly in Los Angeles and Chicago.

"DJs got on the bullhorn to say, 'Hey, let's take this day off and get on the street to make sure this anti-immigration legislation cannot pass, that it won't be tolerated in a city like Chicago,' " Miss Graciosa said.

Yesterday in California, the state's Cesar Chavez Day, thousands of students walked out of class, and crowds in Detroit marched toward downtown as nearly a week of street protests against proposed immigration reforms continued.

At least 800 students walked out from eight Los Angeles-area schools ranging from the San Fernando Valley to the wealthy coastal enclave of Pacific Palisades, said Monica Carazo, spokeswoman for the Los Angeles Unified School District.

By midmorning, the protests spread to downtown, where hundreds more students were walking the streets and chanting.

In Detroit, protesters waving Mexican flags marched from the southwest side of the city, where many Hispanics live, toward a federal building downtown.

"We are illegal immigrants if you trace our heritage all the way back. But we are here, and we are working and we are living the American dream," said Janet Padron, a 22-year-old Allen Park resident who participated in the Detroit rally.

DOJ_NMG_0022674

"Do you see the community?" Miss Padron asked, pointing to the thousands of people surrounding her. "Do you see how many people didn't go to work today?"

Several Hispanic groups are supportive of legislation that the Senate will consider, saying it gives hardworking immigrants the opportunity to become citizens, not criminals.

Mr. Sharp said the Central American Resource Center of Los Angeles thinks already pressed federal immigration law-enforcement resources should be focused "on terrorists, drug dealers and violent criminals, not the people who pick our crops, wash our dishes and take care of our children."

Immigrants' Voice Reaches The Hill (WP)

By John Pomfret And Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES, March 27 -- On Feb. 1, Arturo Hernandez went to his church on the east side of Los Angeles and watched the first PowerPoint presentation of his life. The illegal immigrant from a Mexican village on the Sea of Cortez learned about a bill that had passed the House that would turn him -- and the church that helps his family with child care, his employers in the tony Brentwood section of Los Angeles and the hospitals that treat his family -- into felons.

In subsequent weeks, Hernandez listened to public service announcements on L.A.'s Spanish-language radio stations in which disc jockeys and other celebrities said they wanted him and others like him to let the Senate, which is meeting this week to hammer out its own legislation, know what they think about the proposal. At the same time, his church, the hotel worker's union that represents his wife and the leadership of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles continued to tell him the legislation was, in the words of Cardinal Roger M. Mahony who spoke against the measure on March 1 -- Ash Wednesday -- a "blameful, vicious" bill.

On Saturday, Hernandez, his wife, Gloria, and their three children marched in their first protest -- along with more than 500,000 other demonstrators -- through downtown Los Angeles. "I have lived for 15 years in America," said the 34-year-old gardener. "All that time I have lived with my head down, you know. On Saturday, all these people were telling me to put my head up."

As the immigrant legislation was heard Monday on Capital Hill, a grass-roots movement of immigrant churchgoers, union members, businessmen, media personalities and laborers was hoping to use the power of their numbers to move the debate. Some in the loosely knit coalition speak of the dawning of a new civil rights movement, drawing parallels with the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Chicano labor activist Cesar Chavez.

While opponents of illegal immigration have been organizing and even launching their own border patrols for some time, the immigrants themselves have been silent. But the turnout at rallies and demonstrations in recent weeks shows a deepening activism.

Almost three-quarters of a million people in more than 10 cities have marched against the bill. On March 10, about 100,000 marched in Chicago. Crowds have also massed in Milwaukee, Philadelphia, Denver and Phoenix. And protests continued Monday when thousands of students skipped class in California, Texas and other states and demonstrators marched on a federal building in Detroit. Organizers said they were gearing up for a nationwide demonstration April 10.

The message of marchers was, "We are good people who want to contribute to this nation," said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles, which helped organize the Los Angeles march. "More than anything, people were saying, 'This is who we are. Most of the time we're invisible to society, but this is who we are. We're not criminals. We're families. We're mothers, we're fathers, we're workers.' "

In Los Angeles, which is 47 percent Hispanic, the march was a blunt reminder of Latino power in this city -- illegal or legal. Busboys, gardeners, maids, textile workers, delivery boys, taco truck operators, firefighters, politicians (including Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa), union chiefs and thousands more coursed down Broadway in the heart of L.A.'s downtown predominantly Hispanic shopping district.

Churches have been at the center of the movement to fight efforts to criminalize aid to illegal immigrants. Mahony's message for Lent announced that archdiocesan priests and pastoral workers would defy the government and continue offering services to people in the country illegally if such efforts are outlawed. Similar statements came from the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez Jr., president of the National Hispanic Association of Evangelicals, which is usually associated with conservative causes.

Rodriguez called the recent marches the result of "the greatest mobilization since the days of Cesar Chavez."

"We have businessmen, Christians, non-Christians, Catholics and evangelicals," he said. "We engaged the number one institution in the Hispanic family -- the church. We contacted pastors in parishes, and we worked through local Spanish radio and television. We said, 'Look, if we don't speak up now, it's going to be too late.' "

Rodriguez cautioned members of the Republican Party who back the tough House bill. "More and more Hispanics are voting, and more and more are voting conservatively," he said. "But if we are abandoned by the Republicans on this issue, it will nullify the possibility of a Republican winning national office."

In Los Angeles, radio personalities, who normally engage in cutthroat competition, worked together to inform people about the upcoming march, said David Haymore, vice president and general manager of Spanish Broadcasting System in Los Angeles, which runs two of the most popular Spanish-language radio stations in the city. Haymore said that eight days before the march, the program directors and on-air personalities of the major Spanish-language stations here met and "agreed to leave egos at the door, not promote the stations" and make the case on the air for "people to show their unity by marching in downtown L.A."

During the next seven days, stations aired conference calls that featured disc jockeys from competing stations discussing the immigration bills and the Senate's upcoming debate.

"The community needs to see us together so they can understand the message that united we are much more powerful," said the host of the city's most popular Spanish morning radio show, Renan Almendarez Coello, better known as "El Cucuy," a character out of a Mexican folktale.

"We have to be united to demonstrate to the world that this country is made by immigrants."

Hispanic marchers have dominated the protests. The Pew Hispanic Center estimates that 78 percent of the nation's approximately 11 million illegal immigrants are from Mexico or other Latin American countries.

However, other ethnic groups, including the Irish, have joined the debate. In Los Angeles, the campaigning by the Spanish-language media was mirrored by Radio Seoul, the 24-hour Korean-language station in the city, which aired similar spots exhorting this city's 1 million Koreans to take to the streets.

"We estimate about one in five Koreans in America is illegal," said Dae Joong Yoon, executive director of the Korean Resource Center in Los Angeles.

"So we all have these people in our families. We know about their struggles. They are working hard."

How DJs Put 500,000 Marchers In Motion (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe And Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, March 28, 2006

He's one of the hottest Spanish-language radio personalities in the nation. So when Los Angeles deejay Eddie Sotelo joined hands with his radio rivals to urge listeners to turn out for a pro-immigrant rally in downtown Los Angeles on Saturday, organizers hoped for a big turnout.

But many said Monday that they were stunned by how many responded to the call to march against federal legislation that would crack down on undocumented immigrants and penalize those who assist them.

As a result, what was initially expected to draw fewer than 20,000 ballooned into a massive march that police estimated at 500,000 and said was one of the largest demonstrations in Los Angeles' history. The march topped a wave of protests drawing hundreds of thousands of participants in cities around the nation, which organizers said influenced the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee's approval Monday of legislation that includes legalization for undocumented immigrants.

Rally supporters, including immigrant-rights activists, churches, and labor and community groups, agreed that the active advocacy of the region's top Spanish-language radio personalities was critical in drawing the enormous crowds, who marched more than 20 blocks along Spring and Main streets and Broadway to City Hall, wearing white "peace" shirts and waving American and Mexican flags.

DOJ_NMG_0022676

The promoters included such on-air celebrities as KHJ's Humberto Luna, KBUE's Ricardo "El Mandril" (The Baboon) Sanchez, Renan "El Cucuy" (The Boogeyman) Almendarez Coello — whose often risque show has cast him as a sort of Latino version of Howard Stern — and Sotelo, better known to listeners as "El Piolin," or Tweety Bird. Coello's and Sotelo's morning talk shows are among the highest-rated programs in any language in Los Angeles.

"They were the key to getting so many people out," said Mike Garcia, president of Local 1877 of the Service Employees International Union. "If you listened to Spanish-language media, they were just pumping, pumping, pumping this up."

For his part, Sotelo said he decided to promote the cause — by calling a summit of his rival deejays to encourage them to do the same — after rally organizers told him about the ramifications of the legislation passed by the U.S. House of Representatives last December. The bill, by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), would make undocumented immigrants and those who assist them felons and erect a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexican border.

"I told God that if he gave me an opportunity as a radio announcer, I was going to help my people," said Sotelo, who himself illegally crossed the border in the trunk of a car in 1986 and gained legal status a decade later. "I think we have to make sure the message went through to Washington, to let them know we're not criminals."

The idea for the march first sprouted in February in the oldest church in Los Angeles: Our Lady Queen of Angels, which has historically served as a sanctuary for undocumented migrants.

The church near Olvera Street has become one of the city's organizing hubs against the House bill, playing a leading role in promoting the Roman Catholic Church's national "Justice for Immigrants" campaign. Cardinal Roger M. Mahony last December appointed a committee to promote the national campaign throughout the 5-million-member Los Angeles Archdiocese.

The coalition of religious, community and civil rights activists meeting at the church had begun planning several small-scale events: news conferences, a petition drive and protest marches to Republican and Democratic party offices.

But when two visitors joined the group in January, the vision suddenly expanded.

Jesse Diaz, a doctoral candidate in sociology at UC Riverside, had worked with day laborers in Pomona and organized marches against Proposition 187, the 1994 state initiative that cut public benefits to undocumented immigrants but was struck down in federal court. Javier Rodriguez, a journalist, had also worked with immigrants and organized black-Latino political alliances.

The two men called for something dramatic: a massive protest march.

"It was time," Diaz said. "The Sensenbrenner bill had passed. We have 10 [million] to 12 million undocumented immigrants in this country, but their voice can't be heard at the ballot box. We felt a march would be a way for them to speak out."

The coalition was initially wary, he said. The group had little money or organization. At the time, none of the big labor or civil rights organizations had yet signed on, such as the service employees union or the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. At the table, aside from the Catholic priests and some Spanish-language journalists, were such groups as the Central American Resource Center, Hermandad Mexicana Latinoamericana, the Pomona Day Labor Center and the Southern California Human Rights Network.

But Diaz and Rodriguez kept pushing. On March 2, the group held a news conference at the church to announce the march and call for political and Spanish-language media to get involved.

On March 13, the group got extensive coverage from KMEX-TV Channel 34, including promos, leading up to a "media breakfast" the next day. Later that day, Rodriguez and other leaders spoke to a producer on Sotelo's program. The day after that, they were on "Piolin Por La Mañana" for four hours, Rodriguez said.

"That was it, man!" Rodriguez said. "They gave us four hours and we went at it. We talked about the need for people to come out."

The next day, Rodriguez and other leaders went on the air with Sanchez of KBUE-FM (105.5) "Que Buena." During that show, Rodriguez said, he proposed that the deejays join together for the cause.

Sanchez called Sotelo and they had an on-air conversation during their programs, Rodriguez said. Later that day, Sotelo would make the calls that would bring the other deejays together on the air.

DOJ_NMG_0022677

By March 20, all of the major Spanish-language disc jockeys got together on City Hall's south steps to promote the big march.

"From there, it just blew up," Diaz said.

The deejays did more than publicize the march. Working with the organizers, they also helped develop some ground rules: Marchers had to be peaceful and clean up after themselves.

They were also encouraged to wave American flags.

"We wanted them to show that we love this country," Sotelo said. "Bringing the U.S. flag, that was important. There are so many people who say, 'I'm glad my parents came here and sacrificed like they did for us.' "

By this time, other organizations had begun to join the effort.

Local 1877, which represents janitors, took care of security. The union trained nearly 500 people in how to deal with conflicts and herd marchers along the route, posting nearly two dozen on each block in orange T-shirts donated by an L.A. apparel firm, according to union organizer Ernesto Guerrero.

The union also coordinated the more than 100 buses that dropped off marchers from throughout California, Las Vegas and a few Southwestern cities, he said.

All of the planning paid off. The "Great March of March 25," as some dubbed it, was peaceful.

"I was saying, 'Man, we did it, we did it!' " Sotelo said.

The strong advocacy of the disc jockeys and other Spanish-language media contrasted sharply with other outlets, said Felix Gutierrez, a journalism professor at USC's Annenberg School for Communication.

"The Latino media played it more as how will this affect you, how will it affect your job, how will it affect your kids," Gutierrez said. "They were much closer to their audience, in terms of the direct effect."

Gutierrez lauded the organization behind the event and contrasted it with the angrier assemblies of the Chicano movement of the 1960s, in which he was a media liaison.

By comparison, Saturday's rally was festive, featuring kazoos, mariachi music, cotton candy and families with children. "The messages I heard last week was show up, bring your family, bring your children, don't get pulled into violence, there may be people trying to provoke you," Gutierrez said.

Meanwhile, Diaz and Rodriguez planned to announce today their next major action: a call to boycott work, school and all consumer activities May 1. They are calling it "The Great American Boycott of 2006."

Concern High Over Immigration (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

A sampling of polls reveals that most Americans are concerned about the financial impact of illegal immigration and fret over porous borders, lax enforcement and easygoing policies that could reward or encourage lawbreakers.

The concern cuts across demographics. A Quinnipiac University Polling Institute survey of 1,892 registered voters released March 3 found that 88 percent think illegal immigration is a serious problem; 83 percent of respondents identified as children or grandchildren of immigrants agreed. The margin of error was two percentage points.

In addition, 62 percent opposed measures that would make it easier for illegals to become citizens; 56 percent of the immigrant descendants agreed. Seventy-two percent did not favor allowing illegals to get driver's licenses; 66 percent of the immigrant descendants agreed.

"If you're not here legally, you shouldn't get government benefits, Americans say overwhelmingly," said poll director Maurice Carroll.

Many Americans equate illegal immigration with a threat to the nation's security. A Time magazine survey of 1,002 adults released in late January found that three-quarters would penalize employers hiring illegals and 70 percent felt illegals increased the likelihood of terrorism. The margin of error was three percentage points.

Those with financial clout are also uneasy. A Gallup Poll of 802 U.S. investors released yesterday found that 80 percent said the federal government should do more to prevent illegal immigration. Although 84 percent said illegals mostly took jobs

Americans didn't want, 62 percent said illegals hurt the national investment climate. Sixty-eight percent said illegals cost taxpayers too much because of their demands for public education and health care. The margin of error was four percentage points.

Gallup analyst Dennis Jacobe was surprised by the findings, saying, "When eight in 10 of those individuals who probably benefit the most from illegal immigration want the federal government to act to prevent it, then clearly elected officials should take note and act."

Voters are attracted to a border security platform. An NBC/Wall Street Journal survey of 500 adults conducted March 10 to 13 found 71 percent would more likely vote for a congressional candidate who would tighten immigration. About 59 percent opposed President Bush's proposal to create a guest-worker status for illegals. Fifty-six percent opposed the idea because "we should not reward people who have broken the law," saying temporary status would encourage people to cross borders illegally. The margin of error was three percentage points.

Yet Congress is drawn to the idea of temporary status, according to a National Journal poll this month that surveyed 58 Republican and 52 Democratic lawmakers, plus a lone independent. The survey found 73 percent of Republican and 77 percent of Democratic senators and representatives said they would support an immigration bill that included a guest-worker program.

An IQ Research poll gauging the "broad view of the agricultural workers program" among 1,001 adults released in early March found 92 percent said that securing the nation's border should be an important issue for both the White House and Congress. About 60 percent did not favor amnesty for illegals. The margin of error was three percentage points.

Check The Polls, Not The Protests, On Immigration (RC)

By David Winston

Roll Call, March 28, 2006

Several hundred thousand people marching in Los Angeles to protest immigration reform get the attention of both the media and politicians, as it should. But here's a quick reality check: The march, though very impressive as a political statement, simply doesn't represent where the country is as a whole.

In truth, the views of most of the people marching in the streets of L.A. and other cities last weekend bear little or no resemblance to the majority of public opinion in this country when it comes to illegal immigration.

Here's what the American people actually think about immigration reform and border security, according to a broad range of recent national surveys:

• Sixty-three percent believe that illegal immigration is an extremely or very serious problem. (Time, Jan. 24-26, 2006)

• They see immigration as a security issue first (41 percent), then an economic issue (29 percent), and finally a civil rights/humanitarian issue (24 percent). (New Models, Oct. 30-31, 2005)

• They believe that illegal immigrants, overall, hurt the economy, by a 64 percent to 26 percent margin. (Time, Nov. 29-Dec.1, 2005)

• They oppose allowing illegal immigrants to obtain driver's licenses by a 72 percent to 25 percent margin. (Quinnipiac University, Feb. 21-28, 2006)

• They believe that military troops should be used for border security by a 58 percent to 37 percent margin. (New Models, Oct. 30-31, 2005)

• They favor a proposal to build a 2,000-mile security fence along the U.S.-Mexico border by a 51 percent to 37 percent margin. (Fox News/Opinion Dynamics, Oct. 11-12, 2005)

• They agree that illegal immigrants should be able to apply for temporary work visas, 61 percent to 38 percent. (New Models, Oct. 30-31, 2005)

• They support requiring proof of legal residency to obtain government benefits by an 84 percent to 14 percent margin. (Quinnipiac University, Feb. 21-28, 2006)

• They believe illegal immigrants should have access to public schools, 52 percent to 48 percent. (New Models, Oct. 30-31, 2005)

DOJ_NMG_0022679

• They are more likely to vote for a candidate who favors tighter controls on illegal immigration, by a 71 percent to 11 percent margin. (NBC News/Wall Street Journal, March 10-13, 2006)

In other words, when it comes to immigration reform, polls — not parades — are a better barometer of where the American public is. The bigger question is, where are the politicians coming from? For both Republicans and Democrats, this hot-button issue has forced them to navigate some pretty tricky political waters.

Republicans are trying to balance the demands of their conservative base, which wants tougher border security, with the concerns of another part of that base, the business community, which wants a more middle-of-the-road approach.

The GOP also is trying to retain and expand the progress it has made in the past three elections with more conservative Hispanic Americans.

Meanwhile, members of the Christian community are still deciding this difficult and complex issue. This week, Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) has promised reform legislation that addresses both the issues of border security and what to do with the 12 million illegal immigrants already here. A number of Republican immigration plans have emerged, but, as of this writing, there is no clear consensus bill.

If Specter fails to get a bill out of committee, then Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) will bring his own bill to the floor that deals specifically with national security and border security issues. Unlike the House legislation, the penalty in his bill for being in the country illegally would be a misdemeanor rather than a felony, ameliorating one of the Democrats' biggest criticisms of the House Republican reforms.

Whether the Senate can reach a compromise on the big sticking point — the amnesty/guest worker issue — remains to be seen. But judging by public opinion, Republicans would be smart to move ahead on border security while negotiations continue. Whatever legislation finally reaches the Senate floor, be it a Judiciary Committee proposal or a Frist alternative, Republican views on the twin issues of border security and immigration reform clearly are in tune with the majority of American voters.

This leaves Democrats with a dilemma: how to play to their liberal base by siding with immigration-reform opponents who, for all practical purposes, want amnesty now, without alienating the America people who, according to a Quinnipiac University poll (Feb. 21-28), "oppose making it easier for illegal immigrants to become citizens" by a margin of 62 percent to 32 percent.

Add to that the fact that "Big Labor" apparently has joined the coalition of Latino, liberal Catholic and Democratic activists who side with illegal immigrants in opposing the reforms. Those are groups that Democratic Members such as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), a presidential hopeful, want on their side.

To help reinvigorate the party's slipping Hispanic support, Reid threatened last week to filibuster the Frist proposal even though it contains provisions that reflect changes Reid and other Democrats have asked for, including tougher border security efforts, an increase in the number of Border Patrol agents and new sanctions for employers who hire illegal immigrants.

In a bizarre twist to the old maxim, "Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition," Clinton opened fire on Congressional Republicans last week as she joined Reid's filibuster effort. Apparently adopting a new stance on the separation of church and state, Clinton complained that the House Republicans' immigration reform package "is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scriptures because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself."

By threatening to filibuster a Republican immigration reform package that, at its core, will do much to strengthen border security, Democrats send a confused, inconsistent and potentially unpopular message to American voters — that they are willing to hold up stronger homeland security to give 12 million illegal immigrants amnesty. Republicans ought to call their bluff.

'Guest Workers' At Core Of Immigration Dispute (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, March 28, 2006

AVON, Ohio — Tom Demaline is an all-American success story. But he's the first to say it wouldn't be possible without the Mexicans who work for him.

DOJ_NMG_0022680

From a small landscaping company that his father founded in 1954 “with a pickup truck and a wheelbarrow,” Demaline and his sister, Cathy Kowalczyk, built one of the largest nursery operations in the Midwest. Their Willoway Nurseries has 800 acres in production, grows 1,500 varieties of plants, and sells to landscapers and garden centers from Iowa to Maine.

Of the 350 employees hired to work the March through December busy season, 271 are Mexican nationals with visas from a “guest worker” program designed to fill jobs for which, employers say, no American workers can be found.

The presence of Mexican laborers in this Cleveland suburb, readying roses and hydrangeas for Mother's Day, illustrates how much foreign migrant labor means to the economy. They also underscore why a Senate debate, which could begin today, is so explosive.

Lawmakers are wrestling with the first overhaul of the nation's immigration laws in more than a decade, against a backdrop of conflicting emotions. The USA is a “welcoming society” and a nation of immigrants, as President Bush told new U.S. citizens after they were sworn in on Monday. It is also a nation where self-styled “Minutemen” volunteers patrol the U.S.-Mexican border, because of their frustration with a stream of illegal newcomers.

Bush believes the best way to end the black market in labor, which has drawn an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants to the USA, is to legally expand opportunities for foreigners to take jobs that Americans don't want. “By creating a separate legal channel for those entering America to do an honest day's labor,” he said Monday, “we would dramatically reduce the number of people trying to sneak back and forth across the border.”

The Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday endorsed Bush's approach, approving a bill that would expand guest-worker programs and give workers who are now here illegally a chance to become citizens.

Employers from Demaline to Microsoft mogul Bill Gates have been pushing for more guest workers. High-tech companies say they need more talent, and the federal government agrees. In 2004, the U.S. Department of Labor certified a need for more than 600,000 guest-worker visas for high-tech workers, but under current law only about one-tenth could enter.

At the other end of the skill spectrum, Demaline says he had so much trouble recruiting Americans to do the “hard, dirty” seasonal jobs he was offering at $9.21 an hour that he thought he might have to sell his nursery. He credits the Mexican workers with saving his family business.

Even so, others believe America's open door is draining the economy. “Millions of American workers, in all sectors of the labor market, have seen their jobs and wages undercut by the phenomenon of mass illegal immigration,” says Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors tighter immigration laws. He says expanding the guest-worker program “will only exacerbate the plight of middle-class workers in America.”

The debate has opened a fault line in the Republican Party. Leaders of the Republican-controlled House have refused to take up Bush's guest-worker proposal. They're focusing instead on enforcement.

The House bill by Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., passed in December, would make illegal immigration a felony and increase penalties on employers. It would also expand 14 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexican border by 700 miles, at an estimated cost of $2.2 billion.

The Senate bill takes a different approach, with no criminal penalties for illegal immigrants. It incorporates a bipartisan plan, by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., to allow temporary workers to become citizens. The measure endorses Bush's view that those workers should not get a jump on those who have been waiting for years to become citizens.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist signaled opposition to a guest-worker plan. The Tennessee Republican, who is exploring a presidential bid, introduced his own immigration bill earlier this month. It's unclear whether he will choose his bill or the committee measure for the full Senate debate. Like the House bill, Frist's measure focuses on enforcement.

Tom Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, scoffs at efforts to “build a Berlin Wall” along the border. Donohue, who supports the president's guest-worker plan, says illegal and legal immigrants to the USA are responding to market demand. “We absolutely need these workers,” he says. “We need these people for jobs that there are no Americans available to take.”

DOJ_NMG_0022681

In 2004, the Department of Labor approved 628,595 requests for high-tech worker visas. However, Congress caps the number of high-tech worker visas, known as H-1B visas, at 65,000 a year. That means some companies don't get the high-tech workers they request, even though federal officials have found their need to be legitimate.

For another, broader category of temporary work visas — used to admit restaurant and hotel workers as well as minor league ball players — the Labor Department certified 106,471 requests in 2004. These visas, known as H-2B, are capped at 66,000 annually.

Employers say Congress' unwillingness to raise the caps has made it difficult to find enough workers. "Like it or not, there are a lot of undocumented workers in our industry," says Gary Roden of Dallas, former national president of the Associated Builders and Contractors. He says the building trades are "in drastic need" of carpenters, plumbers and heating and air-conditioning technicians.

He blames a society that favors white-collar professions on the lack of American workers in these trades. "School counselors and parents feel like their kids are failures if they don't go to college," he says.

The guest-worker visa program used for seasonal farmworkers such as those at Demaline's nursery admitted 22,000 workers in 2004, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. There are no caps on these visas. These workers are among more than 800,000 crop workers, only 47% of whom are legally authorized to work in the USA, according to the Labor Department.

Growers who use the legal guest-worker program say it isn't used much because it is cumbersome to obtain worker visas, which must be certified by the Labor Department, immigration services and the State Department before foreign workers can be admitted to the USA.

"You have so many different departments involved, all these little hoops you have to go through. If you have any little glitch, you lose your workers," says Luawanna Hallstrom, chief operating officer of Harry Singh & Sons, a California tomato grower. "We have told growers, 'Don't get into the program until you absolutely have to.' "

Demaline says he enrolled in the guest-worker program in 1998,after immigration agents raidedhis nursery and sent many of his Mexican workers back across the border.

"We were surprised," says Demaline, adding his employees' work papers appeared to be legitimate and many of the workers "spoke good English."

Demaline didn't know until after the raid that many workers were crowded into single-family rental homes while they worked for him.

Demaline used to rely on Cleveland-area high school and college students to fill seasonal slots at his nursery, but he says they aren't showing up at his hiring office anymore. He thinks they found easier work at area restaurants and shops.

State unemployment figures indicate that low-skill workers in Demaline's area can afford to be more choosy: In Lorain County, where Willoway Nursery is, the unemployment rate stood at 5.8% at the end of last year.

For Demaline, enrolling in the guest-worker agricultural program has meant hiring a Washington law firm to help with the paperwork, building dormitories that meet federal and state health department standards, chartering buses to transport Mexican workers, and starting Spanish classes for his American employees.

This year, the Labor Department made him advertise for farmworkers in newspapers and radio stations in the Rio Grande Valley of Texas, as well as interview applicants from Ohio unemployment offices. Demaline says he got three workers from Texas and about 100 from Ohio — though many of those, he says, don't stay. He needs guest workers to fill the rest of the jobs. "It's not a cheap source of labor," he says.

For Demaline's Mexican employees, the guest-worker program means paying a recruiter in Mexico to put them on the visa list. Francisco Ricardo, in his eighth season at Willoway, says he paid $400. Then the workers wait, sometimes for days, to win approval from the U.S. Consulate in Monterrey.

This year, a paperwork problem had to be untangled by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. Until it was solved, the workers returned to Mexico and waited two weeks before they got permission to cross the border.

DOJ_NMG_0022682

The workers spend nine months a year away from their families, but they say they are able to give them a better life. Ricardo says he sends $500 every two weeks to Mexico, where the oldest of his five children studies marketing in college. Back home, he says, he'd earn $4 a day.

Advocates who represent migrant workers say others aren't so lucky.

Gregory Scott Schell, a migrant workers' attorney in Florida, recently won a class-action suit on behalf of farmworkers who said they were cheated on their wages.

Many advocates are skeptical of plans to expand guest-worker programs. They say the programs create indentured servants.

"Workers are afraid they will not be asked back if they complain," says Mark Heller, a migrant workers' attorney in Toledo, Ohio.

There are other problems that worker rights advocates and growers say need to be resolved.

Baldemar Velasquez, president of the Farm Labor Organizing Committee, says some of the worst abuses occur on the other side of the border, where workers are forced to pay off recruiters hired by U.S. companies. Mary Bauer, an attorney for the Southern Poverty Law Center's Immigrant Justice Project, says the Guatemalan tree-cutters she is representing in a class-action suit had to give recruiters deeds to their homes.

Growers say they need a simpler application system and more federal workers to process applications. "Instead of putting money into building a fence across the border, they should be putting money into these programs and the agencies that run them," says Bernie Kohl, a Maryland nursery owner who hires about 130 guest workers a year.

Representatives at all three agencies involved — the State Department, Labor Department and immigration — say they have not yet calculated how many more employees they would need to handle the workload of an expanded guest-worker program.

At Willoway, Demaline says he'd recommend using guest workers, despite its difficulties. He also favors allowing foreign workers who are now here illegally to enroll in it, if only because he believes the alternative is unworkable.

"We couldn't get 1 million people out of New Orleans," he says, referring to Hurricane Katrina evacuation efforts. "How are we going to send 12 million Mexicans back?"

Troops Border Deployment Helped Catch Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

The deployment of federal troops along the U.S.-Mexico border in October netted a 60 percent increase in apprehensions of illegal aliens by U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) agents, a congressional report says.

The report given this month to the Senate Armed Services Committee says a Texas-based Stryker-armored reconnaissance, surveillance and target acquisition squadron helped CBP agents capture 2,000 illegal border crossers in New Mexico and Arizona.

The squadron, part of Joint Task Force North (JTF-N), based at Biggs Army Airfield in Fort Bliss, Texas, was used to "detect and report" the movement of "transnational threats" to the U.S. Border Patrol during the 30-day Operation Western Vigilance.

Adm. Timothy J. Keating, commander of the U.S. Northern Command (NORTHCOM) and the North American Aerospace Defense Command, told the committee that the operation also detected three tunnels at the U.S.-Mexico border and one from Canada.

"Our homeland defense and civil support plans are the foundation of our ability to deter, prevent and defeat threats to our nation and assist civil authorities when called upon by the president or secretary of defense," Adm. Keating said.

JTF-N, a joint service command of active duty and reserve soldiers, sailors, airmen, Marines and Defense Department civilian employees, is a part of NORTHCOM, which is headquartered in Colorado Springs and monitors air, land and sea approaches and encompasses the entire North American continent.

The unclassified report noted that unmanned aerial systems and National Guard helicopters were used in addition to the squadron's combat vehicles.

Adm. Keating said NORTHCOM initiated coordination with multiple federal agencies for further development of tunnel detection technology, which will benefit not only JTF-N and its law-enforcement agency partners, but also U.S. Central Command in Southwest Asia.

NORTHCOM is engaged with the Federal Aviation Administration to develop airspace procedures for unmanned aerial system support to border control lead agencies and disaster response operations, he said.

Stryker squadrons like the one used in Operation Western Vigilance consist of combat vehicles that combine the capacity for rapid deployment with survivability and tactical mobility. They enable combat teams to maneuver in close and urban areas, provide protection in open terrain and transport infantry quickly to critical positions.

El Norte (WSJ)

By Jagdish Bhagwati

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

The profusion of proposals by politicians of left and right, the taking to the streets of Los Angeles by half a million Hispanics and sympathetic demonstrators opposing the draconian House bill, and the agonized appeal by President Bush (a real mensch who has put his politics where his principles are, and where ours should be) that "America is a nation of immigrants" (and "also a nation of laws"), all underline the fact that there is now a compelling sense of public urgency about the immigration debate that will seize the Senate this week. There should also be a sense of déjà vu.

We have been here before. Indeed, a fierce debate preceded the legislation of the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), our last statute addressing illegal immigration. But we need to learn the lessons from that debate and from the loss of any illusion among the proponents of IRCA that they finally had a handle on the problem of illegal immigration.

If we understand why IRCA failed, we will understand why the prospects of disillusionment confront us all over again, whether we move to the harsh end of the spectrum with the House bill, which criminalizes illegal immigrants (and even those who aid and comfort them), or we embrace the reforms at the benign end, such as the president's proposal for a guestworker program and the proposal of Sens. John McCain and Ted Kennedy for a quasi-amnesty for the illegals already in our midst.

While some proposals before the Senate are better than others, none will eliminate the phenomenon of illegal immigration, which is an inevitable result of the fact that we are a powerful magnet for immigrants and that we are not about to abolish the barriers at our borders. Once we accept this stark (but not necessarily depressing) reality, what we ought to aim for as an optimal solution becomes much clearer.

Illegal or 'Undocumented'?

While the problem at hand is difficult enough, it is compounded by the insistence on euphemisms that obfuscate the realities fueling the debate -- and also by the overlay of panic over security post 9/11. It has now become politically incorrect to call illegals what they are. Instead, they are to be called "undocumented," which is also an insult to our intelligence since the illegals often do have documents -- that is, faked ones. A high Mexican official once condemned me for using the I-word when I gave a generously pro-immigration speech in Vienna some years ago, arguing preachily that "God did not make us legal and illegal." Yet to drown ourselves in such false sentimentality is to forget that a central problem arises from the very fact that many react adversely to the defiance by these immigrants of the enacted immigration laws. The fact that American demand for immigrant labor has fueled the influx is simply an explanation of the phenomenon, not its denial.

But the debate is equally set back by the gratuitous claim at the opposite end by those, such as Sen. Bill Frist, who talk incessantly of the security implications of illegal immigration. Illegal immigrants, especially the ones who cross the Rio Grande, are overwhelmingly poor: Surely, the likelihood of finding 9/11-type terrorists among them is farfetched. Everyone knows that the 9/11 terrorists were middle class and educated; and recent analyses of terrorist groups such as the Baader-Meinhof Gang, the Irish Republican Army, the Red Brigades and the Palestinian suicide bombers confirm that an unschooled, indigent terrorist is rare indeed. In short, as economists say, which policy is "assigned" to which objective is important: Tight enforcement against illegal immigration, as distinct from stricter examination of containers at our ports, for instance, is mis-assigned to the antiterrorism object.

In fact, the proper objectives of American immigration reform -- as was the case with IRCA, and as is the case today -- are twofold: to "gain control of the border" (i.e., to have the inflow of migrants determined exclusively by legal admissions) and to treat immigrants humanely. If we manage to eliminate illegals from our midst, both objectives would be satisfied. Immigration flows would reflect legal immigration policy. Moreover, with no illegals around, immigrants would be treated with humanity, thanks to the principle of equal protection under the law, which is substantially extended to legal aliens.

To achieve these two targets, two policies are necessary. First, the stock of illegals in our midst must be eliminated. At the time of IRCA, it was estimated at six million; studies today suggest that it has doubled. Second, new flows of illegals must be eliminated, too. In broad brush, therefore, IRCA used an amnesty to eliminate the stocks. And it used enhanced enforcement to seek to eliminate the flow. But neither worked. The reasons are instructive.

The main problem with amnesties is not just the fear that they set up expectations of further amnesties and hence stimulate greater flows. Rather, in the U.S. context, where we have both huge stocks of illegals and a sizeable queue of legal applicants, the issue always becomes one of what economists call "horizontal equity." An amnesty always appears to reward those who broke the law as against those who did not, and who have been patiently waiting for years to get in legally. So the amnesty seems unfair; and hence it gets hedged in with all kinds of restrictions, such as those currently in the McCain-Kennedy proposal, in contrast to countries like Spain, where an amnesty of illegals has worked because the stocks are small and there are few legal applicants waiting in queues. Our hedged-in amnesties always leave a fair amount of the stock of illegals in place: Only about half took advantage of it in the case of IRCA. The problem of a stock of illegals then endures. It was further compounded over time since the flows were not dented by enhanced enforcement under IRCA.

The enhancement of enforcement is easier legislated than implemented. In particular, employer sanctions were enacted by IRCA. Some of us had forecast that the judges would let off with a slap on the wrist, no more, employers who were hiring, as distinct from exploiting, illegals. Surely, even hanging judges would not throw the book at employers who were only offering work and a life to the destitute? But it turns out that hardly any employers found their feet held to the fire in any case, because no foolproof method of document verification was agreed upon.

Again, greater enforcement at the border was undertaken, not least with President Clinton declaring in July 1993 that "Today we send a strong and clear message. We will make it tougher for illegal aliens to get into our country." Fences and ditches were soon being constructed along the Rio Grande, the Border Patrol's budget increased manifold, and its 10,000 agents were working with advanced laser technology, aircraft, helicopters and rugged-terrain vehicles to intercept border crossings. Yet when the familiar and safer routes were blocked at the Southwest border through Operation Gatekeeper in the San Diego sector, and Operation Hold the Line and Operation Rio Grande in Texas and New Mexico, the illegals shifted their attempted entries to unsafe treks through the desert. Several have died there, creating a human rights issue where relaxed enforcement had created none. So IRCA failed to reduce the stock of illegals substantially; and the influx of illegals continued despite employer sanctions and enhanced border enforcement. At the same time, the humane treatment of illegals, as they crossed the border, deteriorated. We had not regained control of our borders; and we had taken a step backward on the human rights of illegals. Some reform!

By the time President Bush took office, the illegals were still in our midst (or in our face, depending on your politics) -- only more so. The matter could have stagnated thus. But President Bush was particularly interested in an amnesty again; it seemed to reflect his desire to attract the Hispanic vote and for better relations with Mexico. It is revealing that the first amnesty he sought was for Mexican illegals alone. On the Democratic side, the unions had been strong proponents of tighter controls. But they concluded that IRCA was not working and decided that if the illegals could not be eliminated, it was better to legalize them so that fewer illegals would undercut wages. Besides, legal workers could join unions. The churches also saw in the Hispanic illegals, almost all Christian and illiterate, not merely a way to provide succor to the needy but also to boost congregations. The demands for some cleverly disguised way of granting an amnesty therefore grew.

DOJ_NMG_0022685

At the same time, these "illegals-friendly" groups were generally interested in embracing some version of the president's temporary workers program. The idea was that, if you let in more legals, that would reduce the excess demand for illegals and hence lead to reduced attempted entries.

'Taxpayer Dollars'

On the opposite side, 9/11 gave the "illegals-unfriendly" lobbyists a new lease on life through the specious security argument. The rise of the Minutemen, and efforts to use trespass laws against illegals, were manifestations of this new window of opportunity to go after the latter. And Democratic Governors Janet Napolitano of Arizona and Bill Richardson of New Mexico jumped in with declarations of emergencies to complain, as Gov. Pete Wilson had done in California, that they were "absorbing through taxpayer dollars" the costs of incarceration, healthcare, Medicaid and welfare -- a complaint in which they were joined by the governors of Missouri, Tennessee and Utah.

When all the dust is settled, the reality is that neither a realistic guestworker program nor increased border enforcement will eliminate the inflow of illegals. The average lifetime improvement of a Mexican peasant coming in at the lowest wage he can earn here has been estimated by the economist Mark Rosenzweig at $250,000. You can bet your bottom peso that, even when the legal entries have been expanded, whether on a temporary or a permanent basis, many more will be on their way here illegally. And we are not even counting the increasing numbers who come in legally and overstay. Yet more draconian enforcement at the border again is not politically feasible. At some stage, Americans will rebel against the loss of lives and the plight of the poor Mexicans struggling against great odds to get across the border. * * *

As for eliminating the illegals inside the U.S., surely the notion that we can criminalize the illegals in our midst with a view to expulsion, and incarcerate or punish those who help them, is off the wall: Most Americans shudder at the very thought. Nor will we able to reduce these stocks through any kind of de facto or de jure amnesty; and even if we do, the continuing inflows will augment the stocks again.

So why not face these realities? In place of grandiose proposals for a "new IRCA," whether tough or tender, why not leave things be? If illegals will be here no matter what we do, why not downgrade the impossible objective of "controlling our borders" and concentrate instead on the other objective that animates all Americans: that we treat immigrants with the indulgence that simple humanity requires? Now, that would be an agenda that could make us proud.

Mexican Manipulations (WT)

By Phil Kent

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

Most Americans see first-hand the disastrous impact of illegal immigration on our wallets, wages and culture. The annual entry of more than 1 million illegal aliens from around the world, better than 30 percent of them Mexicans sneaking across our southern border, obviously undercut homeland-security efforts. Yet more Americans must understand that Mexico's government, far from being a friend, is actively working to subvert our country's laws and political institutions.

Not since the heyday of expansionist Soviet communism has there been such an organized effort to undermine our nation.

If our borders are not controlled and immigration law enforced, will we truly be a "United States" in another 10 years or a completely balkanized, multicultural society with English downgraded as the common tongue? The Mexican government promotes reconquista in the Southwest. Isn't it obvious in many areas that Mexicans are pushing out Americans, refusing to speak English and establishing de facto Mexican enclaves? A growing number of Mexicans despise their northern neighbor. American soccer fans, to cite just one example, have repeatedly witnessed the outrageous behavior of Mexican crowds during the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," including cheers of "Osama, Osama"-- a reference to the murder of 3,000 Americans on September 11.

The Instituto de los Mexicanos en el Exterior (Institute of Mexicans Abroad) has no respect for the internal affairs of our country. The institute was created by decree of Mexican President Vicente Fox and reports to a shadowy clique within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Its vast computer database is used to deploy illegal and legal Mexicans to lobby state legislatures, city councils and county commissions to recognize worthless matricula consular "identification" cards, support granting driver's licenses to illegals, promote multilingualism at the expense of English and help Mexicans and their children sponge off U.S. services ranging from schools to medical care.

California Assemblyman Dennis Mountjoy remembers the floor debate over a measure granting driver's licenses to illegal immigrants. Referring to the former name of the territory ceded to the United States, by Mexico in 1848, Mr. Mountjoy warned, "This bill paves the road to Aztlan." "Everyone in the gallery stood up and applauded," Mr. Mountjoy recalls.

In Michigan, a Mexican consul repeatedly traveled to the city of Holland to urge its city council to support police and bank recognition of consulate-issued matricula consular cards -- often with "what can only be described as a mob in tow," according to author Matt Hayes. Holland finally demurred because the consul was so disruptive.

Former Mexican consul Teodoro Maus, now a legal resident, is a leading agitator in Georgia for granting services to any immigrant "regardless of status." Such agitation, often fostered from Mexico's 49 consulates, is repeated in every other state.

In 2006, amid reports of border incursions by either Mexican troops or rogue off-duty soldiers, the Mexican government announced that its military forces were ordered not to go within three kilometers of the border. Of course, that begs the big question: Who's policing the border on the Mexican side? Don't count on the local police departments of border towns, because even Mexican officials admit they are riddled with corruption.

Former Mexican Interior Secretary Santiago Creel actually said his country would never help to secure the southern border. "We are not going to do that," Mr. Creel told Jerry Kammer of the Copley News Service. Mr. Creel claimed Mexico's constitution provides for "complete freedom of movement" for Mexicans inside Mexico. "We can't put up a checkpoint or a customs station inside our territory," Mr. Creel said.

A Zogby International poll in 2003 found 57 percent of Mexicans believe they have the right to enter the United States without permission. And 58 percent said the southwestern states properly belong to Mexico. In light of such sentiments, no wonder the Mexican government printed and openly distributed a comic book-style "guide" to "migrants" instructing them where to cross the northern border, melt into U.S. society and how to take advantage of medical, educational and other services.

Sen. Johnny Isakson, Georgia Republican, recently wrote a stinging letter to Mexico's ambassador to the United States "I would remind you," the lawmaker said in part, "that our border security plan is a direct result of the Mexican government's failure to commit to securing its side of the border, and is also a result of the Mexican government's failure to address inadequacies in its own domestic and border security policies." Indeed, the governors of Arizona and New Mexico declared states of emergency in their border counties because of border lawlessness.

Mexico has an obligation to respect our laws, encourage its citizens to do the same and commit to securing its side of the border. Since it has not done so, isn't it time to downgrade diplomatic relations by kicking Mexico's ambassador out of the United States and recalling ours? It would be a timely wake-up call to protest that country's insolent policies, which are so damaging to our nation and its border security.

Decency To 'Those People' (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

Half a million people poured into the streets of Los Angeles on Saturday to protest the various Republican-sponsored proposals in Congress that would demonize illegal immigrants. Hundreds marched yesterday in Detroit, which, last I checked, is nowhere near the Mexican border. Tens of thousands have demonstrated in Phoenix, Denver and other cities across the country. In every case, the crowds were mostly Latino.

We all know that Latinos are the nation's largest minority and that most of the people in those demonstrations either were born in the United States or are here legally. But we also know that at least some of those protesters had gone through the experience of crossing the border illegally under the tutelage of avaricious people-smugglers known as "coyotes." At least some had been here for months or years, working to send money home to their families, keeping their heads down, somehow managing to carve out lives for themselves and their children.

Who are they? After the demonstrations were over, where did they go? Are they so diabolically clever at hiding in plain sight? Or is it that the rest of us refuse to see them, because by seeing them we would have to acknowledge their humanity?

That willful blindness is why the debate on illegal immigration is so hypocritical. If we lump undocumented immigrants into an undifferentiated mass of Those People, we can avoid really looking at the immigrant experience. And we can convince ourselves that it is somehow different from the periodic waves of immigration that have shaped this nation -- that suddenly it is not an issue, or even a problem, but an urgent crisis.

There are an estimated 12 million immigrants in the United States illegally. That many people don't just fade into the woodwork. The fact is, we see undocumented immigrants every day.

Maybe they vacuum your office at night. Maybe they landscape your garden or clean your house or cook the food at your favorite restaurant. You probably don't know where they live. You probably don't know their children's names or where they go to school. You probably don't know what it was like for them to buy a car or even get a driver's license. You probably don't know where they get medical care.

If you did know these things about individual immigrants, whether they're from Mexico or El Salvador or China or Brazil, I think you would find the debate in Congress almost grotesque.

Should we declare that they are all criminals? Should we make criminals of the people who give them jobs, too? Should we build a Berlin Wall along the border? It's possible to take such draconian measures against Those People -- but not against lovely Marta, who waxes your floors, or genial Juan, who tends your azaleas. So to side with the xenophobes, you have to know as little about Marta and Juan as possible.

In terms of realpolitik, the immigration issue is easy: If the Republican leadership in Congress wants to alienate Latino voters and drive them into the embrace of the Democratic Party, it's tempting to let them do it. But that means ignoring the reality that we're talking about individuals, not Those People. And it means abandoning the process of inflow, adaptation and renewal that has made this nation of immigrants so dynamic and resourceful.

I don't get many chances to say that George W. Bush is right, but I think he really understands the immigration issue on both the political and the personal level. His guest-worker program is a mess. Does he really expect millions of people to report for deportation? Won't employers have an incentive to exploit the guest workers when they know they will never have citizenship, and therefore will never have any political clout? But I do give the president credit for seeking a compromise that will quiet the nativists in his party and maybe buy some time for cooler heads to prevail.

Much better is the proposal by Sens. John McCain and Edward Kennedy that would declare what amounts to an amnesty for undocumented immigrants. They would both take issue with that characterization, because "amnesty" is a forbidden word, but that's what it would be -- "illegals" who reported to authorities would be able to stay in the country and eventually begin the process of seeking citizenship. It seems unlikely, though, that this reasonable plan will fly.

Whatever Congress does, 12 million people aren't going to pack up and go home overnight. They are here -- Marta and Juan, not Those People. We see them every day. Let's deal with them as fellow human beings.

A Surprise In Tax Case On KPMG (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning And Colin Moynihan

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

The government's criminal case against 17 former KPMG employees over sales of questionable tax shelters took an unexpected turn yesterday when one of them, David Rivkin, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and tax evasion.

Mr. Rivkin, who was a KPMG partner in San Diego, agreed to cooperate with the government as part of his plea. His cooperation may help federal prosecutors in Manhattan build a case against the remaining defendants as well as help prosecutors in their widening inquiry into other accounting firms, banks, law firms and others that worked with KPMG to sell bogus tax shelters, lawyers not involved in the case said.

"Obviously, this is a person who was in a position to know and understand the inner workings of everything, so this is good news for the prosecution," said William B. Mateja, a tax lawyer and former Justice Department lawyer who has prosecuted fraud cases.

Prosecutors have said that four bogus shelters at the heart of their investigation created $11 billion in fake losses that allowed wealthy individuals to avoid paying some $2.5 billion in taxes. In addition to the 17 former KPMG employees, an outside lawyer and an investment adviser have also been charged.

Mr. Rivkin, who was indicted in October, pleaded guilty to one count of tax evasion and one count of conspiracy yesterday before Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of United States District Court in Manhattan.

Among the KPMG defendants, Mr. Rivkin, 42, was a relatively junior member of the firm. Others facing charges include John Lanning, a former vice chairman; Jeffrey Stein, a former deputy chairman; Richard Rosenthal, a former chief financial officer; and Steven Gremminger, who was a top internal lawyer for KPMG.

From July 1999 through April 2004, Mr. Rivkin was a partner in KPMG's San Diego office, where he was a member of the firm's innovative strategies group. That group, led by Jeffrey Eischeid, a former senior tax partner who is also a defendant, oversaw the creation and sale of questionable tax shelters to wealthy individuals.

In the courtroom yesterday, Mr. Rivkin admitted to preparing false documents that wealthy investors used to file improper tax returns, to asserting improperly that the documents were cloaked in rules governing confidentiality of communications with clients, and to concealing the existence of the questionable shelters from the Internal Revenue Service and Senate investigators.

Mr. Rivkin, a certified public accountant by training, said that in 1999 and through May 2004 he and other unidentified people had signed letters blessing the tax aspects of aggressive shelters as "more likely than not" to be valid in the eyes of the I.R.S., when he and others knew that they were not.

Mr. Rivkin said that his opinion letters allowed wealthy individuals to shelter from taxes income of at least $20 million "to keep the money for themselves instead of paying the taxes they owed." He admitted to preparing or causing to be prepared nine tax returns for clients who improperly claimed losses of $235 million in 1999 and 2000.

"I knew that the losses should not have been claimed on the tax return," Mr. Rivkin told the judge. "I signed opinion letters knowing them to be false."

After the hearing, Mr. Rivkin's lawyer, Patrick Q. Hall, declined to comment.

Mr. Rivkin's plea was unexpected in part because two months ago he and the other defendants filed motions challenging the government's case. Mr. Rivkin had requested that his trial be moved to federal court in California.

The shelters sold by KPMG have been the focus of a criminal investigation for several years. In August, the firm itself reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement with federal prosecutors.

In a document filed with the court yesterday, prosecutors said that four unnamed banks — three of them audit clients of KPMG — had worked with the accounting firm to make and sell questionable tax shelters.

The document also disclosed that a tax shelter boutique, Presidio Advisory Services, which is now defunct, earned fees of $134 million selling shelters known as Blips over 1999 and 2000 — more than double the $53 million that KPMG earned. Presidio was founded by two former KPMG professionals, Robert Pfaff and John Larson, who are both among the defendants.

The 19 defendants are accused of "devising, marketing, and implementing fraudulent tax shelters, by preparing and causing to be prepared, and filing and causing to be filed with the I.R.S. false and fraudulent U.S. individual income tax returns containing the fraudulent tax shelter losses, and by fraudulently concealing from the I.R.S. those shelters," according to the indictment.

One defendant, a former KPMG tax partner, David Greenberg, faces as many as 45 years in prison if convicted of all the charges. The others face several dozen years as well, according to tax lawyers.

Judge Kaplan said that Mr. Rivkin's sentence would depend upon his cooperation with prosecutors. He faces as much as five years for each count of conspiracy and tax evasion.

While Mr. Rivkin is the first to plead guilty in the KPMG case, his is the second such plea in the broader federal prosecutors' investigation. In August, Domenick DeGiorgio, a former New York-based executive of the HVB Group of Germany, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion in connection with sales of certain questionable tax shelters.

KPMG Ex-Tax Partner Pleads Guilty (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

Just days before a key court hearing to determine whether to dismiss the KPMG LLP tax-shelter case, one of the 19 defendants pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy and one charge of tax evasion in exchange for federal prosecutors dropping other charges against him.

David Rivkin, a tax partner in KPMG's San Diego office from July 1999 to April 2004, originally faced 39 counts of tax evasion for his role in a tax-shelter scheme in which he helped nine wealthy individuals avoid paying a combined $235 million in taxes. The government alleges the tax-shelter scheme generated about $2.5 billion in illicit tax savings.

Mr. Rivkin is one of 17 former executives at the giant accounting firm to be charged in connection with the sale of the questionable products. The other two defendants are an outside lawyer and investment adviser who helped KPMG structure and sell the products.

Mr. Rivkin's plea deal is expected to increase pressure on the other 18 defendants scheduled to go to trial in the fall in what is seen as one of the most complex and wide-ranging tax cases ever brought by federal prosecutors. New York-based KPMG last year reached its own deal with prosecutors, agreeing to pay $456 million and admit criminal wrongdoing as part of a deferred-prosecution pact. The pact allowed the firm to avoid a criminal indictment.

Under terms of his deal with prosecutors, Mr. Rivkin, 42 years old, faces as many as five years in prison for each count but is expected to receive a reduced sentence for his testimony against other defendants in a trial expected to start in September. He remains free on bail and is scheduled to be sentenced next February.

It isn't clear how much light Mr. Rivkin will be able to shed on actions by more senior KPMG employees, because he was less involved with the shelters than some others charged. Other KPMG employees charged in the matter include Jeffrey Stein, the firm's former deputy chairman; Richard Smith, former vice chairman for tax; and John Lanning, former vice chairman for tax services.

A certified public accountant, Mr. Rivkin worked in California at the firm's Innovative Strategies group, which designed and marketed tax-shelter products for individual clients. That unit's chief was Jeffrey Eischeid, who also has been charged in the case.

In court Monday, Mr. Rivkin said that, in April 1999, he and other KPMG employees attended a meeting in Dallas where they were trained in the sale and marketing of tax-shelter schemes known as a Bond Linked Issue Premium Structure, or BLIPS, and Offshore Portfolio Investment Strategy, or OPIS. The shelters were to be marketed as long-term investments, but the real purpose was to generate "phony tax losses," Mr. Rivkin said. He added that the shelters were "designed and approved" by senior partners at KPMG and that he was given a list of people with incomes of more than $20 million on whom to call.

Mr. Rivkin's plea came just three days before lawyers for the other defendants are scheduled to argue before U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan on motions to dismiss the charges against their clients.

U.S. Government Secures Another Cooperator In KPMG Tax Shelter Prosecution (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A former KPMG LLP tax partner pleaded guilty in the KPMG tax shelter fraud case Monday, admitting he helped rich people escape millions of dollars in taxes by helping them create fraudulent documents and sham companies.

David Rivkin entered the plea in U.S. District Court in Manhattan. He is among 19 people the government has charged with conspiracy for allegedly engineering a massive fraud through accounting firm KPMG LLP.

DOJ_NMG_0022690

"I knew that the losses should not have been claimed on the tax forms," Rivkin told U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan.

Rivkin admitted that he conspired with others between January 1999 and May 2004 to prepare and execute false documents so that clients could file false tax returns.

He also admitted that he took steps to conceal the existence of fraudulent tax shelters from the Internal Revenue Service and avoided registering the shelters with the IRS by claiming attorney-client privileges.

In pleading guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion, Rivkin signed an agreement to cooperate with prosecutors, who could then ask the judge to consider giving Rivkin a more lenient sentence rather than the years he might face in prison. Sentencing was set for Feb. 9, 2007.

Rivkin and his lawyer declined to comment outside court.

The government says the fraud let affluent KPMG clients avoid $2.5 billion (â,¬2.1 billion) in taxes. The Department of Justice has called it the largest criminal tax case ever filed.

According to an indictment, ex-KPMG LLP executives teamed with a former partner at a prominent law firm and another defendant to defraud the IRS by filing false income tax returns and by concealing the tax shelters from the IRS.

KPMG LLP is the U.S. arm of KPMG, a worldwide network of professional firms providing audit, tax and advisory services. The larger company operates in 144 countries and has more than 6,700 partners.

KPMG LLP already has admitted helping "high net worth" clients evade billions of dollars in capital-gains and income taxes by developing and marketing the tax shelters and concealing them from the IRS. It has paid a $456 million (â,¬379 million) fine, including $128 million (â,¬106.5 million) in forfeited fees from sales of the shelters.

Peterborough Tax Preparer In Legal Trouble (AP)

AP, March 28, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. --A tax preparer has run into legal trouble with the IRS.

The federal court in Concord has ordered Mark Loll of Peterborough, who runs a company called Tax-Tactics, to turn over his customer list and copies of tax returns whenever the IRS asks. Federal law requires tax preparers to do both.

The order stems from a December complaint alleging that Loll failed to comply with an IRS request to provide copies of the returns or a list with the customers' identifying information.

The court also ordered Loll to stop "asserting frivolous unrealistic positions on tax returns he prepares."

The Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 federal tax return preparers and promoters since 2001.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

For Bush And Press, Informal Talks (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

President Bush has been holding informal off-the-record sessions with major news organizations over the last several days.

Starting Thursday, he began meeting with groups of about a half-dozen reporters from newspapers, television, news agencies and magazines. They have discussed a variety of issues including the war in Iraq, said a reporter who attended a session.

The meetings, which the journalists have agreed not to describe publicly, have been in the White House residence. They come as several news organizations have assigned new reporters, who had no relationship with Mr. Bush, to cover the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0022691

David Bohrman, the Washington bureau chief for CNN, one of whose reporters attended a session, said they were a good idea.

"Most of the time, the environments that our reporters deal with the president in are very structured, very managed, and they rarely get to just kick back and have a conversation," he said. "I think there's a lot of value in it for both sides."

He also said he did not see the sessions as compromising. "If something pops up in there that someone wants to follow, they are free to follow up on it," he said.

The New York Times, which was invited to attend a session today, has declined to participate.

Philip Taubman, the Washington bureau chief for The Times, said in a statement last night: "The Times has declined this opportunity after weighing the potential benefits to our readers against the prospect of withholding information from them about the discussion with Mr. Bush. As a matter of policy and practice, we would prefer when possible to conduct on-the-record interviews with public officials."

Times editors and reporters have participated in such unreported sessions with several presidents, including Mr. Bush, over the years. These have involved both social situations and substantive discussions.

This appears to be the first time that the Bush administration has systematically brought in members of the White House press corps, although Mr. Bush holds an annual off-the-record barbecue with reporters during his summer vacation at his ranch in Crawford, Tex.

One reporter who attended a recent session said Mr. Bush had appeared relaxed and seemed to enjoy showing the group around the residence. They met in the yellow oval room and were taken out on the Truman balcony. A few of Mr. Bush's aides were present as the reporters were served iced tea, water and soda and chatted for about an hour.

Mr. Bush does better in such informal sessions than in formal presentations, said Mr. Bohrman, who added that he would like to see more.

Off The Record, Bush Makes Media Inroads (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

As he defends his Iraq policy with a public campaign of speeches and a recent news conference, President Bush also has been waging a private campaign that has included off-the-record sessions with White House reporters, sources said yesterday.

One gathering, which took place Thursday in the White House residence, was an unusual gesture by Bush, who has agreed to comparatively few lengthy exchanges with reporters during his five years in office. Bush has said publicly that he needs to convince Americans that the U.S. mission in Iraq is on a path to victory, despite what he called a news media focus on daily violence.

Last week's session involved reporters from several prominent broadcast and print outlets, including ABC News and The Washington Post. Under the off-the-record ground rules, the journalists were barred from reporting what was discussed. White House officials said they also hoped the meetings' mere existence would remain under wraps. That proved impossible when journalists from The Post who were not participants in the session, as well as those at other publications, learned of the meetings from sources outside the paper and began to report on them.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan did not return messages yesterday.

Off-the-record sessions with presidents are somewhat controversial in journalism circles. Critics say reporters should not subject themselves to being influenced or "spun" under ground rules that prevent the comments from being relayed to the public. But many news organizations say the sessions give reporters a rare opportunity to observe the president up close and to gain insight into his thinking and concerns.

President Bill Clinton, who held more full-fledged news conferences than Bush has, tried different background briefings with reporters. During a March 1996 flight from Israel, he spoke with journalists on Air Force One under guidelines that forbade them to take notes and allowed them to attribute his general remarks only to the administration's "highest authority" familiar with his views. According to a pool report filed by the reporters for colleagues traveling on a separate plane, press secretary Michael McCurry wanted Clinton's comments to be on "psych-background."

In March 1999, shortly after he was acquitted on impeachment charges, Clinton attended an off-the-record dinner with reporters accompanying him on a Central America trip. His remarks were not reported.

AARP Ads To Boost Drug Plan (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 28, 2006

With the deadline fast approaching for seniors to sign up for the Medicare prescription drug benefit, the on-again, off-again partnership between Congressional Republicans and AARP to promote the program appears to be back on.

As Republicans tout the latest enrollment numbers and many Democrats continue to criticize the Medicare plan as confusing, the 35-million-member seniors group announced last week that it was "launching an expansive advertising campaign to help educate Americans about the benefits of the program and how to enroll, especially for those with limited incomes."

AARP spokesman Steve Hahn said Monday the group was prepared to spend "several million dollars" on print and radio ads in 44 cities in advance of the May 15 deadline for seniors to enroll in the drug program without a penalty.

That's music to the ears of GOP lawmakers, who until now have expressed disappointment at AARP's relatively modest efforts to promote the GOP-backed plan after prominently endorsing it prior to passage.

AARP's move comes at a crucial time, as scores of Members have been holding meetings in their districts to boost enrollment in Medicare Part D. Already facing an uphill fight in November's elections and concerned about wooing the potent senior vote, many Republicans believe that public perceptions of the prescription drug program could make or break their re-election chances.

In a letter last week to AARP's CEO William Novelli, House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio) thanked him for his "strong leadership and enthusiasm to educate seniors about this new benefit."

And Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said, "We're very pleased that they are getting the message out at a very important time in the process of signing up seniors for the drug plan."

But if Republicans are singing AARP's praises now, that has not always been the case in recent years.

AARP's agenda has traditionally been closely aligned with that of Congressional Democrats, and the group's endorsement of the measure was seen by its GOP backers as one of the biggest reasons the bill ended up passing in December 2003 — albeit by a narrow margin, after the House vote was controversially held open for three hours.

During the run-up to the bill's passage, some press reports suggested that AARP officials had pledged to Republican leaders that they would spend as much as $25 million to help publicize the new benefit, though the group later denied that it had ever made such a specific pledge.

Soon after the measure was signed into law, some Capitol Hill Republicans began complaining that AARP was not holding up its end of the bargain in the face of pressure from angry Democrats. In January 2004, Hastert told Novelli not to expect any more help with the group's legislative agenda until it started spending serious money to promote the prescription drug plan.

And that agenda — aside from the prescription drug bill — has often been at odds with that of the GOP. AARP has lobbied hard for legalizing the reimportation of prescription drugs and against Social Security privatization and cuts in Medicaid.

Even now, with AARP pledging to spend millions of dollars to promote the drug program, some Capitol Hill Republicans remain privately frustrated that the seniors group hasn't done more to help their cause, particularly when the benefit was first being implemented and became the subject of much negative press and criticism from Democrats.

At GOP leadership meetings earlier this year, Republican sources said the leaders frequently lamented the beating the program's implementation was taking in the press and wondered why AARP wasn't stepping up.

"They have a lot invested in this, but they were sitting idly by while the Democrats criticized [the drug plan]," complained a Republican leadership aide.

For his part, Novelli — a self-described independent who once wrote the foreword to a book on health care by ex-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) — has said in the past that he does not want to get his group involved in a fight between Republicans and Democrats.

"We're going to try to stay above the fray and not get into politics," Novelli said in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0022693

And while AARP is now touting the drug program in the new ad campaign and in its magazine and newspaper, the group is also lobbying for some changes to the program to make it more accessible to low-income seniors.

"We're looking for ways to improve this as we move forward," Hahn said. "Like anything, it's going to need bipartisan support so we really want to deal with both sides."

Retirees On 2 Drug Plans Must Make Choice (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 27 — The Bush administration notified hundreds of thousands of Medicare beneficiaries on Monday that they were listed on the rolls of two prescription drug plans and would soon be dropped from one. They will retain coverage under the other plan.

The notices, being sent on green paper, are supposed to clear up confusion resulting from errors and discrepancies in the enrollment records of Medicare's new prescription drug program. But some state officials and advocates for older Americans said the federal effort could create new confusion.

In general, the goal is to ensure that each Medicare beneficiary with drug coverage is enrolled in only one plan by May 1.

Many people were originally enrolled in one drug plan and then switched to another. In many cases, beneficiaries continued to use the first plan for some or all of their prescriptions, and pharmacies found that they could bill both plans for the same prescription.

People listed on the rolls of two plans may be charged two premiums and may be billed improperly for other costs, the Bush administration said last month.

In an interview on Monday, Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said, "Well over a million people were enrolled" in multiple plans. Many of them, he said, have filed claims with only one plan.

Christina Pearson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, estimated that 500,000 people could receive notices as part of the "enrollment reconciliation process."

The letters, being sent by private insurance companies on government letterhead, say, "The purpose of this notice is to confirm your choice of a Medicare prescription drug plan and to ensure that you are enrolled in the plan you want."

Beneficiaries who take no action will be removed from the rolls of the plan to which they were originally assigned, but they will still have coverage under the second plan.

People have the option of staying in their original plan, but must indicate that desire by calling that insurer. Otherwise, the letter says, "you will no longer be able to use your membership card."

More than six million low-income people entitled to both Medicaid and Medicare were assigned to Medicare drug plans selected at random by the federal government. These plans did not necessarily cover the drugs they needed. Many of these "dual eligible" beneficiaries selected other plans or were placed in other plans by relatives, state officials or former employers.

Stan Rosenstein, the Medicaid director in California, said he understood the need for people to be in just one plan, but he predicted that the change would be "very confusing" to many beneficiaries.

"We try to reach people in 12 languages, and even then it's difficult," Mr. Rosenstein said.

Jude E. Walsh, pharmacy affairs coordinator for the governor of Maine, said: "This mass disenrollment is fraught with a potential for trouble. It does not make sense to do it all at once."

If Medicare beneficiaries are in two plans but have not used the first one, they may be dropped from that plan without receiving any formal notice. In a memorandum to insurers, the Bush administration said: "Do not mail the special disenrollment letter or any other correspondence to these beneficiaries regarding their enrollment status. Deactivate these beneficiaries' pharmacy cards to prevent them from accessing plan benefits in the future."

Insurers expressed concerns that some patients would try to use these cards without realizing they had been canceled. Jeanne Finberg, a lawyer at the National Senior Citizens Law Center, said, "It's very dangerous to disenroll people without informing them."

DOJ_NMG_0022694

But Dr. McClellan said these beneficiaries were "fully enrolled in the new plan" and would not see any interruption of benefits.

Democrats' Rhetoric On Drug Plan Doesn't Match Reality In The District (HILL)

By Rep. Phil Gingrey (r-ga.)

The Hill, March 28, 2006

If there was a way to save more than a thousand dollars a year on your heating bill, food costs or car payments, you'd want to know about it, right? Yet partisan politics is keeping millions of senior citizens from learning about and enrolling in a new program that is saving seniors an average of $1,100 a year on prescription-drug costs.

Medicare Part D is the new, voluntary drug benefit available to all seniors. Since coverage began Jan. 1, the enrollment numbers have been good and keep getting better. As of last week, 27 million seniors have enrolled.

Marketplace competition is working. Premiums are a third lower than expected, and seniors are saving up to 50 percent off their monthly medication costs. To top it off, the Congressional Budget Office recently announced the program would cost $5 billion less than projected.

As of today, seniors have less than two months left to enroll in a plan without paying a higher premium penalty. And yet there are Democrats in this Congress who are playing politics with our seniors' health by holding town hall meetings to encourage seniors not to enroll. This is shameful. It amounts to telling a senior not to save money, not to improve his health and not to reap the benefits of preventive medicine.

Like any new program, there have been some initial glitches with Medicare Part D, and the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS) is working quickly and effectively to resolve these problems. The wait time for callers at 1-800-Medicare is down from four and a half minutes in January to 45 seconds in March. Pharmacist inquiries are on the decline, and CMS is working with states to quickly resolve reimbursement discrepancies.

I was a student in medical school when Medicare debuted in 1965, and I remember hearing some of the same concerns then as I hear today. Keep in mind, Part D marks the largest enrollment effort since the introduction of Medicare 40 years ago. Those who advocate that we abandon the program because of start-up problems might consider what would have happened if we had abandoned Medicare 40 years ago, leaving our seniors without healthcare coverage of any kind.

As a physician, I know that affordable prescription drugs are paramount to good heath for our seniors. And for many of these seniors, Medicare Part D marks the first time they've been able to afford the medication they need to stay well. The success of Medicare Part D will not be seen in the hallways of Congress or on cable TV but in our hometowns and senior centers across America.

For satisfied Medicare Part D customers, I don't have to look very far. A few months ago, I helped my 88-year-old mother enroll in a Part D plan, and she is now set to save more than $1,000 a year on her medications.

As I travel my district in Georgia, I'm continually hearing seniors praise Medicare Part D. Take Mary O'Brien of Cobb County.

Before Part D, the O'Briens had no prescription-drug coverage. Now Mary is enrolled in a plan with a $70 a month premium, and her husband told my office that she saved enough money on her first prescription to pay for two months of premiums. For the O'Briens, Medicare Part D is quite literally paying for itself.

In fact, a pharmacist in Alabama contacted CMS to report that one of his customers received $1,200 worth of medication for only $15 under her new Part D plan.

All seniors deserve the opportunity to have a little extra money in their pockets at the end of the month. As members of Congress, we have two choices: We can be a resource for our constituents and help them enroll in money-saving programs, or we can allow disdain for a party and president to cloud our vision of constituent service.

After years of promises, we have finally delivered on prescription-drug coverage for seniors. Now, let's put people above politics and ensure all seniors have the opportunity to enroll.

VA Health-Care System Is 'A Model,' Secretary Says (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

When Hurricane Katrina forced the relocation from New Orleans to Houston of hundreds of Veterans Affairs hospital patients, electronic medical records enabled doctors and nurses to treat the sick and injured without skipping a beat.

"We were able in every case, after we got them resettled into another hospital, to dial up their medical record," Jim Nicholson, the secretary of Veterans Affairs, said yesterday.

In a "state of the VA" speech at the National Press Club, Nicholson cited electronic health records as one reason the VA health-care system is "a model for our nation" and said his department, with 234,000 employees, is "truly one of America's good-news stories."

The VA's 154 hospitals and more than 900 clinics will treat more than 5.3 million veterans this year, he said. Its health-care budget has risen 69 percent in the past five years. Under President Bush's proposed 2007 budget, the department would get one of the biggest increases in discretionary spending for any federal agency: a boost of $2.6 billion, to $35.7 billion.

Not all the news is good.

One of the department's missions is to help ease veterans' transition to civilian life. Yet the unemployment rate of veterans ages 20 to 24 is 16 percent, more than three times the national rate.

"To me, they're perfect for prospective employers," Nicholson said. "They made a commitment. . . .They've been honorably discharged and they deserve a job."

About 1 in 5 veterans has diabetes, compared with about 1 in 14 Americans in general. Nicholson said the VA now talks to patients about their diet and the disease even if they come in for other ailments.

More veterans, especially those returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, are having post-traumatic stress disorder diagnosed, prompting the department to ensure that all its 154 major medical centers have an expert in treating PTSD.

Then there are the old complaints that the VA is too slow to process benefits claims. "We're trying to compress the time it takes to get a decision so a veteran doesn't have to wait so long," the secretary said. "There are things that we can and we need to do better."

House Centrists Seek Budget Changes (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, March 28, 2006

Centrist Republicans hope to replicate the recent success of their Senate counterparts by boosting spending on health, welfare and education programs this year.

Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.) and other centrists plan to hold a press briefing today in the Capitol basement to seek bigger budgets for programs such as the National Institutes of Health, student loans, heating assistance and job training.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) got 27 GOP votes for his amendment to the Senate's budget resolution that would add $7 billion for those programs.

The House Budget Committee plans to meet tomorrow to begin marking up the budget resolution.

Fiscal Advice For Congress, From A CPA (RC)

By Rep. Mike Conaway

Roll Call, March 28, 2006

'It's time to make tough choices."

Catchphrases like these are thrown around quite often on Capitol Hill, especially at this time of year, after the release of the president's budget. Unfortunately, it's rare that this kind of rhetoric is backed up with substantive action.

Since I arrived in Congress last year, we have been talking about reducing federal spending and shrinking the size of the federal bureaucracy. We took a small step in the right direction with last year's spending bills and with the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 that was signed into law last month.

DOJ_NMG_0022696

So what is the solution? I have a few suggestions:

No new federal programs. I recently introduced legislation that would change House legislative procedure to halt the creation of any new federal programs unless a program of equal or greater value is eliminated in its place. This is a common-sense procedure that would force Congress to prioritize and make the real "tough choices" with respect to new spending.

Line-item veto reform. President Bush recently has voiced his support for a constitutional line-item veto. I recently co-sponsored line-item veto legislation offered by Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) that should be able to pass constitutional muster. This enhanced budget-rescission procedure would allow the president to effectively eliminate any wasteful spending item and then send the item back to Congress for a vote. While enhanced rescission certainly will not eliminate all earmarks, it will bring greater transparency to the process. The now-infamous "Bridge to Nowhere" would never have passed if every Member of Congress had been forced to vote it up or down on the record. This, in addition to other earmark reforms, should trim Congress' appetite for pork.

Reduction in mandatory spending growth. Slowing the rate of growth for huge government entitlement programs is not the same as a cut, as some would like to believe. Slowing down programs on autopilot is the only way we can tackle the deficit. According to the Congressional Budget Office, mandatory spending — that is, government spending that automatically increases every year — was 49 percent of the federal budget in 1995, 54 percent in 2005, and will be 62 percent in 2015 if left unchecked. Slowing down discretionary spending also is necessary, but discretionary is a much smaller piece of the pie. Even if it were entirely eliminated, the budget still would not be balanced.

Make President Bush's tax cuts permanent. The tax-relief measures passed in 2001 and 2003 continue to help drive our economy. Unemployment is still low at 4.8 percent — lower than the average unemployment rate of the 1970s, '80s and '90s. With more Americans working than ever before, tax receipts have increased significantly, generating more than $2.3 trillion in federal revenue for fiscal 2005. (This is 7.3 percent, or $158 billion, more than expected.) For this unprecedented growth to continue, Congress must make these tax cuts permanent and avert any tax increase that could potentially damage our economy.

These suggestions, if applied, will significantly impact how the federal government manages our money. Eliminating ineffective government programs, reducing growth of massive government entitlements and passing procedural measures for real budget reform do not sound particularly exciting, but such actions are necessary.

As a certified public accountant, I spent my career advising my clients to budget their incomes so they can reach their long-term goals. Congress has the same responsibility to taxpayers. We must make common-sense reforms, because we are heading down a dangerous road.

These are tough choices. Reducing spending is the toughest of tasks, because every dollar the federal government spends has a constituency, and thus someone who thinks that program is working. But a balanced budget is well worth the cost in political capital. We are heading toward financial ruin. Now is the time to decide whether we want to serve as catalysts for change or pay the very real price for standing idle as change inflicts itself upon us. We owe it to future generations to make serious budget reforms and stop the spending spree now.

DP World Leader's Nomination Pulled (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

The fallout from the death of the DP World deal continued yesterday, when the White House withdrew the nomination of one of the company's executives to run the U.S. Maritime Administration.

David Sanborn was nominated in January by President Bush to lead the administration, which oversees the nation's ports. He also is director of operations in Europe and Latin America for the firm, which is owned by the government of Dubai, one of the seven United Arab Emirates.

White House spokeswoman Erin Healy said the withdrawal was at Mr. Sanborn's request, which was made in a letter to the president yesterday.

"The withdrawal was done at his request, and we are honoring his request," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0022697

She would not comment on whether the move was connected with the sudden end of DP World's proposed takeover of operations at terminals in six U.S. ports, the result of the Arab company's takeover of Britain's Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co.

"While I believe my background makes me one of the most qualified people there is for this position, the convergence of a number of factors bring me to the conclusion that I cannot effectively serve my country, you, and the U.S. maritime industry," Mr. Sanborn wrote in his letter to Mr. Bush.

Mr. Sanborn was nominated for the post Jan. 18, by which time the DP World takeover had been reported in the business press and the Committee on Foreign Investments in the U.S. had begun its 30-day inquiry on the deal.

There was no mention of the DP World deal at his confirmation hearing in February, but once the takeover was blocked by angry lawmakers, the nomination ran into trouble. Several senators, including Sen. Bill Nelson, Florida Democrat, had vowed to block the appointment. Both Mr. Nelson and Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, had put holds on the nomination.

The U.S. Maritime Administration is part of the Transportation Department. It keeps data on U.S. ports and shipping, finds U.S.-flagged ships for the military to use as cargo vessels, disposes of old ships and oversees the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy. Mr. Sanborn had been an officer in the Navy and graduated from the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy.

Senator: Katrina Loan Process Slowed (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, March 27, 2006

The government has slowed down in deciding whether to approve or deny hundreds of applications for federal loans to help small businesses recover from Hurricane Katrina, a senator said Monday.

Earlier this year, the government was resolving 355 cases daily; that figure has dropped to 99 cases daily. The slowdown came as 682 disaster assistance employees left the Small Business Administration, said Sen. Olympia Snowe (news, bio, voting record), R-Maine, who chairs the Senate committee that oversees the agency.

In a letter to Small Business Administrator Hector Barreto, Snowe said she was troubled by the staff decrease "at a time when efficiency and production are of such high importance."

"I am deeply disturbed by the agency's reluctance to finish resolving all of the applications submitted by hurricane victims," Snowe said in the March 23 letter that was released Monday.

Calling the loan application process "a high priority," SBA spokeswoman Anne Marie Frawley said the agency is looking to local banks and private firms to help speed recovery aid to hurricane victims. She said the SBA dismissed 623 employees because the agency has finished property inspections for nearly all the applications, and "there is no longer a need to maintain such an extensive staff."

Frawley also chastised Snowe, noting that while "we regret that she feels it is necessary to issue a public rebuke of the SBA, the administrator is only a phone call away and would have gladly answered her questions." The SBA has processed over 282,587 applications since the Aug. 29 storm.

The SBA has approved $6.7 billion in disaster loans to Gulf Coast businesses, homeowners and renters whose properties were damaged by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. But only $590 million has been distributed thus far to applicants, said Snowe spokesman Chris Chichester.

For an 18-day period between Feb. 13 and March 3, the agency resolved 355 loan applications each day, clearing 90 percent of the pending requests, Snowe said. But in the 18 days that followed — March 3 to March 21 — the agency approved 99 applications daily.

Meanwhile, the agency has lost 682 employees since March 1, Snowe said.

The agency told Snowe's staff that the new delay was explained by "a shift in focus" from resolving business applications to considering loan requests by homeowners. However, "homeowner applications have not been resolved any faster," Snowe said. She said less than 9 percent of pending homeowner applications were resolved between March 3-21.

Judge Refuses To Delay New Orleans Vote (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0022698

The New York Times, March 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) -- A federal judge on Monday refused to delay New Orleans' April 22 mayoral election, telling both sides to solve any problems that might hinder displaced residents' ability to vote.

"If you are a displaced citizen, like I am, we have a burning desire for completeness," said U.S. District Judge Ivan Lemelle, whose own New Orleans home flooded after Hurricane Katrina.

Lemelle said voting will help the city rebuild, but he warned that its residents have already lost trust in institutions. "I recognize that there is still room for improvement in that electoral process," he said.

Civil rights groups had urged the judge to postpone what would be the city's first municipal elections since the hurricane, arguing that too many black residents won't be able to participate.

The Aug. 29 storm flooded 80 percent of the city, destroying some polling places and scattering more than half the population. What was a mostly black city of nearly half a million people was reduced to well under 200,000 inhabitants.

Some black leaders say the state's plan to allow mail voting for residents in other states, along with satellite polling places elsewhere in Louisiana, won't do enough to give all displaced residents the opportunity to vote.

"We can see that train wreck coming in slow motion," plaintiffs' attorney Bill Quigley said Monday.

Secretary of State Al Ater, the state's top election official, said he was prepared to work with the plaintiffs and the judge. "I'm very proud of what we're doing," he said.

The city elections had been set for Feb. 4, but state officials said they could not possibly hold balloting that soon after Katrina. The postponement led to a lawsuit by residents who wanted no delays, and the state then set the April 22 date. The state's emergency plan includes polling stations in 10 Louisiana cities, a national advertising campaign, and an easing of voting rules to allow displaced residents to cast ballots.

Mayor Ray Nagin, criticized in some quarters for his response to the hurricane, is running for re-election against nearly two dozen opponents, including Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu and Audubon Institute chief executive Ron Forman.

Monday's hearing was called after the NAACP and other civil rights groups argued the plan contained the equivalent of a poll tax, the voting fee that was banned after it was abused in the South to disenfranchise blacks. They said displaced residents would have to pay for transportation to vote in New Orleans and the expenses would be the "modern equivalent of a poll tax."

Fewer than 10,000 registered voters have requested absentee ballots, said Dale Atkins, who is campaigning for re-election as civil district court clerk.

Other complaints include cumbersome absentee ballot procedures, frequent movement of precinct locations and a refusal to share information about how candidates can reach the displaced voters.

Election procedures in Louisiana and many other Southern states are subject to Justice Department approval because of their history of racial discrimination.

Several black leaders argued Friday for satellite voting locations outside Louisiana, though a spokeswoman for Ater said state law doesn't allow out-of-state voting operations.

"This is a Florida in the making," said Urban League President Marc Morial, a former New Orleans mayor, referring to Florida's extensive voting problems in the 2000 elections. "If you see an election train wreck coming, why not do something to prevent it before the wreck occurs?"

Trucks To Face New Mpg Rules (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, March 28, 2006

New fuel-economy rules for trucks to be announced this week would not only impose mileage standards for the first time on previously exempt heavy-duty models, such as the Hummer H2, but also would overhaul standards for other trucks, according to auto industry officials and others familiar with the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0022699

They declined to be identified because the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration hadn't made the new rules public.

The rules could pressure automakers to improve the mileage of their heftiest vehicles, often known as “three-quarter-ton” or “one-ton” trucks. And they could create, for automakers, a bewildering array of fuel-economy standards that could vary almost from model to model.

The revamped standards apply only to trucks. Car standards don't change. The NHTSA regulations determine whether an automaker is fined for selling too many low-mileage trucks, or not enough high-mileage trucks. They have nothing to do with mileage numbers printed on the price stickers of new vehicles.

The heart of the new system is an index number calculated using the wheelbase and track. Wheelbase is the length from the center of the front wheel to the center of the rear wheel. Track is a width measurement, based on how far apart left and right wheels are.

The most lenient requirements would be for the largest vehicles, those with long wheelbases and wide tracks. The strictest would apply to the smallest models.

The rules differ from a system proposed in August. It would have split trucks into six size categories and assigned standards to each category, from about 21 to 28 miles per gallon. Environmentalists complained that automakers simply would make small changes in the sizes of their vehicles to get them into categories with less-strict mileage requirements.

Current regulations have a single truck standard, 21.6 miles per gallon for 2006 models. An automaker calculates the mileage of all trucks sold and, if it's lower than 21.6, must pay a fine.

Heavy-duty pickups would continue to be exempt because they are considered work trucks rather than personal vehicles. That could amount to a significant loophole, according to the Union of Concerned Scientists, which calculates that 80% of heavy-duty trucks sold are pickups.

Federal officials wanted a new system that doesn't encourage selling more small trucks in order to meet mileage standards. Statistics show that bigger, heavier vehicles are safer to their occupants in crashes than smaller, lighter vehicles are.

If the new standards encourage larger vehicles, “from a safety perspective, that's good,” says Adrian Lund, president of the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety.

A Road Map For Agencies Switching To Pay For Performance (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

Creating fair pay-for-performance systems in the government will require effective ways of evaluating job performance and well-trained supervisors, according to a report from the Merit Systems Protection Board.

"Pay for performance is a complex process that demands a large investment from those who seek to use it," the report says. "The effectiveness of a pay for performance system can be undermined by flaws in the design, implementation, and operational phases."

Such a system "demands a higher level of supervisory skill" than the traditional grade-and-step system used in government for decades, in part because performance-based systems give more discretion to supervisors to set pay and bonuses, the report says.

"Supervisors must treat employees fairly in terms of the assignment of work, evaluation of performance, and allocation of rewards -- and they must be held accountable for their decisions," the report says.

The report from the board, a quasi-judicial agency that hears appeals from employees facing major disciplinary action and that helps oversee the civil service, comes at a timely moment for the federal workforce. At least half of the workforce seems likely to shift into new pay systems in the next few years.

The Defense and Homeland Security departments plan to launch performance-based pay systems this year, and intelligence community leaders recently told their employees that they soon will be moving to design a new pay system. The Office of Management and Budget has floated a draft bill that would require pay for performance across the government.

DOJ_NMG_0022700

The MSPB report, which goes to the White House and Congress, provides a road map for federal employees and supervisors who are uncertain about the ingredients that go into performance-based pay systems. The 43-page report (at http://www.mspb.gov in the "studies" section) offers a balanced view of what's at stake when adopting new compensation strategies.

Although performance pay is fairly common in corporate America, the federal government has limited experience in linking employee job evaluations to pay decisions. To a great degree, change has been slower in the federal sector because the largest pay system, the General Schedule, is grounded in law and because Congress has reserved the right to mandate raises as part of the annual spending bills.

Federal unions also have resisted performance-based pay, primarily because of concerns that political appointees or managers might play favorites when assigning job ratings to employees.

The report from the MSPB takes no stance on performance-based pay but urges federal agencies to consider "key decision points" when planning new systems.

For example, the report recommends that agencies lay out clear goals for performance pay. Is the goal to increase employee job performance or to provide greater fairness in pay? It is to reward the best workers with bonuses, a pay raise or a combination of the two? Should less than 5 percent, or about 30 percent, of an employee's pay hinge on job performance?

"Agencies need to tailor pay systems to fit their unique circumstances and needs," the report says, but it warns that past efforts to create new pay systems have been undermined by a lack of funding. "Long-term financial support under a variety of scenarios should be carefully planned before implementing pay for performance," the report recommends.

Supervisors may face the greatest challenge, the report suggests, in noting that they must communicate with employees throughout an appraisal cycle, document their behavior, and evaluate their performance "in comparison to established standards and to other employees."

Linking pay to job ratings ups the ante for supervisors, the report points out. "Supervisors may experience even greater trepidation about the already contentious appraisal process, knowing that their decisions will affect employees' livelihoods. Supervisors need the training, the tools, and the time to be able to function effectively in this difficult role."

Defense and Homeland Security officials have promised to step up their communication and training efforts. Yesterday, for example, the Pentagon posted a 60-page guide to the new National Security Personnel System designed to help the first wave of Defense civilians understand how pay procedures will change this spring. The guide (at http://www.cpms.osd.mil/nsps) provides examples of the new salary scales and supplemental market adjustments.

Negotiations Begin On Lobby-limiting Measures (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 28, 2006

Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday started negotiating with Senate Democrats in anticipation of passing measures this week to curb the influence of lobbyists.

Senators today are expected to debate the merits of Sen. Trent Lott's bill that limits members' ability to insert "pork-barrel" spending into conference reports, puts stricter regulations on travel, restricts lobbyists from going onto the floor of the House or Senate and requires members to disclose gifts from lobbyists on their Web sites, among other things.

Mr. Frist, Tennessee Republican, told reporters yesterday he is working with Democratic members to work out a compromise and he thinks the Senate is "very close" to completing the bill.

"It will take participation, collaboration and cooperation," he said, speculating an agreement could be reached in a few hours.

Lawmakers were supposed to start the lobbying reform measure last night, but the Judiciary Committee passed a sweeping reform measure dealing with border enforcement and guest workers that dominated most of the evening.

The election-year lobbying reform efforts are an attempt to show lawmakers will not tolerate abuses, such as those that led to the prison sentence of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who admitted taking bribes, and the guilty plea of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. After the two scandals, House and Senate leaders pledged to quickly reform their own rules.

DOJ_NMG_0022701

Mr. Lott, Mississippi Republican, has said his bill would add "clarity" and "transparency" to the legislative process.

There are more than 70 proposed amendments to the measure. Mr. Lott resisted one amendment earlier this month that would impose an all-out ban on lobbyists paying for meals. He said the amendment was demeaning to lawmakers because it implied they could "be had for the price of a lunch or a dinner."

The proposed bill requires that pork-barrel spending, officially known as earmarks, be clearly listed and disclosed on the Internet 24 hours before the final vote on any spending bills.

The bill allows members to accept a meal from a lobbyist, as long as the value and paying person is publicly disclosed. It also adds disclosure requirements for travel.

Lobbying Bill: Back On Track? (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, March 28, 2006

After a three-week detour from lobbying reform, Senators will return to work on a lobbying overhaul measure this morning, with leading lawmakers saying they hope to wrap up work by the end of the day and then turn to a politically explosive rewrite of immigration laws.

The path back to lobbying reform was cleared when Senate leadership reached an agreement with Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) to set aside his proposal for an amendment on foreign ownership of ports. Schumer's proposal had derailed work on the overhaul earlier this month.

Instead, Senators will vote today on an amendment offered by Sens. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) that would ban the long-held Senate practice of allowing Members to hamstring legislation with anonymous holds.

Senators were still negotiating over what step to take next at press time Monday. The Senate could move to a prearranged package of amendments, which have yet to be determined, or else Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) could choose to limit debate by calling for cloture on the measure.

Either way, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the bill's floor manager, expressed confidence that he could clear the bill from the chamber if given enough time. "If they'll give me a day, I can do it," he said, adding a cautionary note that the prospects had grown dimmer since leadership scrapped their intended Monday start for debate on the measure.

If Senators cannot finish the bill tomorrow, it could be weeks before they return to it. In that scenario, the chance for passage begins to fade, warned some lawmakers who favor an overhaul. "I'm of the view to just get it done," said Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), who helped clear part of the bill through the Rules Committee.

Others said the issue was too important to race to hasty passage. "We don't want to shut down debate so rapidly" that key amendments fall by the wayside, said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

One plan floated on Monday called for each party to offer five amendments to the bill after dispatching with the proposal to end secret holds. But several Senators confirmed the plan was unable to win support.

Regardless of how the process plays out, Senators will have to slog through some controversial amendments if debate proceeds as planned today. Several lawmakers have complained that the product is too weak as it stands and already have offered a number of proposals to strengthen it.

One that's sure to draw fire would establish an independent Office of Public Integrity to oversee compliance with new lobbying rules by collecting disclosure requirements and even initiating investigations that could be referred to the Justice Department or the ethics committees.

A similar plan was stripped out of an earlier bill in committee, with members of the Senate Ethics Committee complaining that it would strip them of their authority and invite political abuses. Lott himself reiterated his criticism of the plan on Monday, though outside watchdog groups have called it critical to effective reform.

Obama has offered an amendment to strengthen revolving-door provisions in the bill by banning former lawmakers and staffers-turned-lobbyists from quietly coordinating lobbying activities during their cooling-off period, which the bill would double to two years.

DOJ_NMG_0022702

Another amendment, supported by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), would require lawmakers to reimburse corporations at the charter rate when they fly on their jets, rather than the first-class fare they pay under current rules. That plan has met opposition from members from distant and rural states, especially Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska).

Senators from both parties on Monday said that a dwindling amount of time for legislative action and a packed calendar are raising the stakes for the debate. If lawmakers cannot finish work on the bill quickly, Senate leadership may turn to the much more high-profile issue of immigration. (See Roadmap, p. 1.) Debate on that issue will almost surely occupy the chamber until the Easter recess, after which lawmakers will return to Washington, D.C., to work on supplemental spending legislation.

Beyond the Schumer hurdle, Senators attempting to return to the bill this week also had to work past objections by some to taking up the Wyden amendment. Wyden himself said he was unsure who among his colleagues had raised protests to his plan — a fact that he said was simply another argument in favor of it.

"Some Senators are very comfortable with the idea that special interests can hot-wire favors with no accountability," he said.

On the House side, the Rules Committee will be the first of five panels with pieces of the lobbying reform bill to take up the issue this week. The committee, chaired by reform bill author David Dreier (R-Calif.), has scheduled an original jurisdiction hearing on the measure for Thursday morning.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has maintained he would like to move as many pieces of the bill as possible before the two-week Easter recess, beginning April 7. But with committee calendars already packed with other business this week, that timetable could slip.

None of the other four other House panels assigned to work on the bill — House Administration, Government Reform, Judiciary and Standards of Official Conduct (Ethics) — has slotted consideration this week, aides said.

The House reform measure stops short of its Senate counterpart in several key areas. It does not call for the establishment of an independent oversight office; lacks tightened gift limits; does not double the current one-year lobbying ban for former lawmakers and staffers turned lobbyists; and sidesteps a permanent end to privately funded travel by instead calling for a temporary ban.

Those deficiencies have prompted outside watchdog groups to blast the measure as too weak in critical areas.

While some vulnerable Republicans have offered their own plans to strengthen the bill, there is hardly consensus in the House GOP Conference about the direction to take.

Several rank-and-file Members criticized the measure as overly draconian when House Republican leaders unveiled the plan earlier this month. And the conservative Republican Study Committee outlined a number of possible concerns in a recent memo, indicating the bill goes too far in some areas while not doing enough to crackdown on earmarks.

Heating Up With Hot-Button Issues (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

As if the debates over immigration and the Iraq war weren't contentious enough, Congress is about to embark on some really hot-button issues: flag burning, same-sex marriage and censuring the president.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a Friday hearing on Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing warrantless surveillance of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails. The measure has divided Feingold's fellow Democrats, some of whom fear he is helping Republicans shift attention from the GOP's problems in dealing with Iraq, hurricane relief and other matters.

But Feingold (Wis.) is unapologetic, commending Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) for scheduling the hearing. "He recognizes the importance and seriousness of the issue," Feingold said yesterday. "The president broke the law, and this hearing is an important step towards Congress holding him accountable."

Needless to say, not all lawmakers agree that Bush broke the law, and the issue should get a good airing this morning in a separate hearing before Specter's panel. Four federal judges are slated to discuss proposals to bring the eavesdropping program, which is conducted by the National Security Agency, under the auspices of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

DOJ_NMG_0022703

The 1978 act established a secret court to consider the government's warrant requests to wiretap Americans. Bush says his constitutional powers permit him to order such surveillance without warrants when terrorism is suspected.

Some of the judges have served on the FISA court. Also scheduled to testify today are Morton H. Halperin of the Open Society Policy Center and David S. Kris, senior vice president of Time Warner Inc.

Meanwhile, interest groups on the left and right are preparing for showdowns over flag desecration and same-sex marriage in June, when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has scheduled floor votes on the always-controversial issues. Both efforts call for constitutional amendments, which require a two-thirds majority vote in the House and the Senate, followed by ratification by three-fourths of the states.

Frist, who is weighing a 2008 presidential bid, often touts the proposed amendment to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The effort failed in both houses in 2004. The Senate fell 12 votes short of the number needed to cut off debate, and House supporters could not muster the two-thirds majority they needed in their chamber.

As for protecting the American flag, some conservatives have sought a constitutional amendment since 1990. That is when the Supreme Court affirmed its view that flag burning is a form of protected political speech. The House has backed a constitutional amendment to bar flag desecration in previous Congresses, but the Senate has not complied.

Some Democrats ask why Frist is spending time on long-shot constitutional matters when Congress is struggling over immigration, the deficit, tax policies and other issues.

"It's that time of the year to throw a little red meat to the base," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "We need to focus on the American people's priorities."

Frist spokesman Bob Stevenson said that is exactly what his boss is doing. The flag-protection amendment "is the number-one issue on veterans' agenda," Stevenson said yesterday. And the bid to ban same-sex marriage requires federal action, he said, because numerous courts have rejected state legislatures' efforts to do so.

"We don't have the option of putting this off," Stevenson said.GOP Joins in Urging Floor Debate on Iraq War

Three House Republicans have joined three Democrats in calling for an extensive floor debate on the Iraq war.

GOP Reps. Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.), Walter B. Jones Jr. (N.C.) and Ron Paul (Tex.) last week joined Democratic Reps. Neil Abercrombie (Hawaii), Ike Skelton (Mo.) and Martin T. Meehan (Mass.) in signing a letter to colleagues urging "an open and honest debate on the future of U.S. policy in Iraq." They want a "discharge petition" for Abercrombie's stalled resolution that would require Bush to "develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal" of U.S. troops.

'527' Legislation Would Affect Democrats More (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

In 2001, when Karl Rove first outlined plans for a $50 million get-out-the-vote program, his PowerPoint presentation made one point clear: The effort would be a "joint project of the White House and the Republican National Committee."

Rove's declaration points to a crucial difference between the Republican and Democratic parties. Less than a year later, top Democratic strategists began moving in precisely the opposite direction. During the Bush years, voter mobilization in large measure has been run by what analysts call a "shadow Democratic Party" -- consisting of outside groups operating independently from the Democratic National Committee and the party's top office seekers.

The difference between the two approaches explains why the Democrats are a lot more worried about proposals to impose sharp limits on spending by tax-exempt, non-party political groups.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is sponsoring legislation that would restrict donors to giving just $5,000 annually to "527" groups (named after the section of the tax code they operate under). In recent years, tycoons such as George Soros and T. Boone Pickens have given millions to such groups.

"For better or worse, our side is now much more reliant on extra-party institutions to do our core political business," said Jim Jordan, who in 2004 helped coordinate the activities of two independent, liberal 527s, the Media Fund and America Coming Together.

"There are two political cultures, each with their own economies," said one top strategist, a veteran of many Democratic presidential campaigns. "We would try to tell the groups working with us what we wanted them to do, and sometimes they paid attention -- and when they disagreed, they did whatever they wanted to do. It's very different on the Republican side of the aisle."

Over the past 30 years, the Republican National Committee has centralized control and funding of such basic political functions as voter mobilization and message development.

The RNC contracts out work to consultants who operate under strict oversight. Those who fall out of favor face being cut off from party-generated work. Independent groups, such as the Club for Growth, are viewed by the party establishment as disruptive, encouraging conservative primary challenges to moderate incumbents as much as contributing to the defeat of Democrats.

Democrats, by contrast, tend to view the independent groups with gratitude rather than resentment -- because they are doing essential political work that is not being done by others.

In 2002, the legislation commonly known as McCain-Feingold imposed a ban on "soft money" -- large, party-raised contributions on which Democrats, more than Republicans, had become heavily dependent. This led to a blossoming of 527 groups, orchestrated by such veteran liberal operatives as Harold Ickes, an aide to President Bill Clinton; Ellen Malcolm of the feminist group Emily's List; and labor organizer Steve Rosenthal; and funded by such people as Soros and insurance millionaire Peter Lewis.

More recently, wealthy liberals, working independently from the Democratic Party, in 2005 formed the Democracy Alliance with the goal of building a strengthened Democratic infrastructure of think tanks, advocacy organizations and leadership training groups. Ickes, in turn, is starting a private, for-profit company to create a national voter list.

Republicans have not outsourced political functions because the GOP can afford to finance -- and therefore control -- these activities.

Just last year, the RNC raised $105.4 million compared with $56.1 taken in by the DNC. In the competition for small donors, the RNC raised $55 million in gifts under $200, while the DNC raised $32.2 million in under-$200 contributions.

These two disparate approaches to building election treasures and machinery underpin Democratic opposition to and Republican support for enactment of tough, new restrictions on the independent 527 committees. In the first election in recent memory in which Democrats raised nearly as much as Republicans, the 527s flooded the 2003-04 election cycle with $424.8 million. The money favored pro-Democratic groups, which outspent their pro-Republican adversaries 2 to 1, or by $110 million.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is outspoken in support of the proposed new rules on independent groups, declaring that Republicans "must reform 527s, so that everyone plays at the same level, and billionaires can't once again use loopholes to try to buy elections."

But this view has angered some conservatives, who say that GOP leaders have allowed political self-interest to trump their commitment to the free market.

Former Federal Election Commission member Bradley Smith wrote on the RedState blog that restricting 527 political committees runs counter to conservative principles and would prevent such key pro-Republican groups as the Swift Boat Veterans and Progress for America from replicating in future elections the crucial role they played in 2004. While outspent, PFA and the Swift Boat Veterans ran ads that Democrats and Republicans agree were the most effective of the campaign.

"We're so hung up on Soros, we're not only betraying principles, freedom and good government, but we're being politically stupid. Soros spent $25 million in 2004, and as the guys at National Review put it, all he got was a T-Shirt," Smith wrote. "527 'reform' doesn't whack big labor, big liberal foundations, big Main Stream Media. . . . It does 'cut off' Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, Progress for America, and Club for Growth."

Smith and Democratic FEC member Ellen L. Weintraub, among others, believe that clamping down on 527 organizations will merely result in a massive transfer of resources to other nonprofit, tax-exempt groups.

If this prediction came true, the result might mean less public disclosure -- the opposite goal of most political reformers. That is because 527 groups must reveal information about contributors and spending, while other entities, such as 501c groups, do not.

Meanwhile, there are signs that Republicans increasingly are borrowing some of the political outsourcing techniques of Democrats. On Nov. 26, 2005, television ads began to run in Pennsylvania that were designed to directly address one of the dangers facing the reelection campaign of Sen. Rick Santorum (R): a potential backlash among the state's elderly because of Santorum's support for private investment accounts under Social Security.

Onscreen, an older man holds his grandson's hand as the two walk along a sunny park path. The announcer tells viewers:

"These days, Edgar's afternoons are reserved for grandkids. . . . He's enjoying retirement because Rick Santorum is protecting his Social Security. Santorum sponsored legislation guaranteeing Americans 55 and older the Social Security they deserve."

The ads, part of a $1 million buy, did not cost the Santorum campaign a dime. Americans for Job Security, a tax-exempt, nonprofit organization financed them. Michael D. Dubke, president of the 501c6 that in 2004 raised $7 million, declined to disclose the names of AJS donors. He said identifying them would simply detract attention from the group's free-market message.

Bill Seeks To Ban Insider Trading By Lawmakers And Their Aides (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid broad congressional concern about ethics scandals, some lawmakers are poised to expand the battle for reform: They want to enact legislation that would prohibit members of Congress and their aides from trading stocks based on nonpublic information gathered on Capitol Hill.

Two Democrat lawmakers plan to introduce today a bill that would block trading on such inside information. Current securities law and congressional ethics rules don't prohibit lawmakers or their staff members from buying and selling securities based on information learned in the halls of Congress.

It isn't clear yet what kind of support the bill will garner from Republicans. But its prospects are enhanced by the current charged environment in Congress; lawmakers from both parties in both houses have placed a high priority on passing ethics and lobbying-reform legislation. Such legislation would provide a vehicle to which proponents could attach a measure on stock trades.

In addition to banning trading on inside information, the proposal would require that lawmakers and their top aides disclose within 30 days any stock trades. Congressional rules now require lawmakers to disclose their trades once a year. The bill also would require that companies register with Congress if they sell information about congressional activity to Wall Street investors.

Unlike members of Congress, executive-branch employees already are banned from trading on inside information. Employees of several federal agencies are prohibited from investing in companies that have business before them. In 1934, for example, Congress banned Federal Communications Commission employees from owning stocks or bonds in telecommunications or broadcast companies.

The two Democrats who wrote the bill say they were motivated by the trading activity of a former top aide to Rep. Tom DeLay, the onetime Republican majority leader in the House. The aide, Tony Rudy, bought and sold hundreds of stocks from his computer in the U.S. Capitol in 1999 and 2000, according to financial-disclosure forms and other DeLay aides.

Neither Mr. Rudy nor his lawyer returned calls seeking comment. It is impossible to tell from the disclosure forms whether Mr. Rudy traded stocks based on information he gathered while working as deputy chief of staff and general counsel to Mr. DeLay, then the No. 3 Republican in the House.

Rep. Louise Slaughter, the New York Democrat who wrote the bill, said: "Top leadership aides know what is happening before anyone else. The potential for abuse there is incredible."

Rep. Brian Baird of Washington, the bill's co-sponsor, said there are "hundreds of billions of dollars on the line on congressional activity. If there is a way to make a profit on that, somebody has probably already figured out a way to do it. And it's not illegal."

Congressional Republicans declined to discuss the proposal until they see its exact language. Republican lawmakers could view it as a partisan ploy to hurt Mr. DeLay and another top Republican caught up in an insider-trading controversy: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who has been trying to explain his sales of stock in a hospital firm long associated with his family.

In the current ethics-reform drive, lawmakers are considering steps such as banning lobbyists from taking members of Congress to lunch to requiring lobbyists to disclose all of their contacts on Capitol Hill. The stock-sales debate will expand that discussion.

Lawmakers are allowed to buy and sell securities -- and even vote on legislation that affects their investments -- except in rare circumstances. The chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, for example, would be allowed to buy stock in Bank of America Corp. and vote on banking issues that affect the bank. Ethics rules prohibit lawmakers from voting on issues only if they are among a small group of beneficiaries.

To some extent, the legislation would expand the commonly used definition of insider trading. According to the Securities and Exchange Commission, insider trading is the buying or selling of securities on the basis of material, nonpublic information in violation of a duty. But the information in question normally comes from inside a company: For example, an executive of a publicly traded company can't tell friends to sell company stock if he or she knows that the company is about to fall short of its quarterly earnings forecast.

Lawmakers and staff members never have faced similar obligations on the information they acquire. "If a congressman learns that his committee is about to do something that would affect a company, he can go trade on that because he is not obligated to keep that information confidential," said Thomas Newkirk, a partner with law firm Jenner & Block LLP and a former official with the SEC's enforcement division. "He is not breaching a duty of confidentiality to anybody and therefore he would not be liable for insider trading."

Congressional ethics rules addressing insider trading are "unspecific enough that there is room for clarification in legislation," said Ken Gross, an ethics lawyer with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

The proposed legislation would call on the SEC to establish rules to bar stock trading based on nonpublic information from Congress. It would prohibit lawmakers and their aides from trading based on information obtained in Congress that is not yet public. And it would prohibit lawmakers and staff from giving that information to others for investment purposes.

Ms. Slaughter is the top Democrat on the House Rules Committee, which is charged with overseeing much of the ethics-reform legislation. The reform legislation has arisen in the wake of a Justice Department investigation into Jack Abramoff, a top Republican lobbyist and onetime fund-raiser for Mr. DeLay. Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to trying to bribe lawmakers and staff with overseas trips, meals, greens fees and cash.

The Justice Department is looking into Mr. Abramoff's contacts with several Republican lawmakers and more than a dozen current and former aides of the lawmakers. Among those under investigation by federal prosecutors are Mr. DeLay and his onetime aide, Mr. Rudy.

Mr. Rudy made nearly 500 trades in 1999 and 2000, according to his annual financial-disclosure forms. Those forms show that he typically invested in high-technology and health-care companies and often held stocks for less than a day. About two-thirds of the stocks he purchased gained in value after he bought them.

It is difficult to tell how much Mr. Rudy profited on particular trades. House financial statements require disclosure of stock trades only in broad ranges. Mr. Rudy bought each of his stocks for between $1,001 and $15,000 and sold them in the same ranges.

But Mr. Rudy's net worth grew from 1999 to 2000. Mr. Rudy and his wife were at least $49,000 in debt at the end of 1999, according to his disclosure form. They owned no more than $1,000 in stock and reported a student-loan debt between $50,001 and $100,000.

At the end of 2000, Mr. Rudy and his wife reported assets between $6,007 and $91,000. Their student-loan debt was between $30,002 and $100,000.

After Abramoff, Nats Fear It's Out With The Hill Crowd (WP)

By Thomas Heath

The Washington Post, March 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022707

The Washington Nationals were a big hit on Capitol Hill last year. The return of a professional baseball team to the city after 33 years provided a new venue for lobbyists to entertain members of Congress and their staff at RFK Stadium, just 20 blocks east of the Capitol.

But with the start of the new season a week away, Nationals executives fear their popularity among the federal elite might decline. They are concerned that a significant piece of their business could be affected in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff bribery and corruption scandal, which is leading many lobbyists and elected officials to reconsider how and where they do business.

Although congressional efforts to crack down on the lobbying industry have flagged since Abramoff's guilty plea in January, an emerging bill in the Senate would effectively prohibit members of Congress from accepting tickets to major D.C. area professional sporting events from registered lobbyists.

Nationals President Tony Tavares said the team already has had some "push back" from lobbyists who were ticket holders a year ago, and it has led to the cancellation of ticket plans for about 100 prime seats at RFK.

Officials from the Washington Wizards and Washington Capitals expressed similar concern, although they say they won't be able to fully judge the effect until seats at Verizon Center come up for renewal. Even the Washington Redskins, who routinely sell out 91,665-seat FedEx Field, might not be immune.

"Washington, D.C., thrives on the lobbying business," Tavares said. "It's been part of the landscape here for a long, long time. And it's pretty important to our team and our new stadium."

Even if Congress does nothing, several lobbyists said the Abramoff affair will cut down on the number of tickets available on Capitol Hill.

"It will have a chilling effect," said Gregory Gill, executive vice president and general counsel of Cassidy & Associates, a prominent lobbying firm. "We have Nationals, Capitals and Wizards tickets. There are times I have given tickets to Hill staffers. Will I do that any more? No. What's the point of having them if we can't entertain Hill staffers or members?" He said the firm has decided to cancel its tickets at Verizon Center.

"A lot of people do a lot of business at sports and entertainment events," said Thomas H. Boggs, chairman of Patton Boggs LLP, a top lobbying firm that shares a suite at FedEx Field with businessman Ray Schoenke, a former Washington Redskins guard who ran unsuccessfully for governor of Maryland in 1998. "The people who will do it, it will have an effect on considerably. Members of Congress and their staff will be reluctant to accept tickets to sporting events."

House and Senate rules currently allow a lawmaker and a member of his or her staff to accept a ticket to a sports or cultural event as long as the value on the ticket does not exceed $49.99, with an annual limit of no more than $100 in tickets from one source. In response to the Abramoff scandals, the House and Senate are considering a number of proposals that range from leaving the limits unchanged to a ban on accepting any sports or entertainment ticket from a lobbyist.

Although Washington's business community is much more diverse than it was even a decade ago, lobbying is still a huge part of the city's culture. Verizon Center and FedEx Field -- with their rings of luxury suites and club seats -- were designed to maximize income from the money lobbyists, corporations and other organizations spend to entertain politicians and executive branch officials.

Verizon Center earns between $165,000 and $265,000 per year on each of its 114 suites. One of the 244 or so luxury suites at FedEx Field can cost up to $200,000 a season.

The Nationals say they will go ahead with their plan to include 78 luxury suites at their new 41,000-seat ballpark on the Anacostia River because they are confident they can make up the difference from any lost business from lobbyists. "Lobbying is just one small part of the commercial population that is out there," Tavares said. "There are other parts of the D.C. economy that can fill the demand."

It's difficult to put an exact dollar amount on the income teams generate from lobbyists, but "I think it's a big percentage," said Stu Van Scoyoc, president of Van Scoyoc Associates Inc., the largest independent lobbying firm in the city.

It was enough to cause sports entrepreneur Abe Pollin, who owns the Wizards and built a downtown arena in 1997, to get a ruling from the Senate Ethics Committee nearly a decade ago that allowed senators and Senate staff to accept tickets priced under $50 from corporations and lobbyists. Accordingly, Pollin priced the "fair value" listed on the face of its club level tickets at $48, just under the $49.99 limit.

Some lobbyists, like Van Scoyoc, say it is too early to say whether they will hold onto their seats. These days, Van Scoyoc said, his Verizon Center suite is reserved only for friends, private clients, his employees and others, but not federal officials.

"The whole thing is in question at the moment," Van Scoyoc said. "Even though they haven't changed the rules, as a practical matter people don't want anything to do with it. Many offices have taken the position that they are not letting their people accept anything from these [lobbying] firms."

Rob Jennings, president of American Event Consulting Inc., which organizes fundraisers for Republicans and staged several at RFK Stadium last year, said sports tickets are a great way to entertain clients and potential clients, "but if you're using it to give to Hill staffers, then the lobbyists I have talked to have been scared away from that."

The Nationals, who are owned by Major League Baseball but are for sale at $450 million, priced hundreds of prime infield box seats under $50 at RFK last season, in part to stay under the gift ban limit, according to a team source. Tavares said the Abramoff scandals have resulted in the cancellation of around 100 of those seats this season.

"We have had people call from lobbying firms and indicate they are hesitant to move forward with their season ticket purchases, asking for more time, which we can't give them," Tavares said. "There could be more of a measurable impact, but we won't know until they pass the new rules."

One person who is leading a group of investors trying to buy the Nationals said that any legislation that affects the number of tickets purchased by lobbying firms and corporations was a concern. But this person, who spoke on the condition he not be identified for fear of hurting his group's chances, said he didn't think it would have a major impact on the team's finances because of the overall wealth and number of people in the Washington area.

"It definitely could impact sales of suites and premium seats," said another bidder, who requested anonymity for fear of offending baseball and losing his chance to buy the team. "We would have to make it up elsewhere."

David Cope of D.C. Sports & Sponsorship Sales LLC, who has worked in marketing and sales for all six major professional sports teams in the Baltimore-Washington region, said the teams will have to find ways to make up for losses in sales if new legislations tightens the rules on sports tickets.

"The teams are probably experiencing attrition from certain companies and organizations who would be affected by the lobbying legislation," Cope said. "But I'm sure they are focusing on industries and categories to replace those sales."

The Curious Paradox Of American Corporate Lobbying (FT)

By Michael Massing

Financial Times, March 28, 2006

The main causes of the US motor industry's current woes by now have been well established: soaring pension costs, crushing healthcare obligations, ossified management, uninspired car designs, clumsy marketing practices. Yet, amid all the analysis, one important factor has been overlooked: the industry's own lobbying efforts. For more than 15 years, US carmakers have strenuously and successfully opposed efforts in Congress to raise fuel-efficiency standards. Thus freed, General Motors and Ford have directed their energy and talent into selling highly profitable – and highly inefficient – sports utility vehicles and light trucks. Now, with petrol prices soaring, these companies are falling further behind their Japanese competitors. It is a case study in how an industry's lobbying efforts can undermine its own long-term interests.

The industry's lobbying apparatus is formidable. The Washington-based Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, representing nine companies (including European and Asian ones, among them Toyota), spent $36.6m on lobbying from 2000 to 2005, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan group that tracks money in politics. In that same period, GM spent about $43m and Ford $36m on lobbying. These sums go on the usual array of tactics that corporate America uses to bend rules and regulations to its liking: sending batteries of lawyers to congressional hearings, helping congressmen mark up bills, filing lawsuits to contest unwelcome laws and forming "consumer groups" to pressure lawmakers. The motor industry is also generous at campaign time, contributing about $20m in both the 2000 and 2004 election cycles. On many issues, moreover, it can count on the support of the United Auto Workers, which, in addition to deploying its own lobbyists, can mobilise its 600,000-plus members.

On no issue has the industry pressed harder than on that of fuel economy. In 1975, Congress passed a law setting Corporate Average Fuel Economy (Cafe) standards, requiring that vehicles produced by each company in a given year meet an average fuel- efficiency standard, with one standard for cars and another for light trucks. By the late 1980s, these standards had stalled at 27.5 miles per gallon for cars and 20.7 miles for light trucks. In 1990, amid growing concerns over global warming and US reliance on imported oil, Richard Bryan, Democratic senator from Nevada, proposed a bill to raise those standards by 40 per cent over 10 years. The industry maintained that meeting that goal would mean reducing the weight of its models. It formed a "grassroots" coalition to protest against the inconvenience this would cause and pushed car dealers and motor industry workers to protest to lawmakers. In the end, the measure just missed the 60 votes needed to overcome a threatened filibuster. Had it passed, says Laura MacCleery of Public Citizen, a consumer advocacy group, "it would have saved the industry".

Liberated from concerns over fuel efficiency, Detroit concentrated on producing SUVs, which were classified as light trucks. These, of course, proved very popular while fuel remained cheap. But GM and Ford let their family-car lines stagnate, to the point that GM had to retire its venerable Oldsmobile division, whose image had become hopelessly outdated. Meanwhile, Toyota and Honda concentrated on building smaller, more fuel-efficient models and in developing hybrid technology, with its vastly superior mileage.

After the defeat of the Bryan bill in 1990, subsequent efforts in Congress to raise Cafe standards – in 1995, 2000, 2001 and 2003 – succumbed to industry opposition. Only in 2003 were those standards finally raised – by a paltry 1.5 miles per gallon for light trucks over four years. Over the past decade, as mileage standards in America have stagnated, GM's and Ford's combined US market share has tumbled from 58.5 per cent to 43.4 per cent, while Toyota's and Honda's has surged from 12.7 per cent to 21.9 per cent. This reflects both the reputation of Japanese cars for quality and their superior mileage. The US has fallen so far behind Japan in hybrid technology that Ford now leases a version of it from Toyota.

During the past year, with gas prices soaring, the performance gap between US and Japanese models has grown even more salient and, while there is a three-month waiting list for Toyota's hybrid Prius, GM and Ford have had to offer huge rebates to move their lumbering Escalades and Expeditions.

Of course, given the carmakers' managerial bungling, higher mileage standards might not have saved them. But they would not have hurt. Certainly, if the companies had put the millions they spent on lobbying and litigation into improving their engines and transmissions, Detroit might now be leasing hybrid technology to others.

The motor industry is hardly alone in lobbying against its own interest. US electric utilities, represented by the Edison Electric Institute, have worked hard to defeat congressional efforts to require them to derive at least 10 per cent of their power from renewable sources, such as wind and solar, by the year 2020 (compared with just 2.5 per cent now). Three times in the past four years, the Senate has approved such a measure, only to see it killed in the House by the industry's allies. With the price of natural gas nearly tripling in the past two years, the industry would now be better placed had it been forced to develop those alternative sources.

In the late 1990s, when people began downloading songs from the internet, the major record companies, through their main trade group, the Recording Industry Association of America, pressed Congress to tighten copyright laws. They also sued thousands of individuals who traded music online. Seeing an opening, Apple developed its iTunes downloading technology and has since sold more than 1bn songs, for a current fee of 99 cents each. Meanwhile, CD sales by the RIAA's members have plunged. Had the industry sought to adapt to, rather than buy protection against, the internet, it could be leading the way technologically.

On healthcare, one has to wonder what the competitive position of US corporations would be today had the 1993 Clinton reform plan not been so vigorously opposed by such business groups as the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers. Had they embraced it, perhaps companies such as GM and Ford would not be struggling with their current healthcare costs.

This all shows that it often takes years for the short-sightedness of corporate lobbying to become apparent. In the short term, the gains wrung through lobbyists and campaign contributions might seem impressive. Over time, though, lobbying, in foiling measures designed to promote the public good, can undermine the fortunes of the very industries doing the lobbying. It is yet another reason Congress should hold firm in its effort to rein in Washington's influence peddlers.

Democrats To Unveil Ambitious Security Plan (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, March 28, 2006

Seeking to convince the electorate of their military muscle, national Democratic leaders will vow to eliminate Osama bin Laden and destroy al-Qaida as part of their 2006 national security platform, which will be publicly unveiled Wednesday.

According to a draft copy of the agenda, party leaders will focus on five major policy areas for a safer America, both within its borders and beyond. Perhaps most ambitious among the party's objectives are calls to defeat terrorists and eradicate weapons of mass destruction.

"We will: eliminate Osama Bin Laden, destroy terrorist networks like Al Qaeda, finish the job in Afghanistan and eliminate the threat posed by the Taliban," reads a draft of the party's platform document, titled "Real Security: The Democratic Plan to Protect America and Restore Our Leadership in the World."

Both the Clinton and Bush administrations have been on the hunt for bin Laden for some years. That pursuit intensified in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but critics of the military charge that President Bush has been distracted from the search by the war in Iraq.

Congressional Democrats will formally outline their national security plan Wednesday when they join other party leaders and law enforcement officials in a major event at Union Station. Also included in the party's proposal are calls to ensure a "21st Century Military," strengthen homeland security, provide for a transition out of Iraq and free America from its dependence on foreign oil.

In the draft copy of their plan, Democratic leaders argue that their "real security" proposal will "protect Americans and restore our country's position of international leadership."

"We believe America is best protected, and freedom best advanced by national security policies, including homeland security, energy and diplomatic strategies that are both tough and smart," the document reads.

The "Real Security" unveiling is the second in the party's rolling agenda designed to show what the Democrats intend to do if given the majority this fall.

National security has been the party's political Achilles' heel in recent elections, and national leaders are hoping to reverse that trend this cycle.

Democrats kicked off the rollout of their 2006 agenda in January when they launched the Honest Leadership Act, their plan to restore an ethical government and reduce influence peddling. Still to come, sources say, is the party's domestic focus on key issues such as health care, the economy and education.

Neither the office of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) nor that of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) would comment Monday about the specifics of the national security plan.

But a senior Senate Democratic staffer said that "for the first time" the party should be able to get somewhere with its ideas, given it is now in a position to talk "authoritatively about national security concerns and the fact that Republicans are not stepping up to the plate."

This staffer cautioned, however, that Democrats have to do it now — when public approval of the GOP is dipping and there is an opening to win over the public.

"They have to do this right for the American people to believe in Democrats and equate our party with a stronger national defense," this aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0022711

Beyond catching bin Laden, leading Democrats also will propose an anti-terrorism plan that increases "human intelligence" capabilities, eliminates terrorist breeding grounds, secures loose nuclear materials, and stops nuclear weapons development in Iran and North Korea.

On the issue of Iraq, Democrats will address the controversial issue of a troop withdrawal from the region but stop short of calling for a complete redeployment of U.S. forces by year's end.

Instead, Democrats will assert "2006 is a year of significant transition to full Iraqi Sovereignty" and that within the coming months the Iraqis should assume "primary responsibility for securing and governing their country and with the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces." Democrats will not call for specific timelines beyond using 2006 as a watershed year for change in the region.

The Iraqi conflict has divided Democrats from the start, beginning in 2002 when the party split over whether to initiate a war in the first place. Democrats remain at odds over how and to what degree U.S. troops should be brought home and the Iraqis left to control the country on their own.

Democrats also will call on Iraqis "to make the political compromises necessary to unite their country and defeat insurgency" and promote regional diplomacy. They also will blast the Bush administration for wasting taxpayer money and putting troops at risk for failing to plan appropriately for the conflict and manipulating pre-war intelligence.

Turning to home, Democrats will demand greater investment in military equipment and manpower, a new GI Bill of Rights to provide better benefits to troops and veterans, and a stronger national guard.

The minority also will make calls for stronger homeland security by implementing all of the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, security of U.S. borders and ports, and better equipment for first responders.

Finally, the Democrats will focus on energy independence as part of their security mission. They will make a pledge for full independence from foreign oil by 2020 and increased production of alternate fuels.

Justice Scalia Gives A Sign, But No Finger (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 27, 2006

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia used an Italian hand gesture when questioned by a reporter after attending church this past weekend.

The Boston Herald reported Monday that the justice made "an obscene gesture under his chin" — which prompted some online reports that Scalia had used his middle finger.

Untrue.

"It was a hand off the chin gesture that was meant to be dismissive," Supreme Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg said.

Scalia, 70, is Italian and known for wisecracks in and out of court.

The sign he used in Boston is frequently used by Italians to express displeasure with someone — from mild to deep irritation. It is done by cupping the hand under the chin and flicking the fingers like a backward wave.

Scalia was leaving Mass on Sunday at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross when the reporter asked the justice if he had to deal with much flak related to his conservative Roman Catholic beliefs, according to the newspaper.

"You know what I say to those people?" Scalia said before making the gesture, according to the paper's account. "That's Sicilian."

The paper said that Scalia also said: "This is my spiritual life. I shall lead it the way I like."

Bush Is Showing Signs Of Lame-duck Syndrome (BOS)

By Peter S. Canellos

The Boston Globe, March 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Immediately after his reelection, President Bush started to see the calendar pages turning. "I'm going to come out strong after my swearing in," he said, noting: "We have to move quickly, because after that I'll be quacking like a duck."

There were no quacking noises at the president's press conference last week. But Bush acknowledged that the political capital he won in 2004 is dwindling. He blamed the Iraq war, but even in the best of circumstances, presidents in their second terms become lame ducks very quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0022712

The reason is the 22d Amendment to the Constitution, mandating that presidents can be elected only twice. Although it was ratified in 1951, some would argue that its full impact was not felt for decades, with the forced retirement of President Bill Clinton at age 54. And now, with Bush's diminished clout at age 59, its effects are being felt again.

That's partly why a bipartisan group of legislators have been filing a bill every two years to rescind the 22d Amendment, on the grounds that it deprives the country of its proper choice of leaders.

Passage is unlikely, because it would be seen either as a favor to Bush (though he has shown no interest in a third term) or as a favor to Clinton (though he has channeled his ambitions into his wife's career). It would inevitably fuel conspiracy theories in both parties. And it would have to be ratified by three-fourths of the states.

Nonetheless, there are reasons to believe the 22d Amendment has had more of an effect than its authors had intended.

The amendment was initiated in 1947, two years after the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the only man to serve more than two terms. Roosevelt died at the start of his fourth term.

The power of the presidency had expanded greatly under Roosevelt, for reasons mostly unrelated to the length of his tenure. "New Deal" laws approved to mitigate the effects of the Great Depression extended the reach of government during Roosevelt's first two terms.

Then, World War II gave the president sweeping powers as commander-in-chief of a nation under full-time war mobilization.

Some of those wartime powers remained after the war ended, because of a military buildup at the start of the Cold War.

Supporters of the 22d Amendment believed that the enhanced powers created such an air of invincibility around the presidency that future chiefs would reign for life, upsetting the balance of power.

But the sense of invincibility soon evaporated, regardless of the amendment. Roosevelt's successor, Harry S. Truman, was too unpopular to get a third term. Dwight D. Eisenhower suffered two heart attacks and would have been unlikely to go for a third term, had he been allowed. Assassination, scandal, and unpopularity led to five consecutive unfulfilled presidencies in the 1960s and '70s. Ronald W. Reagan, like Eisenhower, was very popular but was unlikely to have sought a third term because of age and illness. And George H. W. Bush was defeated for reelection.

Thus, the first presidency aborted by the 22d Amendment was Clinton's in 2000. There's no way to know whether Clinton, dogged by the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal, would have won a third term, but few can doubt that the world would be different today if he had served through the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Clinton supporters believe the 9/11 crisis would have been perfectly suited to his political skills, global vision, and understanding of the world's problems. Clinton's detractors voice thanks that his career was choked off in 2000.
